T'ai Chi: an artistic exercise

by Katherine Absher

Staff Writer

T'ai Chi ch'uan is an ancient Chinese exercise of attack and defense. Its use as a means of self-defense, however, is regulated to the art of the movements. When observed, the T'ai Chi master's movements are strong, yet graceful and almost mystical; he appears to be a combination of Bruce Lee and Mikhail Baryshnikov.

Unlike any other exercise, T'ai Chi incorporates active and passive principles, leading to this appearance of strength combined with grace. The flowing, rhythmic movements strengthen the legs, especially the knees, as it lowers the heart rate and relaxes the participant.

Although T'ai Chi is considered a martial art and is sometimes performed with weapons, it is not a competitive sport. Unlike karate, T'ai Chi has no system of belts and levels. The competition lies within oneself, in one's concentration, one's fluidity, and one's overall consciousness of his center of gravity. At the advanced stages, T'ai Chi becomes a form of cooperation as two students "push hands" in a harmony of active and passive principles. Other than this, T'ai Chi is a sport of the individual, practicing his art with the occasional instruction of the master.

The Wu and the Yang are the two surviving schools of T'ai Chi. Teaching "Lee modified Yang," Peter Taillie is of the Yang school. He learned his skills from Fred Wu, a Chinese herbal and acupressure doctor from Columbus, Ohio.

He is presently working toward his master's degree in history at Washington College and is looking forward to imparting his knowledge of T'ai Chi to any interested students or faculty members. He says his style "is a bit more flowing and a bit more flowery than Yang long form."

Yet, the involved movements are part of one exercise: "The entire martial system is just one exercise. Each school is one exercise. By going through the exercise you are prepared to defend yourself," comments Taillie.

Defense, however, is not the primary goal of Taillie's instruction: "It is not really a classic fighting martial art. If you study intensely, it applies for self-defense. That's not really the focus of my teaching."

He tries to "improve peoples' balance, lower their heart rate, and I try to teach a special type of T'ai Chi breathing." T'ai Chi is not an exercise to strengthen the cardiovascular system, but to alleviate the stress upon the heart. "If you describe it in terms of any conventional exercises, it would be extremely low impact."

Because of the lack of strain upon the body from T'ai Chi, there exists no age barrier or handicap hindering the student of "Lee modified Yang." And since the concentration of T'ai Chi is mental rather than physical exertion, Taillie states, "You could even teach people who are paraplegic T'ai Chi"; it is enough for them to think the movements. Taillie adds that T'ai Chi attracts "people that are not attracted to more physical forms of exercise."

Many endurance athletes, however, study T'ai Chi chuan for alertness and balance, such as the first string linemen of University of Tennessee. And whereas other heavy impact sports, such as football, running, or skiing, wear and tear the knees, "you develop considerable leg strength because you bend at the knees," says Taillie.

Another positive aspect of T'ai Chi is that it is not a costly sport. There is really no money involved in buying equipment. Furthermore, the student does not need a huge gym to exercise in; a limited amount of space is all that is necessary.

Taillie's beginner's course is a series of 23 postures. Depending on the exercise in T'ai Chi, the forms vary from 24 to 108 or more. The forms are named for the image created by their execution, such as "White stork displays its wings," and "Fall back and twist like monkey." All start from one of three stances: weight on rear foot, weight forward, and horse riding on oblique. In Taillie's advanced courses the student will complete all 104 positions, known as the "kata." Then he will go on to instruct pairs of students in the "push hands" technique.

If a student or faculty member partakes of Taillie's instruction, he is participating in a sport practiced in China as early as the third century. Taillie says T'ai Chi is a "traditional thing. I feel that the T'ai Chi I teach is connected to the Chinese families back to 300 A.D. I try to teach what my teachers have taught me." Potential T'ai Chi enthusiasts can call Peter Taillie at 1-301-479-3529.

Let's party our way through arena registration

The last two weeks have been full of memorable days here at Washington College. The first landmark achievement came when the water tower was emptied into the streets of Chestertown. Obviously the school was planning a lovely performance in honor of our namesake. Instead of Washington crossing the Delaware, we could have had Clint Baer crossing Route 213. Some of the townspeople were forced to climb on top of their gun racks in an effort to avoid that tidal wave o' fun.

My favorite part of this little activity involved the reactions of the fine gentleman who unleashed the gallons and gallons of water. One of the guys who flooded the campus actually muttered, "Whoops." Could he possibly have been surprised that happened? What did he think would be the result of poking a hole at the bottom of a full water tower? Apparently the flood was just another example of WC actually bursting at the seams with pride over our campus.

Brett Lankford

Still, the highlight of my week, possibly my semester, came this past Saturday. I went over to the gym to get a little exercise and pull a few muscles, but I was unable to get in to shoot some baskets. You know why? Because half of the freshman class was still sitting in the bleachers, waiting to get into arena registration.

O.K., I may be exaggerating a bit. I heard that all of the students were done by Friday night. That's beside the point. The fact is that the new arena registration plan that was supposed to work to perfection was just as much of a bust as other plans have been.

My theory is that this year's plan was invented just so security could get back at those students who have given them a hard time this year. Did you see the grin on Lenny's face as he told the students to move? He hadn't had that much fun since the security department played the game of "Pin The Tail on Spike."

Freshman Class President Gordy "Please, Oh Please, Don't Call Me Lettuce Head" Scherer was the mastermind behind the arena registration debacle. He spent most of the time trying to reassure everyone that the festivities were moving along splendidly. I'm sure the KA's spent their time in line thinking about what horrible things they can do to their pledge. I think this is the only time in my life I have actually been in favor of hazing.

Let's try to figure out what the problems were when it came to arena registration. It started to go wrong when Lenny began his fun and directed all of the juniors and seniors away from the side door and into a very long line up against the wall. Security's power trip continued when they made the students walk under a little yellow rope three different times while directing them up to the gym. I can only assume this was Lenny allowing the students to practice their limbo before learning how to do the lambada this Wednesday in the Coffee House.

With this move, arena registration was finally bringing back memories of the good old days—put all of the students in the gym and make sure no one knows what the hell is going on. Gordy, in an effort to scare us all into ending our complaints, threatened to sick Lenny on us. That shut me up in a hurry. Believe me, nothing scares me more that the idea of Lenny and the men of security using the crowd control tactics of the British police force. The mere thought of Spike packing a billy club is enough to make a grown man cringe.

I must admit that once Gordy and Lenny managed to make an announcement to let people in on what was going on, things seemed to move smoothly and efficiently. Eventually the only problem was trying to figure out how to get around the line for history classes and get out of the building.

I will now introduce a surefire solution to the problems of arena registration. Turn it into a party. Have all of the students get together in the gym at one time, and put some kegs o' beer in the middle of the floor. Have Gene Hamilton perform live. Allow the students to show off the lambada steps they will have learned by then. When it's time for the seniors to go in to register, have Gene walk up to the mike and announce "Seniors may go in." That way everyone will be there on time, everyone will be in a good mood, and everyone will know what's going on. I can only hope that Gordy will take note of my plan and implement it in time for next year. In the meantime, I'm going to start my new movement—to construct a giant statue of Tony Randall in the place where the water tower once stood.

Tennis loses to rival Swarthmore

by Greg Coss

The Washington College men's tennis team, currently ranked #3 in the nation, very easily could have been ranked number one in the nation by week's end had a few breaks gone their way in last Thursday's 6-3 loss to Swarthmore. Larry Gewer and Scott Read, the team's number one and two ranked players respectively, came through with big wins at the top of the lineup. Gewer ripped through the 12th ranked player in the country, Andy Mover in surprising fashion, 6-2,6-3. "I was playing with a lot of confidence and I'm feeling very fit as of late." said Gewer, "The key for me was to jump out ahead early because Andy and I know our games very well and what can happen if one shakes the other's confidence. Fortunately, I got ahead 4-1 and I never looked back."

Read also won his match, yet it was in much more difficult fashion. Read, ranked number three in the nation in singles behind teammate Larry Gewer and the defending national champion from Washington and Lee, won his first set against 14th ranked Steve Tignor easily, 6-2. He faltered in the second set, losing it 6-4, and then recovered to win the third 6-3. "It was the biggest match of the year," Read said, "and I knew that to have a chance to win we would have to at least split our six singles matches, so I knew I had to step up to the occasion."

Read and Gewer were both victorious, but the other four singles players were not as fortunate. Number five singles player Roman Inochovsky ran into a buzz saw in Andy Daly, falling 6-3,6-2. At number three singles, Peter Maller had two opportunities to serve for the second set and force a third in his match against Tom Cantire. He was unable to convert and lost 6-3,7-6(8-6). At number four, Scott Shepard was in a similar situation and could not quite pull it out. The singles players had nothing to be ashamed of, facing their toughest opponents since NAIA powerhouse Charleston College. Charleston was the only other team to defeat the 13-2 Shoremen this season, and will be going into Division I next fall.

The match that everyone, including Coach Wyman, called the turning point of the match was in #6 singles. Alberto Diaz, probably the year's brightest surprise, played a close match against Mark Levine. Washington was trailing 3-2 in singles when Diaz had won the first set in a tiebreaker. Levine won the second set 6-4, and it was 4-4 in the third set when the match turned. On a 3-3 point, Diaz called a shot of Levine's out, returning the ball to Levine. Levine caught the ball and then appealed for the lines judge for an overruling. The overruling was granted to him, automatically giving him the point and the game. Levine served out the set to win the match and give Swarthmore a big 4-2 cushion through singles play. "I told Alberto that he should not be upset with the call or feel like he let the team down." said Wyman. "Even if he wins that game, it doesn't necessarily mean he would have won the match. Alberto was upset, I know, but he's been such a bright spot all year and has surpassed all expectations of him, even though he is a tremendous player."

I asked coach Wyman what he told his players during the intermission before doubles play which found his netters needing to capture all three doubles matches to win the match. "Well, realistically, you really can't be too optimistic about your chances in a situation like that against the #2 team in the nation. But our doubles had been playing well all year, including bringing us from 4-2 down against American University. I kept them all optimistic with that reference."

The number two team in the nation, Read and Gewer, won their match 6-1,6-3 to close the gap to 4-3. Another chance went by the boards when Maller and Inochovsky lost their match. But by that time, Shepard and Diaz had lost to a very tough number three doubles team 6-4, 7-5, giving Swarthmore the win. The final match made the final match score 6-3, who could find themselves as the nation's number one one ranked team after previous #1 UC Santa Cruz was upset.

This Saturday, WC faces Rochester in a match which is crucial to both teams. If WC wins, they will be ranked #3 or #4 in the national tournament. A win for Rochester gets them into post season play and hurts Washington's seeding. Coach Wyman said, "I would like to see my boys resolved after the loss to Swarthmore and get ready to dig against Rochester. I'm looking to Larry for leadership for this team. Also, Scott, because players like this keep a win or loss in perspective and don't get hit with that Fat Cat Syndrome." What about WC's chance in the nationals, assuming they defeat #10 Rochester? "If everyone digs and we get good play from the lower seeds, we can beat anyone, " Wyman said. But first there's Rochester, and then look for WC to make some big waves in the national championships.

ARTS

Daniels directs Wilburs' "timeless" Phaedra

Richard Wilbur's translation of Racine's Phaedra will be performed under the direction of senior Drama major Ryder Daniels. The five-act play will be performed in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center Thursday thru Saturday at 8 PM. Reservations are not required. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

by Stephanie Hess

Senior drama major Ryder Daniels calls Jean Racine's play, Phaedra, "one of the most beautiful plays I have ever read." It is Phaedra that Daniels has chosen as his senior project. Daniels' production of the Richard Wilbur translation opens this Thursday, April 19 at 8 PM in Tawes Theater.

Phaedra is a tragedy in five acts and was written by Racine in 1677. The play tells the ancient Greek story of Phaedra, a woman who finds herself in love with her husband's son. In the introduction to his English translation of the play, Wilbur describes Phaedra as, "a woman of conscience who perceives and abhors the evil in herself and, with such strength as she has been given, strives against it."

In his translation, Wilbur, a former Poet Laureate of the United States, preserves the rhymed verse of the original text by replacing the French alexandrine with English pentameter.

The rhymed verse has, as Daniels points out, become "a tremendous obstacle" for both the actors and himself. There is the danger in the delivery of rhymed verse on stage that it will sound unnatural and more like sing-song. At the same time, if it is presented correctly, rhymed verse can sound uniquely beautiful.

Daniels chose the play not only for its beauty, but for its universal value, explaining, "In addition to its poetic beauty, Phaedra is timeless because it deals with the responsibility and expression of human feelings that we all have."

Remembering back to freshman year, Daniels recalls how he "arrived at Washington College wanting to do this for [his] senior obligation." He tells of "going back and forth all the time thinking it could and couldn't be done."

Of all the Phaedra translations, Daniels chose Wilbur's work because he believes that of all the translations, Wilbur's is "the closest English equivalent to the original Racinian structure."

An exciting highlight for Daniels and the cast occurred last weekend when Richard Wilbur, Pulitzer Prizewinner in Poetry (1957 and 1989), attended a rehearsal and offered comments on the progress of the production. Wright was on campus as a speaker for the dedication of the Constance Stuart Larrabee Creative Arts Center. Wright's presence at the rehearsal was advantageous because, as Daniels points out, Wilbur provides no pronunciation guide in his translation, and many of Wright's suggestions to Daniels and the cast included corrections of the actors' pronunciations of names and places.

The production of Phaedra is Daniels' second stint as a director; he directed Vinegar Tom in his sophomore year.

When asked what he learned from the earlier production that has helped him with Phaedra, Daniels replies, "Vinegar Tom helped me understand the hard work involved in taking a show from auditions to opening night." According to Daniels, seeing a production through those steps "requires dedication, commitment and energy. Essentially those things that we don't have time for while we are in college."

The cast includes: Wendy Kloiber as Phaedra; Clay Eichelberger as her husband, the King of Athens; John McDanolds as Hippolytus, the son of Theseus; Carey Smith as Aricia; Carl Pupa as Theramenes, Hippolytus' tutor; Cindy Croot as Oenene, Phaedra's nurse; Lisa Woodcock as Ismene; Jennifer Griffin as Panope; and Kyndra Ponder, Karyn Iacangelo, Roxanne Seubert, Chris Spezio, Jason Imber and Jason West as gods and guards.

The production is stage managed by Deidre Riegel with Peter Johnson as Assistant Stage Manager, and Jennifer Eisberg is the Dramaturg. Musical Composition is by Michael Tyson, and Cindy Croot is designing costumes.

Phaedra will be performed Thursday, April 19 through Saturday, April 21. Performances begin at 8 PM in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Reservations are not required.

Student music recital showcases WC talent

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

WC's Music Department presents its annual Student Recital, featuring both students and faculty, Wednesday afternoon at 4 PM in the Norman James Theater.

Garry Clarke, Chair of the Music Department predicts the concert to be an enjoyable one, adding, "There are some good performers in the group."

Performing a piano solo is Michael Tyson, followed by saxophone soloist Andrew Chandler. Greg Hickman, flutist and oboist, contributes to the recital in a flute sonata and two Vivaldi concertos. Also on flute is Renee King, performing both as a soloist and an ensemble member.

Students participating in the recital are not only those enrolled in the applied music class, but include some who play in ensembles as a hobby.

According to Clarke, "It's always a varied program of vocal and instrumental works." This year, the recital's vocals will be provided by soprano Laura Hopper in an aria from a Haydn opera.

Faculty members Elizabeth and Amzie Parcell, along with Clarke, will perform a selection. Also scheduled for the program are works by composers Poulenc, Bartok and Milhaud.

As Clarke explains, "This is a chance to come and hear students who have been working hard on their instruments." Admission to the recital is free, and the public is welcome.

Campus calendar: April 13-19

Daniels, who is worked through the President's Office, made the accepted proposal on behalf of the student resident assistants here because he serves as the head RA. He actually offered two proposals to the administration to bring the Resident Assistant program at Washington College back to the level of excellence that it enjoyed in 1982 when the school's program "lead the way for many other undergraduate and graduate schools on the East Coast of the United States."

According to Daniels', the program has "become outdated in 1990."

The first proposal offered was to have the RA stipend "increase annually as a percentage of the room and board costs" for that year. Had the school continued to offer the 48% that it offered in 1983, the RA salary today would equal $2112—nearly $800 more than the amount that they currently receive.

Daniels points out that if the school had, at a minimum, given the RAs a 5.5% annual increase like the rest of the school staff, then they would still receive a $1750 salary. The first proposal points out that, although the school would not be a leader in the Resident Assistant programs, it would "adequately rectify the current stipend's inconsistency."

The second proposal, and the one received most favorably and which was accepted by the administration, is modeled after the resident assistant programs at schools such as Yale, Harvard, George Mason, Johns Hopkins, and the University of Maryland. At these schools, the RA positions are considered non-paying because the students do not receive a check from the school. Instead, the RA's receive a "room and board waiver."

Daniels cites the policy at Western Maryland College, which he said "leads the way in Resident Hall advising." Currently, the undergraduate RAs at Western Maryland do not pay for the room that they live in as the RA. They also pay a portion of the board plan and they receive a stipend of $600 to $1000. The salary level depends upon the experience of the RA and of what dormitory they are in charge.

The proposal also points out that, should the school adopt the room and board waiver plan to compensate RAs, it would save about $41,000 a year in salaries. Daniels states that the program would also serve to make RA's more equal because the $600-$1000 they would receive would truly serve as compensation instead of some students turning around and putting their RA check toward the cost of the room and board at Washington College.

Daniels' proposal has been approved by the President's office and will begin to be implemented next year. The RA salaries will increase to 44% of next year's room and board costs—an increase of more than 14% over this year's salary. The level of compensation would increase annually until RA's received a waiver for the cost of room and board. The plan should be fully implemented within the next few years.

leases on apartments for next year are not exempt from the policy. Freshmen who have already made arrangements to live off campus should speak with McIntire.

Seniors have never actually been guaranteed singles by the College, but McIntire said a senior requesting a single will most likely get one.

The new policy is by no means the last word on the housing situation at Washington College. McIntire says the College realizes that the number of off-campus students this year might not, in fact, be the beginnings of a trend towards a commuter college.

The Board is not willing, however, to take that chance. The policy will be under observation in the coming year, and could be revised for next year's housing policy.

Tuition

was very lengthy. All college departments were sent a directive from the Board of Visitors and Governors that required them to hold their support budgets at their current levels. Only increases in budgets that were necessary in order to prevent program jeopardy were reviewed.

Other costs, however, couldn't be ignored. The government regulation that hazardous material be removed, retirement and health insurance program increases, and increased food and utility costs, proved costly to the College.

Faculty salaries were also a main point in the increase of tuition. "We could not, however, ignore or defer our ongoing commitment to maintain salaries at a level which enables the College to attract and retain first-rate faculty and staff," said President Cater in the letter to parents and students dated April 5 of last year.

There is no word as to whether the costs of tuition, room, and board will continue to increase as they have repeatedly the past two years. Despite the increases, however, Washington College still ranks as a 'best buy' in the New York Times assessment of college costs.

Break In

At approximately 9:10 PM this Tuesday April 10, Washington College Security discovered that Dunning Hall had been broken into.

The individual forced entry was into two faculty offices with an attempt to break into a third office.

Four textbooks were stolen. Other damages or losses have not as yet been assessed.

The incident is currently under investigation. Anyone with information should contact Jerry Roderick, Director of Security.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Did you know that Americans eat more cheddar cheese that any other variety of cheese? Unfortunately, it's one of the highest-fat cheeses.

Seventy-four of the 114 calories in an ounce are contributed by fat.

Next Wednesday, April 18th, the WCDS will have "Carnival Night" as it's dinner theme. Dinner will be served outside (hear that Mother Nature) in the walk lane between the hill dorms and Hodson Hall. The entire event was planned by our two work-study students, Otis Monroe, a senior from Queen Anne's County High School and Angela Bowden, a senior from Kent County High School. So, don't forget the date, Wednesday, April 18th. Come to dinner and I promise you will have a great time.

Many of you who attended this past Wednesday's dinner commented favorably to the Frozen Yogurt Bar. I am glad you enjoyed the different flavors. I won't promise that we will be able to serve frozen yogurt on a regular basis this semester, but we will see what can be done for next semester.

Well, that's it for this week. MOM

SCANDAL

The movie reconstructs the Profumo affair—the sex scandal that helped bring down Harold Macmillan's Conservative government in the early sixties. Director Michael Caton-Jones constructs a documentary apparatus around the scandal, with newsreels thrown in, and at the center is the strange, non-sexual love affair between teenage party girl Christine Keeler (Joanne Whalley-Kilmer) and her discoverer/ patron Dr. Stephen Ward (John Hurt). Hurt, as the wordly man who brings Christine out and introduces her to powerful men, gives Ward superb manners and qualities prized by the powerful—sympathy, usefulness and a boundless devotion to their pleasures. He never actually sleeps with Christine, and the movie's point of view is that Christine and Stephen's sweet nuzzling on the couch makes them innocent—more sinned against than sinning. The great actor Ian McKellen plays the hapless Profumo.

SGA holds meeting, President Cater attends

by Kyndra Ponder

President Douglass Cater, in his address to the Student Government Association, made some parting remarks to the students of Washington College. He began the meeting by saying that the next SGA "faced the most important challenge" because it would serve during the transition of the presidency of the College.

In his presentation to the student representatives, Cater asked that students next year "take an extra step to make President Trout feel welcome here," adding that during the next year, it will take the "best efforts of the President, faculty, administration and students to make WC what it can be."

Cater pointed out that the main job of the new president will be to build up the endowment of the College. Even though WC is in the top 25 percent of schools in the nation regarding the percentage of alumni who contribute to the College, Cater indicated that Trout will need to concentrate on seeing that contributions are made for student scholarships.

Expressing regret over not having gotten the chance to know the students at Washington College better, Cater said that his travels for the school kept him from being the kind of college president who could be found "sitting on the benches" outside of the Dining Hall. He then opened the floor to questions from the students about college policy.

SGA President Stuart Neiman began the round of questions by addressing two issues that are of concern to many students: arena registration and the controversial 12 to 1 student/faculty ratio. Cater responded that of all of the classes planned for next year, 44 have fewer than five students registered. He suggested that "one way to get a better faculty ratio would be to raise tuition." Upon questioning about the inclusion of library faculty in the ratio, Cater defended the school's practice, making the point that other schools determine their ratio in the identical manner and that the three tenured faculty who are considered in the ratio do not appreciably change it.

Former Treasurer Joe Van Name suggested that in order to improve the ratio, professors should be added in vital areas where classes always seem to be full—history, English, economics and biology.

Dorm senator Sean Murphy mentioned the idea of having a floating faculty which would help in departments where there are crunches.

In regard to the issue of arena registration, Cater agreed that the idea is "a farce" and will be changed next year.

Cater ended his address to the SGA with the announcement of a $350,000 grant from the Hodson Trust for a new program to reward deserving sophomores. The junior fellows program would reward sophomores who have worked hard during their first two years. of college with money to participate in outside fields of interest with financial support from the school. This idea will be implemented instead of a previously suggested program which would have provided full tuition merit-based scholarships to high-ranking freshmen. The total money raised for the Junior Fellows program has reached $720,000.

Students look forward to studying abroad

by Susie Mazzullo

Six Washington College students have been chosen to participate in next year's Junior Year Abroad. They are junior Kathleen Feeney, and sophomores Troy Petenbrink, James Finlay, Kate Absher, Debbie Johnson, and Sharon Bonner.

According to Dean Lucille Sansing, Associate Dean of Washington College, Petenbrink, Feeney, and Finlay will be pursuing their studies at Manchester College in Oxford while Absher, Johnson, and Bonner will be attending St. Andrews in Scotland.

. Students who wish to go abroad may apply through one of two processes. The first process deals with Manchester College and St. Andrews, institutions which are formally affiliated with Washington College. Students may apply to either institution through Washington College while, through the second process, the student must apply individually to other schools for the study abroad program.

Student selection for Manchester and St. Andrews is done internally by a selection committee consisting of both Washington College faculty and administration. Sansing, Elizabeth Baer, Provost and Dean of the

On Tuesday April 17, the International House sponsored a talk givent by Mario Molina, a chemist from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, lectured on "Green Tips for a Blue Earth." Students, faculty, and a number of members of the Chestertown community gathered together to discuss the existing and potential recycling programs. Industrial company involvement was also discussed in terms of conservation and their role in public awareness.

EDITORIAL

The ratio rage continues...

In his latest letter to The Elm, Douglass Cater poses a challenge to the editor: "let us link arms to raise funds for the endowment of additional faculty," his argument seeming to be that since we are both leaving Washington College at the end of the year, we ought not to let Mr. Trout bear the burden of both of our shortcomings.

Let me respond.

First of all, President Cater is mistaken when he assumes that I will be leaving the College after this year; being a rising senior, I plan to stick around.

Second, Mr. Cater implies that I'm naive and unconstructive in my charges. Let me make my position clear. I know that money often comes with strings, that some donors will donate bricks and only bricks. But can't some smart fundraiser at this college convince a donor to help fill the need for more faculty? Isn't it true that not one additional permanent faculty position has been added since 1982—even as enrollment has increased? Is this a case of lack of funds, or of skewed priorities? Do we need the new Lifetime Fitness Center more than we need more faculty?

Third, I reject Mr. Cater's suggestion that I take up fundraising in my spare time. That was his job, not mine. My job, apart from working toward a degree in English, is to speak for students as best I can in the capacity of editor-in-chief.

Finally, I will continue to disobey zealously "the iron law of arithmetic" which compels Mr. Cater to chant the 12 to 1 mantra, which means absolutely nothing to those of us in over-enrolled classes and others of us who are closed out of classes.

Perhaps the next president, Charles Trout, will be more responsive to the students' most urgent current concerns.

THE READER WILL NOTICE THAT MR. CATER MAKES A REFERENCE TO the iron law of arithmetic REGARDING THE 12 to 1 RATIO BETWEEN STUDENTS & TEACHERS IN CLASS...
GOSH, I AM CONFUSED... IN MY LAST CLASS I COUNTED 43,000,000 STUDENTS! I SURE WISH I KNEW HOW THE RATIO SYSTEM WORKS!
YES!! YES!! THAT IS VERY TRUE AND IN THE CASE OF A 12:1 STUDENT TEACHER RATIO HERE WE MAY MEAN ANY NUMBER OF THINGS. FOR EXAMPLE IN THE CLASS 12 STUDENTS OUT OF 30 MAY BE DRUNK, WHERE 1 PROF. IS ALSO TIPSY; OR 12 STUDENTS & 1 PROF. FALL ASLEEP IN CLASS WHILE EVERYONE ELSE LEAVES; OR 12 STUDENTS OUT OF 43,000,000 LISTEN TO THE LECTURES GIVEN ANY ONE DAY WHILE 1 PROF. OUT OF 1,000 LISTENS TO HIS/HER OWN LECTURE ALSO; OR...
WELL AT FIRST GLANCE RATIOS MAY SEEM A BIT CONFOUNDING, BUT AS IN ANY SYSTEM ONE MUST FIRST UNDERSTAND THE TERMS......

Letters to the Editor

Cater issues fundraising challenge

To the Editor:

In the latest editorial, The Elm editor chose to ignore my challenge to identify another college with a better student/teacher ratio and a lower tuition. Now I offer another challenge: since we both are departing Washington College this summer, let us link arms to raise funds for the endowment of additional faculty. Otherwise, we will be guilty of passing on indebtedness to those who come after us.

The editor rebels against the iron law of arithmetic ("The 12 to 1 ration is merely a myth"). Perhaps she will acknowledge another ratio that has prevailed so far: The student enrolled at Washington College paying full tuition and fees – and not receiving College financial assistance – still contributes only two of every three dollars to the operating budget. That third dollar must come from generous and enthusiastic alums and other patrons. We should bear this fact in mind as we embark on our fundraising mission.

Sincerely,
Douglass Cater

Keehan wins NCAA scholarship

To the Editor:

The award of an NCAA post-graduate scholarship to Tim Keehan is a tribute to a truly fine young man. Tim has received one of only ten awards given nationwide to basketball players in all three NCAA divisions. I have personally enjoyed working with Tim in the Faculty Athletic Committee where he has been a thoughtful participant, a good listener, and an articulate spokesman for student-athletes. The award is an affirmation of our approach at Washington College – it says it is possible to excel and be noticed athletically when the first priority is, should be, and will continue to be, academics. Congratulations to Tim, his teammates, his coaches, and his professors.

Sincerely,
Rosette M. Roat

Angry mud gods?

Dear Editor of Thy Most Esteemed Newspaper of the Wac:

I have a question. If there are so many sidewalks already in existence on this campus, and Bob's Backhoe is adding more, why must we slosh through them almost every day? What do they do? Dredge the Chester River and dump the silt on campus? The only answer I've been able to come up with is that the Administration possibly angered the mud gods.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/ her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

OPINION

ISSUE: Should freshmen and sophomores be required to live on campus?

Only freshmen should be required to live in dorms

Shawn Shults

I think that freshman should be required to live on campus for both semesters. Dorm life socializes freshmen. It allows them to become familiar with Washington College and what it has to offer. If you don't live on campus your first year, at least, it is hard to find out abut the available resources. It is also much more difficult to make friends here, as a freshman, if you don't live in the dorms. Classes do not provide the best opportunities to make friends. Living on campus freshman year can make the adjustment to college a little easier. It can also enhance the college experience. For me, living on campus my freshman year made college more rewarding. If freshmen don't try dorm life, then they can't make an informed decision about living off-campus.

Sophomores, on the other hand, should not be required to live on campus. They are people who have experienced living on campus and, for their own personal reasons, have decided not to do so. They have, or should I say had, the right to do this. Forcing them to live in a dorm takes away some of the independence they acquired by going away to college.

One of the main reasons the College is doing this is for the money. With all of the empty or half full dorms rooms this year, they must have lost quite a bit of expected income. Instead of forcing students to live on campus, they should work on making dorm life more attractive.

Take Queen Anne and Caroline dorms (both are dorms that house mostly freshmen and sophomores) for example. The rooms are nothing but four cement walls. There is no carpet on the floors of the hallways, and the bathroom facilities are ancient. The housekeepers do their best to keep it clean, neat and spruced up, but there is only so much you can do with the dorms. Relatives who come to visit are often appalled that we spend this much money to live in such a dreary place. I notice that room costs went up again for next year. I wonder if their appearance will improve as a result.

Another reason that the College may have made this requirement concerns the attitude of the students toward the campus. Students just aren't involved in life at the College as they used to be. Many people living on campus go home for the weekend regularly, or go to off-campus parties. Campus involvement just isn't that strong anymore. The solution to this problem isn't an easy one to find. However, forcing students to live on campus surely won't solve it. This requirement is going to elicit anger from sophomores who want to live off-campus. You cannot force someone to live somewhere and then expect them to be happy about it. You also cannot force students to get involved in life at WC. They have to want to do that. Perhaps making all aspects of campus life more attractive will solve the problem.

Regardless of any solutions to the residential problems of the College, sophomores have had the dorm experience and are old enough to make and informed decision abut where they want to live. It is unfair for the College to make this decision for them.

CAMPUS VOICES by Amy L. Undercoffler

It was always my understanding that freshmen were already required to live on campus. By requiring sophomores as well, the administration is only covering the surface of the larger problem, which is lack of excitement in campus life.

Fred Connolly

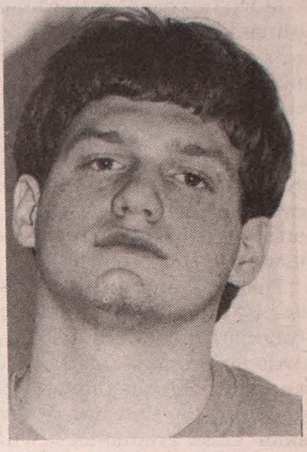
As an Economics major I see the administration solving a campus housing surplus problem by requiring students to live on campus. Why not make campus living better meet students needs so they will want to live on campus?



Brian Heubeck
Bel Air, MD
Sophomore

Not all Freshman and Sophomores are directly out of high school, so I think if you are responsible enough and have lived independently in a house before, I don't think you are required to live in the dorms.

Tanya Cunic
Denville, NJ
Freshman

No. Part of college is discovering one's own limitations and responsibilities. The administration should not be allowed to regulate when and where one lives in order to insure these responsibilities are met according to their own standards.

Mindy Stark
Towson, MD
Junior

Yes, I think it should be required for underclassman to live on campus because that is a major part of their college experience.

Cathy Smithmyer
Queenstown, MD
Senior

I think it is unreasonable to expect all freshmen and sophomores to live on campus. Many students who find more affordable housing off campus would experience financial difficulties if they had to live on campus.

Board should have sought student input before making decision

Kyndra Ponder

When I found out that the Board of Visitors and Governors had voted to make it mandatory for all freshmen and sophomores to live on campus, I was, at best, only half-enthused. I think that this can be a good idea, because on-campus living is an important of a college experience and that everyone should spend at least one year in a dorm room. However, I don't think that the Board should try to force anything on students.

I am most offended by the Board's obvious disregard for the opinions of the students. At NO TIME in the decision process, were students asked for their input. In a situation that will affect students so dramatically, I would think that students would—or at least, should—be contacted and their input should be given consideration before a final decision is made.

In addition, I think that one of the main reasons that students choose to go away to college is grow-up—to learn to make important decisions on their own. The Board took that chance away from students because it essentially became a new set of parents who dictate orders about decisions that students should be allowed to make for themselves.

While I am upset at the manner in which the Board of Visitors and Governors handled the situation, I must agree with them on one point, on-campus living provides a richer experience for students.

I have had the opportunity to experience both aspects of college life— living off-campus and living on-campus. I can truthfully say that I have grown more this year that I have lived in a dorm than I did last year when I lived off-campus. I have also had the chance to experience having a roommate, co-ed bathrooms and the Heineken Party without worrying how I will drive home afterwards.

All during last year, when I commuted to school every day, I wanted to have a room on campus. I wanted to be a part of the school and I didn't feel like I was able to do that by living off campus. Granted, I lived 45 miles away from school, so even driving in for class was an inconvenience. Unfortunately, it was especially inconvenient for other things. I never got the chance to go to sporting events at the school. I skipped most of the parties too, just because I had to drive so far to get home. By living off-campus, I really felt like my first year of college was nothing more than a continuation of high school—just a little harder.

When I transferred here, I was glad to have the chance to live on campus. My experience here this year has been dramatically different from my off-campus time last year. I am here— in the middle of everything. My day doesn't end when classes are over and I am not limited to participating in things just because they are going on when I am here. I have gotten a lot more out of being around school this year.

I really think that all students should have the opportunity to have the experience to live on-campus. Dorm life is completely different from life off-campus and I think that everyone should have the chance to experience it during at least one of their four years in college. I just don't think that anyone— including parent, or members of the Board of Visitors and Governors should force them to.

No easy answers to the Lithuanian question

By Laura Hopper

Much has been written about Lithuania and Gorbachev. There are people who think and say that Lithuania should return peacefully to the Soviet fold. There are people who think and say the Lithuanians should stand up for what they believe in and truly desire, freedom. One thing is perfectly clear, there are no easy answers to this problem.

The next month will be the test. By an estimate of the Deputy Prime Minister, Lithuania can survive an economic blockade for one month. So something should happen by the time our current senior class graduates. What happens after one month? What happens when food becomes scare and fuel is nonexistent? The government in Moscow already reduced fuel supplies to the Baltic States in December.

Maybe in this story there is a parallel with China. Is China an example of what happens to a totalitarian regime when they attempt to modernize the economy without changing the political system? Is the Soviet Union an example of what happens when a totalitarian regime attempts to modernize its political system so it can change the economy.

It is easy for us here to say the Baltic States, along with Georgia, Azerbaijan and the rest of the republics should wait five years, ten years for their independence. It is not easy for them to wait, because, in a way some have been waiting since after the revolution. Following the initial Soviet reaction to the Lithuania declaration of independence, both Latvia and Estonia announced they would seek to break away gradually from the Soviet Union. Even that is unacceptable to the Soviets.

It is easy to draw parallels between the situation in the Soviet Union, and the situation in the United States prior to the civil war. But remember, the Estonians, Lithuanians, Latvians, Azerbaijanis, Armenians, etc all speak different languages. Many of the republics have competing and antagonistic religions. An Azerbaijani thinks of himself as an Azerbaijani first, not a Soviet citizen. If the US was a nation comprised of 50 little countries with linguistic and cultural differences, the parallel would be far more accurate.

So where is there middle ground? The Soviets seem unwilling to create three little Finlands, complete with special trade agreements. The Baltic States seem unwilling to back down. And the US does nothing.

It must be a difficult choice for President Bush. Since 1945, no US government has recognized Soviet domination of these, yes, tiny states. But now open support by the US of the Lithuanian government could topple Gorbachev and send the Soviet Union spinning into a civil war. This is not what price victory, but what price Gorbachev.

True, many parts of the Soviet Union have never known democracy or capitalism. Yes, these little republics will have a hard time surviving and catching up with the western world. The free world the Baltic states now yearn to be part of is light years away from the one they were part of.

In the end, what ever happens will effect Gorbachev, and Bush, and whomever follows behind them. Change will come to the Soviet Union, it is a question of when.

What Americans are following in the news

By John Omicinski

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network.

WASHINGTON – Faced with a continuing rush of news from overseas, Americans are most captivated by events in the Soviet Union and least interested in Central America and South Africa, a Gannett News Service poll shows.

Almost half – 49 percent – of the nearly 1,000 Americans polled said they were "very interested" in news of Mikhail Gorbachev and the Soviet Union. But the figure trails off to only about one-third who said they were keenly interested in South African or Nicaraguan events.

Eastern Europe and Panama, for most, fell somewhere in the middle.

Yet, 70 percent of blacks are "very interested" in South Africa. Conversely, 51 percent of whites were "very interested" in Soviet news, compared to 30 percent among blacks.

"The Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, is news with a human face," said Robert Hurd, a pollster for Gordon Black Corp., which conducted the poll for Gannett News Service. "That wasn't true for Nicaragua. For your average Joe, Daniel Ortega just didn't resonate, and people never got stirred up about the Contras.

"As for South Africa, we see that it's very immediate for blacks, and not so much for whites."

Foreign news triggers fascination and suspicion in many Americans.

"We grew up in the Cold War and were always looking over our shoulders," said poll respondent Beverly Walker, 41, of Kansas City, Mo. "You wonder if something's really happening or if there's something sneaky going on.

"Gorbachev's got charisma, but I'm suspicious of people with charisma – they usually have something to hide."

Generally, men took a greater interest in the tidal wave of news from abroad. About 55 percent said they were "very interested" in it, as opposed to 43 percent of women.

There also was a correlation between a person's wealth and interest in foreign affairs. Of those earning $50,000 or more annually, 65 percent said they were "very interested" in world events. Meanwhile, only 36 percent of those making $15,000 or less said they were "very interested."

Those between 35 and 54 seemed to have the biggest appetite for overseas news – 53 percent said they were "very interested," compared to 45 percent among those 18 to 34.

Americans' interest in European and Soviet news has connections to the century's hot and cold wars.

"I guess it's because I'm a retired Navy chief that I'm most interested in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe," said Vincent Konsavage, 51, of Jacksonville, Florida. "I'm attuned to the military aspect, the military threat. South Africa's further down the list. It's an internal situation."

Edmund Digre, 67, of Hendricks, Minnesota., a World War II veteran, pays attention to East European and Soviet news "because it all seems too good to be true – I remember how Hitler fooled a lot of people.

"We've had no direct involvement in South Africa," he said. "And as for Central America, I'm suspicious. It's hard to know what the CIA has going on down there."

"I spent three years in Europe," said Jimmie Garner, 57, of Arlington, Arizona., "so I usually read the articles about that part of the world. Sure looks like communism is a little bit of history now.

"As for Nicaragua and Panama, I don't pay much attention. I shouldn't say it, but it seems like a whole bunch of sugar-plantation dictators down there.

"I don't pay a whole lot of attention to South Africa, either. I watched what was happening in Ethiopia till I realized it was all political and there was enough food over there to feed half of Europe, but they wouldn't get it to the people."

To many, events in South Africa seem to have less immediate impact on the United States.

"European news just seems to have more interest to most people who have a European background," said Donald Carver, 23, a service engineer from Manheim, Pa., who said his interest is waning.

"It's kind of turned me off in the last couple of weeks. I'm ready to let them take care of themselves for a while," he said.

But again, South Africa held more interest for blacks polled:

– Willis Branch, 41, a Sugarland, Texas, computer services manager, said he has been closely watching South African events since the 1970s because of similarities to the experiences of blacks in the United States.

"What's happening in South Africa is stronger than anything that happened in the United States," said Branch, "but it's sort of a mirror of society in the United States."

– Kathleen Dunn, 40, a nurse from Dayton, Ohio, commented: "Right now, South Africa looks like it's splitting into three different parts – the whites, those who follow (Nelson) Mandela and that other man (Mangosuthu Buthelezi).

"Seems like the whole country will blow apart in a civil war."

The March 9 telephone poll of 923 people has a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

News from around the world: bus shooting

UNITED STATES:

A study of the short term effects of Ibuprofen at Johns Hopkins has shown that the drug can cause kidney failure in people who have mild kidney disease. In an editorial, two scientists are urging the Food and Drug Administration to place stronger warning labels on Ibuprofen products.

Ibuprofen, marketed under the names Advil, Motrin, Nuprin, and Medipren, was approved for non-prescription forms in 1985. Sales of Ibuprofen pain relievers account for 20% of the annual $2.5 billion sales of over-the-counter pain relievers.

Ibuprofen relieves pain by interfering with the body's production of an inflammatory agent, prostaglandin, but also constricts blood flow. This caused reversible kidney failure in test subjects. The scientists are urging stronger warning labels on Ibuprofen products, and further testing.

In Columbus, a striking Greyhound worker was arrested in connection with the shooting of a Greyhound bus. The bus, en route from Columbus to Cincinnati, was hit by three shots, but none of the 29 passengers were hurt. On Monday, a Greyhound bus en route between Nashville and Birmingham was shot at, but the shot missed and no one was injured.

LITHUANIA:

Lithuanian Prime Minister Kazimera Prunskiene stated that the Lithuanian legislature is willing to compromise on several issues; among them allowing people living in the republic to retain their Soviet citizenship, and protecting the rights off all people living on Lithuanian soil. Lithuania, according to Prunskiene, would also allow young men to voluntarily serve in the Red Army, and the Lithuanian Communist Party would seek a compromise in property disputes with the national (Soviet) Communist Party.

Prunskiene called an economic blockade "a cold, and very harsh war against the people of Lithuania." Gorbachev threatened an economic blockade against the Lithuanians last week, if the republic did not rescind several laws that violate the Soviet constitution. (Lithuania's declaration of independence is not among them.) Gorbachev gave the republic until Monday, at which point supplies, such as oil and gas, would be cut off. Prunskiene remarked that she saw no shortages of any goods beyond the shortages common in the Soviet system.

Moscow claims the Lithuanian declaration of independence ignores the rights of Polish, Russian, and other ethnic minorities. Lithuania claims the 3 Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia were illegally incorporated into the Soviet Union in 1940. Deputy Prime Minister Romualdus Ozolas announced Tuesday that Lithuania and Estonia have appointed and exchanged ambassadors. Ozolas also urged the Lithuanian people not to panic and to avoid hoarding. Ozolas said the republic can withstand an economic blockade for a month.

NEPAL:

King Birenda of Nepal has asked the Nepali Congress Party to form a government. Earlier, Birenda dissolved the national assembly and announced the resignation of the 10 day old government of Prime Minister Lokendra Bahedur Chand.

The Nepali Congress Party and the 7 party United Left Front have been responsible for nationwide pro-democracy demonstrations in Nepal since February. It was after police opened fire on demonstrators that the King agreed to lift the 29 year old ban on political parties. Under the present system, the King holds all executive, legislative and judicial powers.

The Nepali Congress Party and the United Left Front have expressed hopes that the King wishes to make Nepal a constitutional monarchy. The two groups are demanding multiparty elections and a new constitution.

The head of the new government, Krishna Prasad Bhattari, said his first priorities would be improving the economy and relations with India, a neighbor of Nepal.

NICARAGUA:

In Honduras, 260 contras laid down their weapons to UN troops. The weapons were then destroyed by a platoon of Venezuelan paratroopers under UN command.

In Nicaragua, the government of Violetta Chamorro is scheduled to take power in a week. While other contra disarmament ceremonies, such as the one in Honduras, are planned, many contra units within Nicaragua continue to skirmish with Sandinista patrols in the northern and central regions of the country. Current president Daniel Ortega, whose Sandinista group lost the election to Chamorro's National Opposition Union in February, warned that the active contra units in Nicaragua are jeopardizing a peaceful government transition, "We are very close to peace, and very close to war."

Since the election of Chamorro, 6000 contras have returned to Nicaragua from bases in Honduras. The demobilization of the contras is being overseen by ONUCA (the UN observer force for Central America). ONUCA is to set up security zones within Nicaragua. Demobilized contras will return to these zones by an unspecified date in accordance with an agreement between the contras and Chamorro's advisors.

Students rejuvenate the Chestertown movie theater

by Amanda Burt

Every Tuesday is now two-dollar college night at the Chestertown Movie Theater. In an effort to spark new interest in the family-run theater, business major Vince Maximo instituted this new program for his senior obligation. The idea of making the theater a more integral part of Chestertown was first presented to Washington College's Business Department by the Downtown Chestertown Association. After speaking with his advisor, Dr. Wierda, Maximo elected to work with the theater.

He then met with Mrs. Prince, the owner of the theater who was unavailable for comment, to discuss the possible ways of renewing interest in the establishment. The problem lay in that there are an extra 800 people in Chestertown during the school year who do not attend the theater. The general feeling among students is that the theater is essential for this area, but often people will head to see more recent movies at the bigger malls, such as Dover.

Furthermore, there is always the possibility of videos, and even then there is a wait for recent movies. And videos in the home do not create the theater experience.

Problems with vandalism (a mirror had been damaged along with a bathroom sink), loud noise in the theater, and teenagers sneaking past the ticket booth also detract adults from going to the theater. "A family might come to the theater and see a group of teenagers hanging around outside, and wouldn't want to go in," Maximo comments.

Realizing that there is income potential in the college community, Maximo and Prince decided that they would install a two-dollar college night, running every Tuesday. The first night was not successful, and Maximo says that part of it "had to do with the movies that were playing."

In order to get a First Run Release, a movie theater must pay $3,000 and usually guarantee six weeks playing time. This makes it difficult for small establishments like the Chestertown Movie Theater to both obtain recent releases and compete with larger malls. But Maximo and Prince have succeeded in acquiring several new releases, such as Driving Miss Daisy, Always and Born on the Fourth of July. The Tuesday night that Always played, 25 of the 27 people present were students.

"Since Mrs. Prince's theater is part of the DC metropolitan area, we would see what movies were playing each week and then decide which one might be the best to play," explains Maximo. The theater played Born on the Fourth of July before the Academy Awards and Driving Miss Daisy after, a combination which proved successful, as the theater was able to keep Driving Miss Daisy for one more week.

Part of the success of college night is due to bouncer and ticket-taker Peter Hagen, employed by Prince at the recommendation of Maximo. Hagen says he works the first show, and part of the second show if there is a decent turnout. He has helped to keep the theater under control, and Maximo notes that "things have been quieter" since Hagen has been working at the theater. He recently helped to stifle an incident where the police had to be called because of a loud adolescent.

Hagen also comments on the success of college night, saying that "after the Academy Awards, there were 85 college students present to see Driving Miss Daisy in the theater, holding a capacity of 225 people." College Night can also help the movie theater if, by cutting the ticket prices in half, more people come. This in turn would generate some profit. He continues to state that "the better movies have helped the theater to gain recognition." As ticket-taker and bouncer, Hagen has noticed an increase of older people present at the movies.

Senior Citizens' Night is yet another program added to the theater. It occurs every Monday night, and advertisements for it run weekly in The Kent County News.

College Night will continue at the Chestertown Movie Theater after Maximo graduates. Even though his thesis was accepted, Maximo continues to work for the theater as a volunteer. He hopes the program will become popular enough so that posting flyers advertising College Night will not be necessary. High-cost advertising is not possible in the family-run theater, and as a result there is more dependency on word of mouth.

Maximo observes that people have begun to look at the theater in a new light, and the installation of the programs have helped to "raise the profile of the theater in the community and in the college. Revenue was never really the point." He also thinks the theater has ultimately improved since Mrs. Prince has taken control of the theater.

"It was with the permission of Mrs. Prince," Maximo says, "and her willingness to allow the school to use her facility, that all of this was possible. The experience was both enlightening and worthwhile. I've learned a lot about the Movie Industry."

Slice comments upon the women's softball season

As the weather warms up and one begins to yearn for worthwhile outdoor activities, I would like to suggest a trek across the footbridge, over the railroad tracks to the exciting, addictive game of Division III women's softball. All it takes is one game to get hooked and soon you'll be counting the minutes between home games. How do I know these girls are so fun and exciting to watch? I know, I've seen 'em practice. Opponents become another victim to the wrath of Sho'women softball. While these scrappy girls are presently engaged in a "knock down, drag out" season, I would like to introduce some of these modern day wonder women forming a foundation for the team, stronger than the rock of Gibraltar.

There are, in the first place, the senior co-captains of this school's female version of the '27 Yankees: Sharon Orser and Tracey Coleman. Sharon is the defensive stalwart anchoring the left side of the infield. "Little O's" stellar play at the "hot corner" has thwarted many players to hit the ball away from her.

Phil "Slice" Macek

Truth be told, the Orioles contacted Sharon a few seasons back with the hopes she would solve their perplexing third base problems caused by the departures of Brooks Robinson and Doug DeCinces. Indeed, Cal Ripken, the all-star shortstop of the Orioles, was quoted as saying, "Sharon's crafty glovework would certainly take the pressure off of me on defense. She is definitely a blue-chip pro prospect and I'll be overwhelmed with joy when she is finally wearing an Oriole uniform."

Tracey, for her part, takes a back seat to nobody when it comes to playing the field. She plays first base with the precision of a neurosurgeon.

Whether she is guarding the line, charging a bunt, or handling relays from the outfield, Tracey's knowledge of the game makes her an invaluable cog in Coach Fall's championship caliber softball machine. Tracey's offensive skills are not to be overlooked either. Her deftness with the bat makes her a definite stand-out in the line-up. Overall, the sure-handedness and quality of Sharon and Tracey's play make them the perfect leaders for this team as it marches on to the title. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

At second base, stands a stranger to making errors, Jill "Wheels" Reppert. "Wheels" is so quick it is like having two people at second base. Jill's exceptional, blinding speed gives her tremendous range, helping take some of the defensive pressure off her teammates.

It would do no justice to Jill's abilities, however, if one neglected to mention her offensive skills. As Teddy Roosevelt would say if he saw Jill play ball, "Jill speaks softly but carries a big stick." Opponents have been left gawking as they witness Jill's artistry in laying down a perfect bunt. Her superior speed on the basepaths makes her a mere blur to the naked eye as she completes "the grand tour" for yet another run. Yes, Jill has certainly turned playing second base into an art form, and she is one of the reasons the defense is as tight as an army bedspread. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

On the mound, stands the player that makes everything happen for the Sho'women: Shannon "Blood and Guts" Cupka. In all honesty, this girl has a better delivery than a skilled obstetrician. She mows down batters like a John Deere, setting them up with a flaming fastball then knocking them out with a subtle change-up. She leaves opponents groping for runs like a thirsty man in the desert gropes for a precious drop of water. Like the others, Shannon pulls her weight when it comes to shutting down the enemy. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

In the side open pastures of the outfield lurks Becky Bow-

Shorewomen knock off Dickinson

by Greg Coss

In one of the biggest matches of the season, the WC women's tennis team gave themselves a chance to win the MAC title as they defeated sectional rival Dickinson on April 8, 6-3. The victory raised the Shorewomen's record to 5-6.

It was Dickinson's first sectional match of the year, and the Red Devils' number one player Mags Randazzo would be happy if it were the last. She had the misfortune of facing Washington's standout Tracy Peel, ranked in the top ten in the nation. Peel rolled right over Randazzo, 6-0,6-3, and Jennifer Sloan, the number six singles player, also won easily to give the Shorewomen an early 2-0 lead. Miriam Dittman handled Valery Herrington 6-2,6-3 to extend the lead to 3-0. After Monica Blanco and Meg Wheatley lost heartbreakers to close the gap to 3-2, Rachel Rice won a huge three set match to give the Shorewomen a 4-2 lead after singles play.

In doubles, Meg Wheatley and Susan Sloan won the clinching match in impressive fashion, 6-3,6-2. Miriam Dittman and Rachel Rice won Washington's sixth match in a real struggle, showing the team's toughness with a 6-3,5-7,6-4 victory. In the real shocker of the match, nationally ranked Monica Blanco and Tracy Peel were upset by a very agressive team in Randazzo and Alena Spielberg. The doubles victory for Randazzo avenged her loss to Peel in singles. Peel and Blanco lost the first set 6-4, then dropped the second set in a tiebreaker. Despite the loss by the team's #1 doubles team, the Shorewomen were more than happy with their 6-3 victory. The win maintained the team's strong record in the Middle Atlantic Conference.

Coach Holly Bramble seemed to be most impressed with the play of Wheatley and Sloan in the third doubles spot. She said the two played decisive tennis in their clinching victory. Like the men's tennis team, the Shorewomen have great depth, as the play of Meg Wheatley and others in the lower seeds have proven all year long. This is a very strong women's team which has an excellent chance to win the MAC's. Dickinson was 4-0 until it ran into the Shorewomen, and the Washington College women will try to play giant killer some more in the spring. This year, it looks like the team has the talent up top and the depth to pull off some big victories in the Middle Atlantic Conference and postseason play.

Women's lacrosse loses first

by Julie Schram

The WC women's lacrosse team, ranked twelfth nationally, met up against number ten Johns Hopkins University on a cold and windy Kibler Field on April 12. Despite an impressive rally in the second half, WC was unable to pull a victory out of this longstanding rivalry. The loss was the team's first of the season.

Within the first two minutes of the first half, Hopkins scored, but Amy Tiehel answered with an unassisted goal fifteen seconds later. Hopkins scored on goalie Kristy Hilgartner three more times until Jenny Blenckstone scored midway through the first half. The Jays then went on to score six more times before halftime.

Blenckstone then launched the team's second half rally by scoring twice within the first five minutes. The team played tight defense while the offense continued to surge. Sarah Coste led the attack with four goals. The Shorewomen kept the pressure going until the end of the game, when freshman Sam Clements scored with nine seconds left. Hilgartner registered thirteen saves to the eleven registered by Hopkins.

Coach Diane Guinan commented, "Hopkins was the first team to press us all year, but we came back tremendously against stiff odds."

WC refused to let the loss effect them, beating Frostburg State 13-9 last Saturday. They travel to Gettysburg tomorrow to play their final MAC contest.

Baseball's new role on television

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

How many of you out there have turned on the television lately? I can only assume that the majority of you have, and odds that you probably caught at least part of a baseball game on the tube. This is especially true for those fortunate people who have access to cable TV. Between CBS, TBS, WGN, WOR, WMAR and ESPN, we have more than enough initials broadcasting the national pastime.

ESPN is the main source for baseball this season. It seems that what has always been called "The Total Sports Network" may have to change their title, at least from April to September. Baseball's Opening Day brought three consecutive games to viewers in some areas. Unfortunately, television blackouts conspired to limit the Baltimore metropolitan area to a little more than one game. Orioles fans wound up getting nailed twice, since radio announcer extraordinaire Jon Miller was busy calling the game for ESPN and could not be heard over the airwaves.

Still, all of this baseball on television must be an absolute dream for every die hard fan of the game. Just flip on the set, settle down for nine hours of baseball, drive the entire family crazy, right? Well, not exactly. These hours of viewing pleasure are only limited to those fans who have cable television.

When ESPN bought the rights to broadcast 587,842 games this season, everyone thought that baseball would be on 24 hours a day. This is true if you have cable, but there are plenty of less fortunate souls who now have to wait until late June before seeing another game on national television. This is because CBS is now the network that owns the rights to major league baseball, and they have turned their backs on the sport until the All-Star Game arrives.

CBS bought the rights because they want to have the potential to broadcast every major sporting event. They already have the NCAA Tournament and the NBA Playoffs. They spent millions and billions of dollars for the All-Star Game, the Championship Series and the World Series. Regular season games are not a worry for them. This is unfortunate, because CBS has two classy announcers in Jack Buck and Tim McCarver. Baseball is permeating the television cable medium, but unfortunately some true fans of the game are being left out. One can only hope that CBS broadcasts more regular season games next year and makes sure that every baseball fan can appreciate the sport on television.

Men's tennis team dominates Rochester

by Greg Coss

The WC men's netters put themselves in excellent position for the national championships, to be held at Swarthmore in June, with an extremely impressive 8-1 victory over the University of Rochester. The win was a huge one for the Shoremen and detrimental to the Yellow Jackets because it gave WC either a number three or four seeding for the national tournament and eliminated Rochester from post-season play. It was a match which worried coach Wyman and several of the players, who saw this match as do or die for the Shoremen. They responded in grand fashion, peaking just at the right time, the final match of the season.

Roman Inochovsky was very strong at the number six position, defeating Ben Austen of the Yellow Jackets handily by a score of 6-0,6-2. The depth of WC was simply too much as Alberto Diaz, playing at number five singles, defeated Mike Kuening 6-2,6-4. Scott Read handled 28th ranked Juan Patta after a shaky first set, 7-6,6-2, giving WC a 2-0 lead in the match. Peter Maller, ranked #16 in the South Atlantic, lost a tough one at number three singles to #29 Bobby Hessien. Maller lost 6-3,6-2, closing the gap to 2-1. The Shoremen responded to the threat, however, as Scott Shepard fought off Chris O'Brien 6-4,6-4. Larry Gewer then beat Sal Mauroby by the same score to clinch the match for the Shoremen.

WC further exposed their depth when Allon Rock and Andy Bohutinsky stepped in at #3 doubles and won in three sets. Read and Gewer defeated the #7 ranked team in the country by a score of 6-3,6-3, while Maller and Inochovsky pulled out a big three set win at number two doubles. This clinched an 8-1 victory for the Shoremen.

This match followed a 6-3 victory over Division II foe West Chester University. In this match, Larry Gewer crushed Darren Kostival 6-1,6-0. Maller made it 2-0 with a 6-2,6-2 victory over Dave Sorrell. Scott Read won his 30th match of the season with a 6-3,6-4 defeat of Christian Roucoutes. Scott Shepard and Allon Rock clinched the match for the Shoremen with singles victories. Read and Gewer won easily in doubles, accounting for the Shoremen's sixth win and the icing on the cake, making WC's record 14-2. After the team's win over Rochester, the Shoremen closed the regular spring season with a 15-2 record.

Washington College, avoiding a late season loss to a lesser opponent, helped themselves tremendously and have given themselves an excellent chance at big success in the nationals. Instead of competing in a playoff involving several teams vying for the number seven and eight positions in the tournament, WC will once again be one of the premier teams in the country. They will attempt to climb a few spots above last year's fourth place finish in the nationals.

Women's softball battles injuries, tough schedule

by Amy R. Caddle

The Washington College women's softball team has had to deal with some serious setbacks the past few weeks. Three team players, as well as Coach Penny Fall, have suffered from illnesses and injuries. Senior Sheri Christopher was hospitalized and underwent an operation and pitcher Shannon Cupka fractured her toe. In addition, Marie Mohler suffered a broken thumb and had to have the injury surgically pinned, and Coach Penny Fall was hospitalized for an illness. These setbacks all took place within a ten day period, and the injuries have contributed to many internal team problems. "The morale of the team was low for a while, but we seem to be on an upswing now," says Coach Fall. With only 11 varsity players, it is essential that everyone remain healthy and able to play. The recent setbacks forced the Shorewomen to make many adjustments in the field and forced Coach Fall to place people in new positions. "Shannon Cupka can still pitch, but she's lost a bit of her speed. However, she can't run at all," says Fall. Christopher is back on the field, but her loss of time will result in more hard work. Mohler will be out for the rest of the season. "Marie was a solid center fielder and an excellent hitter. Her injury has resulted in a major team loss," says Fall.

Creativity has been the key word for position changes within the team. "Everybody's playing at least two positions. That puts a lot of demands on the players, but they have been very flexible. Considering all of the setbacks we have suffered, our playing has not been bad," adds Fall. The Shorewomen had a 8-4 victory over Essex Community College, a team that has been a challenge to the Washington College softball team in the past. Sharon Orser at third base and Edna Diefenderfer at shortstop had 11 assists combined. WC's strong defense, particularly the outfield and left side of the infield, helped lead the team to victory. "It was the best fielding game a Washington College softball team has ever played," says Coach Penny Fall.

The Shorewomen have suffered a recent string of losses, which is not a true indication of their level of play. Swarthmore beat WC 10-0, and in a doubleheader against Gettysburg, the Shorewomen lost 9-8, and 14-4. The first game against Gettysburg proved the strength of the Washington College team. "Gettysburg is tough. I am not unhappy with the level of play from our team," says Fall. The Shorewomen then rallied for a 9-4 win over Galaudet. In this victory, Sharon Orser, Tracy Coleman, Kathy Brewster and Jill Reppert scoring all nine runs. Edna Diefenderfer also provided some solid hitting for the WC Shorewomen against Gallaudet.

In the team's recent home game against Hunter College, the score was 1-1 until the first half of the 7th inning, when Hunter was able to tally two runs. The women were unable to score in the bottom of the seventh, resulting in a 3-1 loss for WC. Despite the loss, Reppert proved her mettle again by scoring the only run of the game for the Shorewomen.

The only disappointing game of the season thus far was the doubleheader against Wastern Maryland, resulting in a 4-1 and 9-2 loss for Washington College. Coach Fall says, "It just was not a good game. We were tough until the fifth inning, and then we fell apart."

The Shorewomen now have a large number of games coming up in a short period of time. The schedule includes games against Cecil Community College, a doubleheader against Essex Community College, as well as five more games that have not been rescheduled as of this date. Coach Fall has planned to rescedule only intraleague Middle Atlantic Conference rain-outs, due to a lack of time remaining in the spring season.

Lacrosse continues to roll over their opponents

by Matt Giller

In a home game on April 7, in front of an impressive alumni crowd, the Shoremen were able to escape the pesky Roanoke netters(6-4) by the score of 5-4.

Good goaltending, a tight zone, and the everpresent quagmire were the main defenders in the game Saturday agaainst the WAC juggernauts. The Shoremen scored four goals in the opening frame, but were unable to add anything until Tim Hormes scored at 8:29 of the third quarter to give them the lead and the game wining goal at 5-4.

The last six minutes of the game, the Shoremen sealed a victory when Coach Corcoran inserted Nick Darcangelo to help control the ball and run out the clock without allowing any threat by the visitors. Along with Hormes's two goals, Jed Cronin supplied a hat trick to supplement the scoring for the Shoremen.

Coach Terry Corcoran was extremely enthusiastic about his team's play on the defensive end, as they were able to shut down the big guns of Roanoke with excellent individual efforts from Kevin "Duck" Doyle and Dave Cromwell. The team also benefited from a solid performance from Kevin Colbeck, who played his first game since returning from the injured reserve.

Last Saturday the Shoremen(6-3) went north, where they outdueled the Dips of Franklin & Marshall(7-4), 19-14. The rain stayed away but the goals were poured on as senior All-Americans Bob Martino and Tim Hormes combined for 9 goals to lead the #2 ranked Shoremen over the previously ranked #4 F&M Diplomats.

Although Franklin & Marshall played a tight zone as anticipated, the dry field made it easier for the deer to run wild and work an impressive and effective fast break against the Diplomats. The Shoremen shot out to a 7-3 first quarter lead and never looked in the rear view mirror as they were in the driver's seat the rest of the way.

Franklin & Marshall did manage to cut the Shoremen lead to 12-9 before the halftime horn sounded. Washington College spread the lead to 16-11 after three frames, and they received a boost from the defense late in the game. Dave Slomkowski was excellent in the second half between the pipes, never allowing the Diplomats to threaten.

Hormes led all WAC scorers with five goals. Martino excelled with four goals and three assists, while Hank Miller netted three and assisted on another on the same middie line. Jed Cronin and Greg Rupert each scored two goals, while Nick Darcangelo and Bennie Lamanna tallied one goal and two assists apiece. Freshman Dave Lipinski scored a goal and Mark Cavallaro completed the scoring with an assist. Standout Shoremen goalie Dave Slomkowski finished with 16 saves in goal.

The Shoremen are on the road this weekend at Washington & Lee, a vastly improved team that is ranked #11 in the latest poll. The Juggernauts end their two game road trip and return home to Kibler Field and Washington College the following Saturday, April 28th, to face off against the #6 ranked Sea Gulls of Salisbury State. This game is the final regular season home game for the Shoremen, and the festivities begin at 1:30. The WAC ends their regular season on Friday, May 4 with a game at West Chester St., then move on to a promising postseason.

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

Freelance photographer Helen Marcus, recognized for her corporate portraiture, annual reports, and world-wide food and travel works, presents "Literary Portraits: Photographs by Helen Marcus," an exhibit on display in the O'Neill Literary House beginning Friday, April 27.

Publications including the New York Times and Town & Country have featured Marcus' works, which have also been highlighted as solo exhibitions for the Asia Society, the New York Public Library and the Overseas Press Club.

Showcasing the familiar names Anne Tyler, Irvine Shaw, Tom Wolfe, Joseph Heller and John Barth in her display, Marcus has also photographed authors Norman Mailer, Robert Ludlum and Kitty Carlisle. Included in the featured works will be a photograph of Toni Morrison, one of Marcus' favorites.

"What I try to do when I'm photographing people is to get onto a page something that I see that attracts them to me," explains Marcus as she describes her approach to the portraits.

Conceding that it is virtually impossible to capture the "essence" of a person, Marcus instead concentrates on portraying her subject in a way that "makes them seem important, that they have a presence and a humanity," and adds, "I want to show them the way they want to be seen."

For Marcus, photography is "an extension of biography. I am interested in who you are, where you came from, what you do and how you do it."

As a theater major in college, Marcus initially worked various theater jobs, including on technical crews and as a production assistant. At one point she helped in the production of a Broadway show and participated in the Theater Guild.

In search of a less sporatic livelihood, Marcus turned to television, which was responsible for many of the connections that sparked her second career switch to photography. As a TV producer with Goodson-Todman Productions, she worked on programs such as To Tell the Truth, What's My Line and Beat the Clock.

Marcus, whose interest in photography began at the age of ten, had done occasional portraits for friends and was asked to do one of Bob Creighton for his novel. The novel was a bestseller, and Marcus received extensive credit for her work as well. It was then that she decided to pursue photography as a profession.

Among Marcus' first clients were American Express, Simon & Schuster and Alfred A. Knopf. One of Marcus' recent photographs for Schuster was of former president Richard Nixon.

Praised for her strong corporate portraits and evocative lighting, Marcus has also photographed for International Paper Co., Western Union and Fortune, in addition to the magazines Time, Travel and Leisure, Food and Wine, Vogue, Gourmet and Forbes. Although, Marcus admits, photographs for annual reports aren't as glamorous as literary portraits, she says, "You can do better financially...And there are challenges."

Marcus, one of the founders of New York's Chapter of the American Society of Magazine Photographers, was its first president and presently fills the position for a third term. Professionally, she is affiliated as well with Advertising Photographers of America, Overseas Press Club, Graphic Artists Guild and Women in Communications.

Recently, Marcus has been a regular lecturer at the Maine Photographic Workshop and a spokeswoman for Conference Management, discussing executive portraiture and business practices in photography.

Assignments have led Marcus across the world, including China, Japan, Soviet Union, India, Egypt, Mexico and Europe, and her name is listed not only in Who's Who in American Women, but in the World Who's Who in Women.

With regard to her future, Marcus plans to "do more of what I'm doing and to do it better."

On display form Friday, April 27 thru Sunday, April 29, "Literary Portraits: Photographs by Helen Marcus" will debut at the Literary House with a reception Friday, April 27 at 4:30 PM. Admission is free and open to the public.

ARTS

Band jazzes it up in spring performance

The Washington College Jazz Band, under the direction of Associate Professor of Music Amzie Parcell, performs its spring concert, featuring jazz sounds from the past 50 years, in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center on this Sunday at 4 PM. (photo by Amy L. Undercoffler)

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

Culminating spring semester, the Washington College Jazz Band, under the direction of Associate Professor of Music Amzie Parcell, performs Sunday afternoon in Tawes Theater.

Featuring sounds from the Big Band era, including "I'm Gonna Sit Right Down and Write Myself a Letter" and "My Funny Valentine," the ensemble will also play selections that range from slow to jazz rock.

As Parcell describes, "There will be a wide spectrum of composition," adding, "it is jazz in the broadest sense of what jazz means." Some of the contemporary jazz works scheduled for the concert are "Channel Three" and "Firestar."

Chris Goldenberg, freshman and drummer for the band predicts the performance to be an enjoyable one: "I'm very excited about the upcoming concert. I believe that our second show will be better than the first because of the variety of songs and because of the talented members in the band."

Says Parcell, "The group is open to all students with requisite ability, with the necessary background to play the music." Ideally, he would like to see the ensemble as a completely WC student-composed group of 18 instrumentalists and one or two vocalists. Currently, members include both students and local community members.

Should this ideal be actualized, Parcell would like the jazz band to perform off campus. Since its organization four years ago, the ensemble has only played in the Coffee House besides its semester performances.

Freshman Michelle Harrison, who contacted Parcell about a jazz group before her arrival to WC, would also like to see the band perform off campus. "A lot of people on campus don't know about it [the jazz band], and playing off campus would give us an opportunity to go out there and show everybody what we're doing," she explains.

The jazz group grew out of student interest and Parcell's agreement to participate as director. According to Parcell, the ensemble, which started out on a small basis, still has room for advancement. However, he does admit, "Our net isn't cast quite far enough. We don't take in all the students who are capable to do it," and says, "we're always looking for new personnel." Non-music majors are encouraged to join in the band as well as music majors.

As sophomore Todd Kagler points out, the ensemble provides a "nice opportunity for students who don't want to be music majors to play the instruments they played in high school." He adds, "It's something we all do because we want to do it; it's not like we're obligated."

Kagler, desiring to perform in front of a larger audience, says, "We've been working really hard. We hope to have a lot of school support." Goldenberg and Parcell agree.

The jazz band, which rehearses Wednesday evenings, is comprised of: Michelle Harrison, Todd Kagler, Andrew Chandler and Charles Bishop, saxophone; Keith Wharton, Bill Faulkner, William Parcell and Robert Fleetwood, trumpet; John Blakelock, euphonium; Victor Belanger, bass; Chris Premo, guitar; Michael Tyson, piano; and Chris Goldenberg, drums. Vocal accompaniment is provided by Kate Bennett and Cynthia Croot.

The spring performance of the Washington College Jazz Band will begin at 4 PM in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Admission is free and open to the public.

Levy on 'fantastic' literature

Maurice Levy, professor of English at the University of Toulouse and currently serving as visiting professor of English at the University of Ohio, will discuss "Critical Approaches to the Literature of the Fantastic" on Thursday, April 26.

Levy, whose specialty is the Gothic novel, will examine ways of interpreting Gothic literature in his lecture, drawing examples from the work of such authors as Edgar Allan Poe and early twentieth-century Gothic writer, H.P. Lovecraft.

Schools of criticism, such as historical analysis, thematic criticism, structuralism and psychoanalysis, and their respective limitations will be explored in connection with fantastic literature.

Levy comes to Washington College partly through the efforts of Associate Professor Thomas Cousineau, who has been friends with Levy for several years. "While the focus of [Levy's] talk will be on the literature of the fantastic," Cousineau says, "its larger ambition is to examine methods of interpretation applicable to the study of literature in general."

The talk is sponsored as part of the Sophie Kerr Lecture Series and will take place in the Sophie Kerr Room at 5 PM. Admission is free and open to the public.

man, the alias "softball magnet." She covers the ground like a gazelle, eating up lazy fly-balls, constantly conjuring up similarities to Willie Mays . And if she's Mays in the outfield, she is certainly Hank Aaron at the plate. Becky's hitting prowess has been the backbone for many offensive outbursts. It's a simple case of the offense complementing the defense. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

To be sure, the rest of the team deserves recognition. Each girl makes substantial contributions to the team, and their efforts should be applauded. For example, there is the timely hitting of Debbie Smethurst and Jen Brown, usually driving in key runs that help secure a Sho'women victory. There is also the rock steady defense of catcher Kathy Brewster. She reminds one of Johnny Bench in his prime, and if Division III handed out gold gloves, Kathy's name would be at the top of the list. Without a doubt, the depth of this team gives it a strong chance to bring the softball title back to Chestertown. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

I would now like to pay homage to the great mastermind behind this team...Coach Fall. Coach Fall is a pure technician of the game and should take the credit for knitting the team into one cohesive unit. She uses bold strategic moves that would surely evoke envy from some of the greatest coaches whoever lived—people like Casey Stengel and Whitey Herzog. With a strict practice regimen Coach Fall has assembled a group of seasoned veterans and eager rookies ready to face the challenges of life in the slam-bang, live on the razor's edge, laugh in the face of death world of Division III women's softball. I know, I've seen 'em practice.

Girls, here's hoping you go for the gold every time you play, because Lord knows you deserve it.

College, Dr. Emilie Amt, Assistant Professor of History, Professor Bennett Lamond, Chair of the English Department, Dr. Peter Tapke, Professor of Philosophy and Religion, and Dr. Rosette Roat, Associate Professor of the Department of Chemistry, are the members of this committee.

Applicants to either of the WC affiliated schools schools must meet a few criteria. A minimum grade point average of 3.0 is required. Three letters of recommendation from faculty members must then be submitted to the committee, along with an essay that states the request to go abroad as well as the student's intent. The essay must describe what the student wants to study and why that subject matter is important to them. It must also show how this course of study will fit in with their projected major.

Based on these criteria, the committee considers all of the entrants and makes its selection; all of the chosen students applied through this process.

The second process involves students sending their own individual applications to the institution of their choice. These applications do not go through the college selection committee, but are considered by the individual schools which sponsor the programs. Each school sets its own criteria for selection.

Sansing was unaware as to the and number of students accepted to schools to study abroad in this manner.

"Going abroad gives the student an opportunity to study different subjects in a different environment, at a time in your life when you have less responsibilities and commitments. Too soon in life we get involved in families and jobs and this is an opportunity for the student to grow on his or her own," said Sansing.

"I haven't spent very much time traveling and I haven't been away from home and my family for the amount of time that I will be next year, but being a history major I think England will be a fascinating area to study and visit, " said Feeney.

Feeney is planning to study British history next year at Manchester and its tutorial teaching style is one of the reasons that she picked this institution. She will take one class per semester. Instead of attending class regularly, she will meet with a tutor once a week to discuss that week's assignment.

Said Kate Absher, a double major in English and history: "When I decided to attend Washington College, I felt I needed the security of a small school. But now I think I'm ready to try something bigger. St. Andrews is a large university with many international students in the heart of Scotland. By going there, I'll be breaking ties with my family, my friends, my country for a whole year...not a very secure thing to do. It will be good for me."

to find companies that advocated the push to protect the environment. They found that Kelloggs, General Mills, and Post are the only cereal companies which use recycled paper for their boxes.

When they looked at detergents, they discovered that the liquid detergents have a small amount of phosophorous, which is harmful to the environment, or no phosphorous at all, whereas powder detergent had a substantial amount.

A member of the Chestertown community said, "One of the major problems with commercial products and the environment is that the public has not demanded the use of recycled products. Because of this, companies do not boldly show that their products are environmentally safe."

Molina discussed one of the most important world problems that exists several times during his visit to classes, and during the talk: the ozone hole. Chlorofloro-carbons (CFC's) deplete the ozone. The following equations and text will illustrate the problem and why it exists.

First of all ozone makes up the stratosphere. When elemental chlorine and chlorine oxide are present in the atmosphere a radical chlorine is formed. It is this radical chlorine that causes the problem because it attacks the ozone and creates another radical chlorine, so that the newly created radical chlorine will attack another ozone molecule; therefore, the vicious cycle continues infinitely unless the CFC's are cut down drastically. This process can be reversed and ozone can be created by (1) adding nitrogen oxide to oxygen to form a radical oxygen. Then (2) the radical oxygen will attach to elemental oxygen.

"Society as a whole has to do something about it, it can't be just the scientists. Conservation does not mean that we have to lower our standard of living to reduce the risk. We only need to change our habits," said Molina.

Sophomore Class President—Whitney Hyrus, 49 votes, Gordy Scherer, 44 votes; Vice-President—Lynn Clifford, 40 votes; Lisa Pruett, 52 votes; Secretary/Treasurer—Lori Hastings, 83 votes.

Finally, Neiman handed out polls to the senators, which will be distributed to the student body. Senators will go around next week to collect student ideas and opinions about the decor of the renovated Student Center and about whether the freshmen and sophomores should be required to live on campus.

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Boy, what a wild time there was in the Dining Hall Wednesday, at dinner! Carnival Night was truly one of the best special events held in the Dining Hall in quite a while. Congradulations to Angela Bowden and Otis Monroe for all their hard work and creativity. A special thanks to all the W.C.D.S. staff for helping make the evening come together. We could not have done it without you.

While I'm at it, I would like to extend congradulations to James Anderson. He was chosen W.C.D.S. Employee of the Month for April. Way to go James and keep up the good work.

Now for some "cultural information" that should be of interest to all of you. Calcium is the most abundant mineral found in the human body, most being found in the bones (97%) and teeth (1%). The remainder is found in the soft tissues of the body where it performs a variety of pertinent functions.

Bone is constantly being broken down and rebuilt; thus the body's constant need for calcium does not stop after childhood, but continues throughout life. If calcium consumption is inadequate over time, calcium will be released from bones, weakening the skeleton, resulting in osteoprorosis (porous bones). As you may know women are more prone to osteoprorosis than men, mainly due to a smaller bone structure.

Next Wednesday will be Steak Night. The menu will feature Broiled T-Bone or Cajun Steaks, Baked Lemon & Pepper Catfish Fillets, Twiced Baked Potatoes, Steamed Carrots and fresh Strawberry Shortcake with homemade whipped topping. Sounds delicious. I'll be there, sure hope you will be, too.

Before I forget, there are only 23 more shopping days until MOTHER'S DAY. Was that too suttle a reminder?

R

In this movie, truly about sex, lies, and videotape, 26-year-old Stephen Soderbergh has hold of a good filmmaker's idea, and a funny one, too—that sexual confession is itself a sexual act and can be more erotic than sex itself. The four central characters are a beautiful and frigid wife, her adulterous husband, her vengeful sister with whom he's having an affair, and his old college friend who videotapes women as they take off their clothes and reveal their innermost sexual secrets. They talk softly to one another, about one another, and we are drawn gently but insistently into a labyrinth of lust and betrayal. The dialogue reveals the power of lies and, surprisingly, the greater power of truth. This purring little movie is highly erotic, yet also rather ethical. A fascinating, eccentric first feature.

The 1989-90 State of the Major Reports were recently submitted to the administration by former Student Academic Board Chairperson and Student Government Vice President Tracey Coleman. The need for more faculty was the recurrent theme.

Coleman compiled the reports, which were written by student representatives of almost every major based on results of polling both students and faculty. Only two departments of twenty went unrepresented in the Student Academic Board: Art and Drama. One other major was unrepresented in the report; student Jin Pak voiced concerns of the Chemistry Department at meetings but was unable to submit a report as she was serving as an intern this semester.

State of the Majors Reports are submitted on an annual basis. Coleman stated that she sent copies of this year's document to President Cater, Provost and Dean of the College Elizabeth Baer, Associate Dean Lucille Sansing, the Student Government Association and The Washington College Elm. According to Coleman, Baer suggested that copies should also be sent out to faculty chairpersons of majors.

Fourteen of the twenty student major representatives stated unequivocally that their departments were in need of faculty. One representative, Jerome Connolly for Economics, cited "instability" in his department "among existing professors" but stated that the lossof two professors within the same year was "unforeseeable." Only two majors did not cite a need for additional faculty.

Seventy percent of the academic departments at Washington College are in need of more faculty, according to student representatives on the Student Academic Board. No other concern was voiced with such uniformity.

This does not indicate that students are unhappy at WC. While the desire for increased staffing was evident, most of the representatives stated that students were generally happy in their major. Most stated that while staffing is inadequate, faculty members that are employed here are caring and talented.

Students Jeanne King and Peter Maller are two representatives of the largest major at, business management.

They wrote in their report, "Students and faculty were interviewed regarding the State of the Business Major. Both groups seemed to find the progress that has been made quite adequate. There were however a few common recommendations touched on by both students and faculty...It was recommended that maybe one more full time professor be employed. It would make the major easier to administer and would help with the teaching of upper level courses...It must be noted that the present Business Professors are all well respected."

Other concerns ranged from inadequate resources, for example, in the History Department—"The most pressing problem in the major is funds"— to new course suggestions. Heather Donovan, the philosophy major representative, suggested that courses be offered in "contemporary philosophy. Some of the particular philosophers mentioned were Spinoza, Leibniz, Hegel, Heideggar, and Nietzsche. A separate section of medieval history was also proposed."

Only one representative seemed dissatisfied with almost every aspect of her major.

Student Jennifer Eisberg wrote of the Foreign Languages Department, "The foreign language major at Washington College is in jeopardy. It has arrived at a critical point and will go in one of two directions: it will either die, or it will be saved. The death of the foreign language major rests on lack of interest on both the professors' part and the students' part. Professors believe that students are no longer interested in studying foreign languages. This is partly true. They are no longer interested because there is nothing to keep them interested."

The Student Academic Board accomplished much more in addition to compiling the report. According to Coleman, "our major goal this year was to change requirements for the senior obligation." This eventually led to the addition of a document to each student's transcript identifying and recognizing each students' completion of senior obligations. This new practice will go into effect for the graduates of 1990.

Master Plan moves into the summer break

by Laura Hopper
Staff writer

As the academic year draws to a close, things are beginning to shape up around the Washington College campus, according to Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects. Baer recently updated results of the Master Plan and outlined summer construction projects.

Construction in the college lane is now complete. The walkways are repaired, and the area will be landscaped with trees, bushes, shrubs, and grass. Baer stressed that this is usually one of the best times of the year for planting grass, but this year the ground is too wet. By autumn, the grass should be well established.

The Casey Academic Resources Center is now slated for opening on October 1, 1990. Landscaping around the building and along the new access road will be done at that time. Returning students should eventually see trees planted along the road. The Bookstore, Admissions Office, Student Affairs Office, classrooms, and student mailboxes will be located in the Casey Center.

During summer break, Dunning Hall and possibly two of the new dorms are scheduled for renovations. Cecil and Dorchester are the most likely candidates for renovations. The dorms will be repainted, carpeted, and repaired. This is part of a program where, according to Baer, "each summer we try to isolate a particular priority area." Any dorms renovated this summer will not be used for housing during the summer programs.

Also scheduled for construction this summer is a new parking lot located where Foxwell Hall once stood. The lot will be roughly the same size as the parking lot behind Tawes Theater. Eventually, the William Smith parking lot will be replaced by a pedestrian mall and a small parking lot near Bunting Hall.

Many students are concerned that new parking areas will not compensate for the loss of the

How to cure the state of major: additional faculty

The State of the Major reports are in, and the verdict is almost unanimous—this college needs more faculty. This problem no longer manifests itself merely as bickering between the editor and the president in the pages of The Elm—it is foremost among students' concerns about academia at Washington College.

As English representative Sarah Hamlin eloquently states, "The students' responses to the survey suggested that much is adequate about the English major, but their comments and recommendations show that they are interested in a more than just adequate education." Here's what you, the students, said about your respective majors:

In the American studies major, representative Matthew Woolston writes, "the students feel that there should be at least one full time American Studies faculty member. Not only would this be helpful to the American Studies department, but it would also relieve pressure on members of faculty in the social science departments who currently guide the writing of the senior obligation of some American Studies majors."

Biology representative Sharon Orser addresses the issue of increasing majors in that department. "If the number of majors does increase, it would be necessary to increase the number of professors...the general consensus is that the biology department is operating at the minimum number of professors."

In English, Hamlin is decisive: "As with the course offerings, the staffing and its quality is in need of expansion and diversification...Classes need to be smaller and need to be taught by a wider variety of teachers."

Music representative Jim Doran states unequivocally, "The staff size...needs to be increased. A small department is wonderful in its intimacy, but the staff can't always provide enough personal time to suit the individual needs of the student."

According to Noel Breger, history representative, "The students do not feel that the staffing is adequate though the staff here is excellent." He also cites the problem of lack of funds in that major.

"It is difficult to handle the large enrollments with only four professors. The growing popularity of some of the classes has made it difficult to reach some teaching goals," according to psychology representative Beth Bozic.

Education representative Cecilia Victor writes, "All those who responded agreed that although Dr. O'Connor was outstanding, he must be overworked, and definitely needs assistance."

Representatives in international studies, mathematics, philosophy, political science, and physics also cited a need for additional faculty.

Now it's my turn to issue a challenge: President-elect Trout, cultivate programs which will raise funds for academia, not buildings. Students don't expect miracles, but we do expect a concentrated effort.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

Student expresses discontent with SGA president

To the Editor:

I usually do not like to voice my discontent with the job of student leaders on this campus because I think that they are trying at least, to do a good job. However, I can not say that about our newly elected SGA President, Stuart Neiman.

When I first met Stuart last semester, I felt that he was a strong leader who, although very political, was working in the best interest of the school and the students. He had a lot of good ideas and initiated them into the SGA. He created the Inter-Fraternity Council, the Student Ombudsman position in the SCC and he served as an interested speaker on campus to problems that both plagued and concerned students. I voted for him for SGA President because I believed that he would carry on his strong leadership role in that office.

Unfortunately, Stu has proved me wrong. I realize that the transition of power from one SGA Administration to another is a difficult one that requires time and patience. That is supposedly the reason why Stuart proposed that elections for executive positions be moved-up to late March instead of continuing to have them in late April. I am more than willing to give someone a chance to learn his job, because contrary to the popular belief, there is no such thing as a BORN LEADER. Stuart, however, has not learned his job.

Three of the last four meetings that have been held have been unofficial because there have not been enough Senators there to hold a quorum. However Stu waived the quorum requirement - a move that was strictly unconstitutional - so that the SGA could at least look like they were accomplishing something. However, at none of the meetings was anything of such tremendous value discussed that could not have waited until a legal meeting was held. Stu ran on the platform that "the Attias administration brought integrity to the SGA, I will work to give it power." He, unfortunately, has not.

Senate meetings are now conducted in a farcical manner. Neiman sits in the front of the room and has behaved sarcastically and pompously. As one of the senators said, "He is trying to win everyone's respect by being witty and that is just not how you do it." Instead of acting like a leader, Stuart is acting like a little boy with a very swelled head.

I am disappointed with his performance up until now. The show that Stuart Neiman presented to the students at Washington College this year portrayed him as a competent and caring student who would do his best to see that the best interests of the students were not being overlooked by faculty or administration. The Stuart Neiman who is now in office has not lived up to that portrayal at all. Without an effective SGA President, next year's student government will not get the power - and will lose the integrity - that Attias worked hard to attain.

Sincerely,
Kyndra Ponder

Cater responds to editorial

To the Editor:

As a veteran journalist, I should have known better than to match wits with The Elm editor. Forgive me for suggesting that she will depart College this summer. Congratulations to her on a successful year at the helm of The Elm and for her election to next year's Collegian.

Meanwhile, I will not walk away from the College without further feelings of stewardship, always trying to respond to "current student concern" as well as the longer term needs of a College seeking at least one more century.

Sincerely,
Douglass Cater

P.S. Next autumn, I am reliably told, there will be forty-four classes with enrollments of five or less. I hope the Collegian editor and others will help to swell their ranks.

Editor's note: These figures reflect enrollments prior to the registration of freshmen and transfer students. After fall registration, these figures may change.

Editors-in-chief chosen

Congratulations to Laura Hopper, Perspectives Editor, who has been appointed Editor-in-chief of The Elm for 1990-1991. Application for editorial and managerial positions are available outside of The Elm office in Reid basement. Applications are due this Monday, April 30. Questions should be directed to Laura Hopper at extension 490, or through Campus Mail.

Congratulations also to Renee King, who will again serve as Pegasus Editor-in-chief, 1990-1991.

Categories are Editorial, News, Short Features, Long Features, Sports, Arts/Entertainment (including reviews), and Photo Journalism. Original prints of photographs and photocopies of tearsheets are acceptable forms by which to submit material. Entries must have been printed by a campus publication between Spring 1989 and Spring 1990. Questions should be directed to Robert Day or Susan Di Leo.

OPINION

ISSUE: Should classes at Washington College have mandatory attendance policies? Why or why not?

No policy for lecture courses

Melissa G. Grim

I was recently warned that my grade in a 400-level class was in jeopardy due to my lack of attendance. This warning infuriated me and is the impetus behind this article. My infuriation arises from the fact that my grade, which I have strictly earned through exams and papers, could possibly be reduced because I have missed more than the alotted absences.

This class is a lecture-oriented class not a seminar, and by lecture- oriented class I mean a class where there is no discussion whatsoever unless someone asks for clarification. In this type of situation my participation is completely unnecessary to make the class a more enriching experience. (One must note that my argument does not apply to classes that are seminar oriented or where participation is an integral part of the experience. I've never quite understood the reasoning behind the attendance policy, except of course, that it is suppose to compel me to go to class.)

Now if the experience is not effected one way or the other by my participation then why is my presence necessary? If the answer to this question is that I would have all the notes for the exam or paper then my reply is Xerox. Some people might retort that one's grades could be higher if they were present in class to get the notes for themselves; well, my grades are an indication that this is not always true. In one class I have received an A on an exam where I was present at all the classes prior to the test and an A on an exam where I was not present, thanks to the Xerox machine. So why is my grade in jeopardy if my presence is unnecessary? The only answer I can come up with is that I am not following class policy.

Well, I will be so bold as to say that a formalized attendance policy is ludicrous in classes oriented around lecture without participation. We are all familiar with this type of class where the student is just writing down what is said and possibly only lending to the lecture if he/she were to ask a question. The absurdity of this policy arises from the fact that if it is not followed, the professor has the power to lower your grade, the one you obtained by taking exams and/or writing papers, not one obtained through class participation.

If you think about, it there could not possibly be a participation component or otherwise there would be a lot of disruption as students tried to fulfill that component. The policy leads to a double jeopardy of sorts where grade reductions may come from two sources.

The first source is your possible poor performance on the graded material and the second source is the professor who penalizes you because you are not present. Well, folks, I think we are old enough and intelligent enough to figure out that if our grades are poor because we are not present then we must change the situation. We do not need to be penalized to make us aware of such a consequence.

The student who does well and still misses class is the one who is treated most unfairly because their final grade is not a reflection of a certain level of achievement as they expected, but it is also a reflection of a participation policy that only exists when they miss.

I really don't see why there should be one unless you are on academic probation. People, by now, should be able to take care of themselves. And besides, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy."

Kris Wallenburg

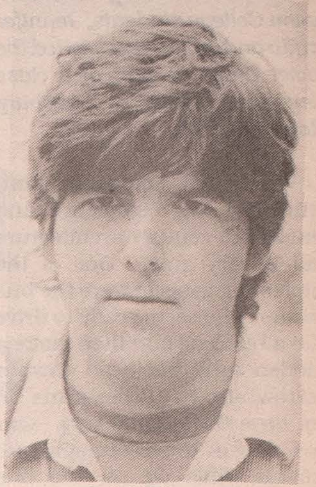
A mandatory attendance policy would treat students as children, not as adults. If students are not responsible enough to go to class, then it is their loss. We pay for the classes we attend and if students wish to waste that money then that is their choice.



Greg Boone

Students should take enough pride in themselves to attend classes. An attendance policy only encourages a passive pursuit of education.

Amy Usilton

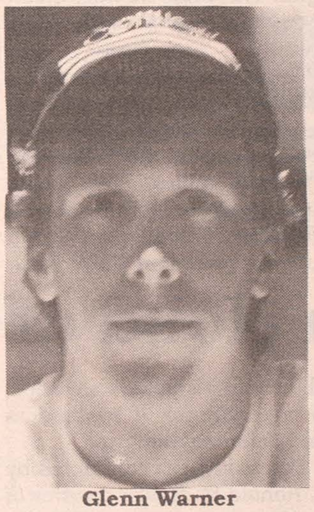
No. This is one of the reasons that I enjoy college much more than high school. Here you are not told you have to go to class. If you don't and you miss something it's your own fault.



Glenn Warner

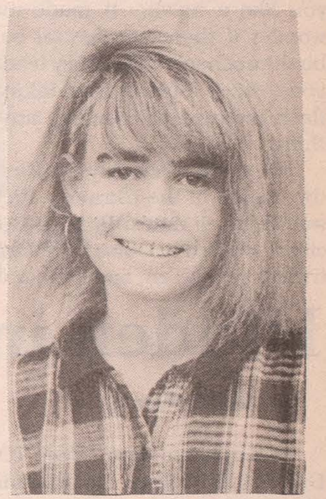
Yes. I feel there should be an attendance policy for freshmen and students on AP.



Sabrina Kenny
Baltimore, MD

No— it's our education. It's our lives. I'd like to be able to make my own choice. I'd like to be able to make my own choice. If I miss a class I have my own reasons and I think that the college should respect that.

Attendance should not be an issue of legislation

John Goebel

There seem to be three types of legislation: moral decisions where the ideas are obscured by sentimental attachments, periodic revamping of past decisions which are outdated, and issues of group stupidity.

Wade vs. Roe, the flag burning legislature, the Helms amendment, and the class attendance issue all are decisions involving stupidity in a variety of degrees and varying conditions of appropriateness. Of these four the most stupid is class attendance as an issue of legislation (next to of course the Helms' Amendment, for no one can top Jesse Helms in recalcitrant ignorance and reactionary didactic ideals). Let us see if we can elucidate the idea behind this laziness and behind the desire to govern that the class attendance issue seems to tote along with itself.

Numbers have a definiteness which poetry lacks, therefore how much does missing a single class cost a student (this is an approximation). A semester of just classes with no room or board cost 5,300 dollars. Say that a student wants 16 credit hours a semester, so that he or she can relax and not kill him or her self but still get the hell out in four years. 16 credit hours breaks down into four classes at 3 hours a week, which is of course 12 hours in the class per week. There are 23 weeks of school in a semester. Therefore, 12 hours (23 weeks)=176 hours for a 16 credit hour semester. How many dollars an hour? About 30 dollars.

I pay for my schooling. I'm not going to repay a loan I received nothing for at 12 percent interest. Sorry, the diploma is a mere formality.

What about the legislative side of the class attendance deal? There are probably not many things that advance the deterioration of respect and believability than legislating responsibility away from an individual. I would want someone to trust me enough to make decision even at eighteen or nineteen years old.

Where is the rationale in demanding student to attend classes and expect them to enjoy learning and want to be educated? Blah, Blah, Blah...

There is nothing likable or cool or even desirable about being stupid, but can you tell some motorcyclist that if you fall off a motorcycle at 8 miles an hour you will die, or that burning a flag doesn't prove your ability in expressing yourself? Class attendance is a decision left to students as a intelligence test. Some will undoubtedly fail, so let them.

Or Washington College will probably legislate mandatory attendance.

Stupidity issues are bile-like and stickly. Intelligence on both sides regarding the monetary side of missing the class and respecting the students appears to be the real issue. The summary sentence will be answered in the future; who will win?

John Goebel is a freshman.

An American in the Soviet Union

By Julie Green

This past January, two Washington College students, Jennifer Griffin and Julie Green visited the Soviet Union as part of a class they were taking at Salisbury State University.

We visited Leningrad first. Leningrad has eighteenth and nineteenth century architecture and is very gray. One of the interesting aspects were the bus drivers, who seem ready to drive into a building and then make a sudden turn and head down a narrow street. Pedestrians do not have the right of way. Our bus drivers drove straight into crowds while we on the bus watched people run for the sidewalks.

The Hermitage, a large art museum, is also located in Leningrad. I nicknamed it the "Hall of Birdbaths." The birdbaths come in all sizes and colors, and if you touch one a babushka (grandmother) comes after you yelling not to touch them. There was one babushka in each room of the museum and she watched you like a hawk. It made me wonder if there are special babushka schools where they teach you to keep tourists from taking flash pictures or touching anything.

We spent a few days in Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine. Kiev was the most naturally beautiful city we visited because the country was very green, and there was little obvious pollution. In Kiev, we visited the Arch of Friendship between Russian and Ukrainians, and three Ukrainian boys were throwing snowballs at it.

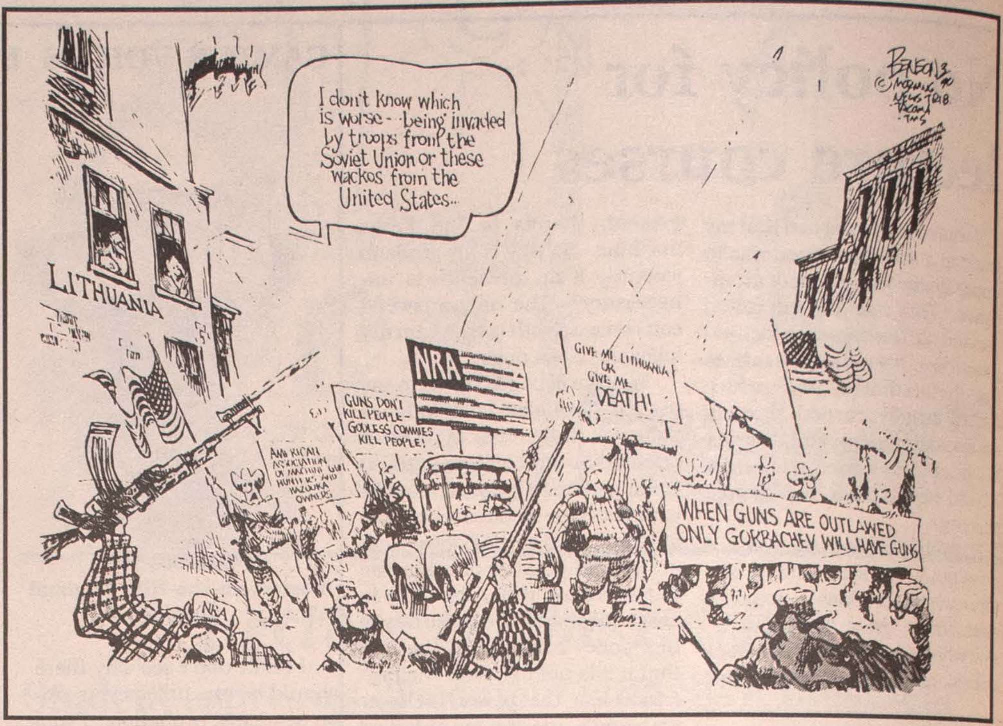
Our last stop was Moscow. Near Red Square there is now an electric message board like the one in Times Square, with ads for Coca-Cola and other American products. Moscow must to have the most beautiful subway in the world. The materials were brought in from each republic. Each station has a different pattern of marble. Beautiful chandeliers hang from the ceiling, while bronze statues, mosaics, or colorful paintings decorate the walls.

One night, we tried to enter Red Square, and the guards pointed their rifles at us and told us to scat. We found our way in through a different entrance. It was very beautiful. Lights shown on St Basil's and Lenin's Tomb. There was a very important meeting going on because we saw limousines racing across the square. When we came back to the US, we found out the Red Army had been sent into Azerbaijan. But while we were there, we did not hear a single thing about it.

The official exchange rate in the Soviet Union is one ruble to one dollar and sixty cents, but the black market rate is one dollar to ten rubles. The black market can be found almost anywhere; the hotel room next to you, your waiter in the restaurant, kids hanging around tourist stops, and people in cars who stop you and ask if you want a Red Army hat (I finally gave in and bought one). The waiter in our hotel offered us a pilot hat. I bought a Red Army pin from a little kid for a stick of gum, and then turned around and saw a soldier wearing the same hat and pin. It was kind of funny.

The food in the Soviet Union leaves something to be desired. Sausage in the US, and sausage there are two totally different things. Soviet sausage is mostly fat with little pieces of meat in between. They also serve a lot of fish, both raw and cooked. Lunch is the big meal in the Soviet Union. It includes an appetizer, soup, entree and dessert. Soviet chocolate is much sweeter than our own.

Ten years ago, mention of the Soviet Union brought to mind Communist soldiers, nuclear war, and the enemy. These feelings are changing. The people of the Soviet Union that I met do not wish to be enemies; they were curious, in a pleasant way, and both friendly and helpful. The Soviet Union is the most complex country I have ever studied. Each republic has its own language and culture. They are a melting pot of their own. And once you see crowds of people standing in line for a small loaf of hard, crusty bread you begin to realize how lucky we are.



I don't know which is worse - 'being' invaded by troops from the Soviet Union or these wackos from the United States...

Hidden in a cloud of smoke, a new trend

By Dan Sperling

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network.

A third of all smokers won't smoke around others, far more than those who refrained a decade ago, according to a study in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association.

But the fallout created by the smoking debate shows: Barely half as many smokers as a decade ago will ask if bystanders mind before lighting up.

The study was conducted by Dr. Ronald M. Davis, director of the Office on Smoking and Health, who analyzed 22,000 interviews with adults in 1987. Davis found that although 80 percent of nonsmokers are bothered by the smoke, only four percent ask smokers to stop.

"The bottom line is that most nonsmokers are suffering in silence," said Davis. "I think most nonsmokers find it very uncomfortable to ask smokers to put out their cigarettes."

The researchers found that in public indoor areas, 33 percent of smokers said they don't smoke around others – a considerable increase from 4 percent in a 1978 poll.

But only 14 percent of smokers said they ask if those around them mind before lighting up – down from 26 percent in 1978. And 47 percent said they light up without asking – vs. 59 percent in 1978.

Stricter anti-smoking laws would remedy that, Davis said "If there are signs on the walls saying, 'Smoking is not allowed here,' nonsmokers would feel more comfortable in asking smokers to put out their cigarettes – and smokers would be less likely to light up in the first place."

Such laws are "Draconian" and "an affront to fairness," charges Tobacco Institute spokesman Thomas Lauria.

"Can't this be worked out the way it's always been worked out, without legislation?"

WC's wet, wild, and wonderful May Day

For one day of the year Washington College undergoes a unique transformation-the student body literally shows its body. That's right, Washington College turns into one big "carnival of flesh." However, there is no need for alarm; there is a perfectly sound explanation for this eye-opening occurrence. It is the school's annual May Day. A time to bare body and soul to the healing powers of Spring. Seniors, in particular, have an extra incentive to show off their birthday suits: they are being paroled from this four year prison and this is their last chance to experience all the hedonistic pleasures WC has to offer.

Phil 'Slice'' Macek

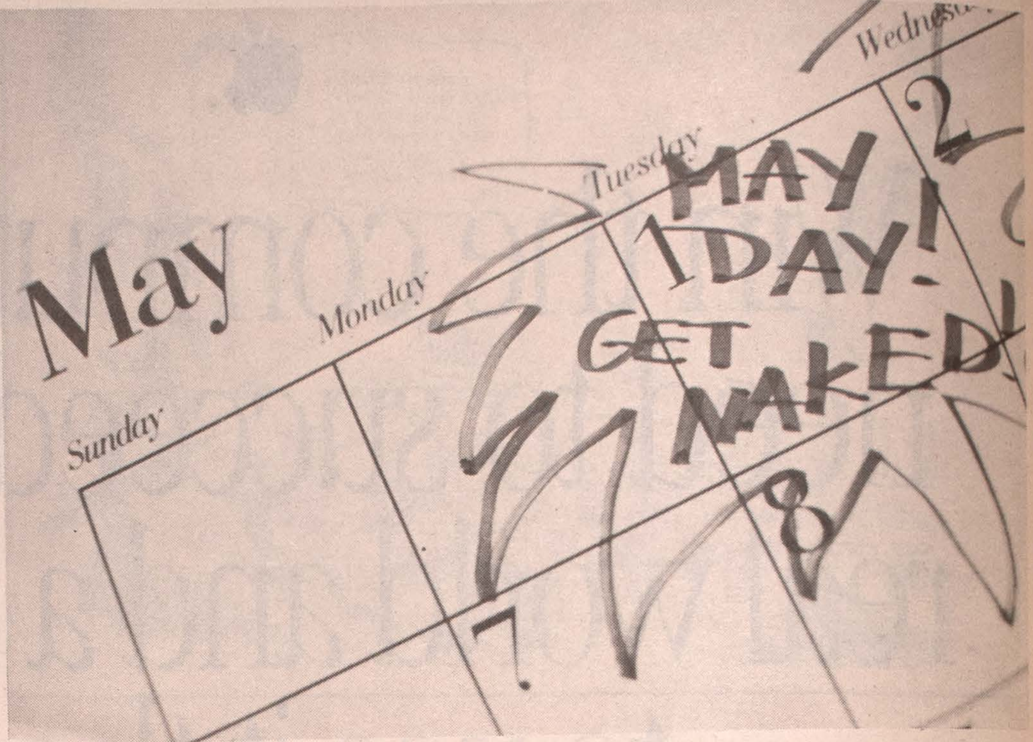
Now just because for one day WC looks like it got hit by the "Nude Bomb," which instantly disintegrates all clothing on impact, is no reason to call out the S.W.A.T. team of moral decency. This nudity is all in good fun; it's no different than sitting in on Dr. Munson's sex lecture in "Baby Bio." There are no drug-induced, steaming orgies (at least not that I know of) on campus.

There have been some good friendly competitions, however, waged around campus. The field in front of Kent House has played host to quite a few nude softball games in recent history. To be sure, these games are taken quite seriously, and surely prove to be a true "Clash of the Titans" every year. The Lit. House is also a happening spot for joyous May Day frolic. Nude volleyball games are in abundance, and a poetry reading is offered as intellectual stimulation for all nocturnal thrill seekers.

While places like Kent House and the Lit. House are good places to get drunk and naked, they definitely play second fiddle to the main site for viewing one's academic colleagues in the buff: the Fire Lane. Activity should be even more enthusiastic this year due to the renovations of the new Fire Lane. What better way to "christen" our new student viaduct than with a nighttime nude festival.

One of my most vivid college memories occurred on May Day 1988. As I stood in the Fire Lane seeing things I had only seen before in my older brother's secret stash of Playboys, I watched Ed DeWaters proceed to literally inhale an entire case of Budweiser by himself. I cannot tell a lie, it was a true revelation, a definite turning point, and I woke up the next day a different person.

The activities engaged in on May Day are very much dependent on Mother Nature. However, come hell or high water there is always some type of fun to be had. On sunny days, the school takes on the appearance of a tropical setting in a Jimmy Buffett song. As sunbathers glistening with oil out in front of Minta Martin, beer and daiquiri parties abound out in Cardinal, and the all-important cookouts dominate the scene in front of Kent House. Yes, for one day the rigors of academics are drowned in kegs of cold beer and blenders full of sweet, tropical frozen concoctions.



May Day is just around the corner. It is a time to peel off those clothes and celebrate Spring.

Now it's time for a little reality break. This is Chestertown, and if typical weather prevails, it will be raining cats and dogs on May Day. However, don't let the sour weather put a damper on your spirit. For example, last year it was raining buckets, and still some claim it was the best May Day ever. There was some serious mud-sliding going on in front of Kent House, and everybody was drinking and having a good time. I think everybody would prefer a nice sunny day, but if the rains come, don't fret; just get out there, grab a beer and have a good time. Hell, beauty parlors charge an arm and a leg for mud packs and you end up getting them for nothing when you dive face first into the mud.

In conclusion, May Day is one of the most highly anticipated days on the Washington College calendar of special events. It's a time for students to come together and share in a celebration of the long-awaited rebirth of the world. I hope everyone will participate in at least some of the activities going on that day.

Furthermore, I would also like to extend a special invitation to Doug and Libby, the administration, and all the faculty to stay on campus and get naked and dance with the students. Believe me, this is no time to think about grading papers and tests. You guys deserve a break just like the students do. I hope to see you all in the Fire Lane on Tuesday night enjoying the spirit of the moment. By the way, I'll be on the steps of the new building conducting my own "best body on campus" contest.

On the first of May - - seize the day!

by Jenifer Grindle

Around mid-April, you begin to hear the murmurs around Washington College campus.

"Do people really go to the dining hall and the library naked?"

"A couple of years ago some guy took his clothes off in the middle of English class."

"Is there really nude volleyball out in front of the Lit. House?"

"The only ones that do it are frat. guys and Lit. House people."

"I heard that everybody strips and then goes sliding in the mud."

"Do you have to take your clothes off?"

"You mean I have to get naked and dirty?"

It all started innocently enough, believe it or not. It started with the reading of poetry, dancing and the drinking of wine in celebration of spring. Its foundation is in the words of Gerard Manley Hopkins, as well as in the phrases "gather ye rosebuds while ye may" and "carpe diem." May Day, the beer guzzling, mud sliding nude fest that Washington College is famous for comes from these intellectual ideas.

It was the spring semester of 1967. Professor Bennett Lamond's freshman English class was discussing Gerard Manley Hopkins' poem "Spring," the traditions of May Day and how its rituals demonstrate that "Nothing is so beautiful as Spring." Caught up in the spirit of the poetry, Professor Lamond suggested to his class that they go beyond simply reading about May Day and hold a celebration of their own. On the morning of May 1, the class met outside, erected a Maypole, and welcomed in spring with wine, cookies, strawberries and dancing. When the festivities ended, the Maypole was taken down.

The following year, the tradition continued, only the Maypole was left standing. That evening, one student decided to welcome in spring his own way, removing his clothes and dancing around the Maypole in the buff. The precedent had been set, and the students soon took over the events on May Day.

Within a few years, more and more young men became bold enough to participate. One year, a group of naked students who were part of a band marched down the fire lane playing their instruments as another student rolled by doing a handstand on his skateboard. Two girls on a motorcycle rode by, bare-skinned, their hair flying in the wind. The mania had spread to the entire student population.

WC became famous, or infamous, for its May Day celebrations some years later when a student named Miami ventured nude outside the campus. He was summarily arrested and transported, without his clothes, to the local jail.

A group of students went to protest his mistreatment, bringing him clothes and chanting "Free Miami!" The protesters, though they were peaceful and fully dressed, caught the attention of the press. The story was spread through the wire service regionally, and made newspapers as far away as Hawaii and London, except their version claimed that a mob of naked students had swarmed around the jail throwing rocks and demanding Miami's release. Thus began the myth of wild, naked abandon began.

Still, in recent years, the poetic origins of May Day have not been completely lost. Poetry readings have been held by the statue of George Washington in front of the Hill Dorms and nudity is always encouraged. The Literary House has sponsored a party with a live band for a more contemporary way of dancing around the Maypole. There was also a certain creativity to last year's events. In the true spirit of campus beautification and in honor of three straight months of rain, students mudslid their way into spring.

More and more students are finding the courage to celebrate May Day the WC way with the help of a six-pack or two. Result: the wild, drunken, naked abandon of the last few years. Streaking remains a favorite May Day activity. A few of the fraternities make group runs through Reid Hall and Minta Martin to make a show for their organization.

Of course, there's always the embarrassment of being trapped in the library if someone locks the door while you're in mid-streak.

When asked his thoughts on what May Day has become, Professor Lamond responded, "It's gross and disgusting...and I'm delighted."

Most freshman, when asked about their expectations for May Day this year, react with a mixture of fear and curiosity. Most of the confusion is still over the real story of how May Day began, even though this story has periodically been reprinted over the years. Rumors also fly that the entire campus, faculty and students alike, walks through the day completely naked.

Upperclassman perpetuate the myths, and take a certain delight in comparing May Day to a Wednesday night at Newt's, without clothes.

Through the myths, nudity becomes the purpose rather than the manifestation of the spirit of the day. Though some may argue that it is pretentious, there's something to be said of the original intention of May Day at WC. There's an element in its philosophy that appeals particularly to the college student, who is till young but who is about to lose some of youth's freedom. Robin Williams' character in "Dead Poet's Society" brings the idea home to us when he whispers, "Carpe diem...seize the day!"

Lacrosse ends regular season

by Julie Schram

The Washington College women's lacrosse team collected another win last Saturday, April 21 as they travelled to Gettysburg. They ran up against the Bullets on a muggy overcast field and played what proved to be a highly intense Middle Atlantic Conference game.

Beth Matthews started the Shorewomen off by scoring three minutes into the first half off of a pass from Sarah Coste. Jenny Blenckstone scored unassisted five minutes after, but then Gettysburg managed to sneak past Washington's defense to score twice against goalie Kristy Hilgartner. Amy Tiehel answered their second goal by scoring off a Coste pass seven seconds later. Each team went on to score once more before halftime, giving the Shorewomen a 4-3 lead. Coste notched the team's last goal of the half.

Washington, determined to maintain their lead going into the second half, saw outstanding defensive play from Beth Matthews, Erin O'Neal, LeeAnne Ludwig and Angela Henneman, who had four interceptions from her defensive wing position. Sam Clements scored twice in the half and managed to spark the offense. Blenckstone collected her second goal of the game with sixteen minutes remaining. Gettysburg scored twice, but Tiehel responded with a goal of her own both times. Although unable to pull ahead, Gettysburg did score the final goal of the game with six minutes remaining.

Coach Diane Guinan, commenting on the Shorewomen's close 9-6 victory, credited the team for having "worked hard, hustled, and played well. We worked harder than we should have had to, though," she commented.

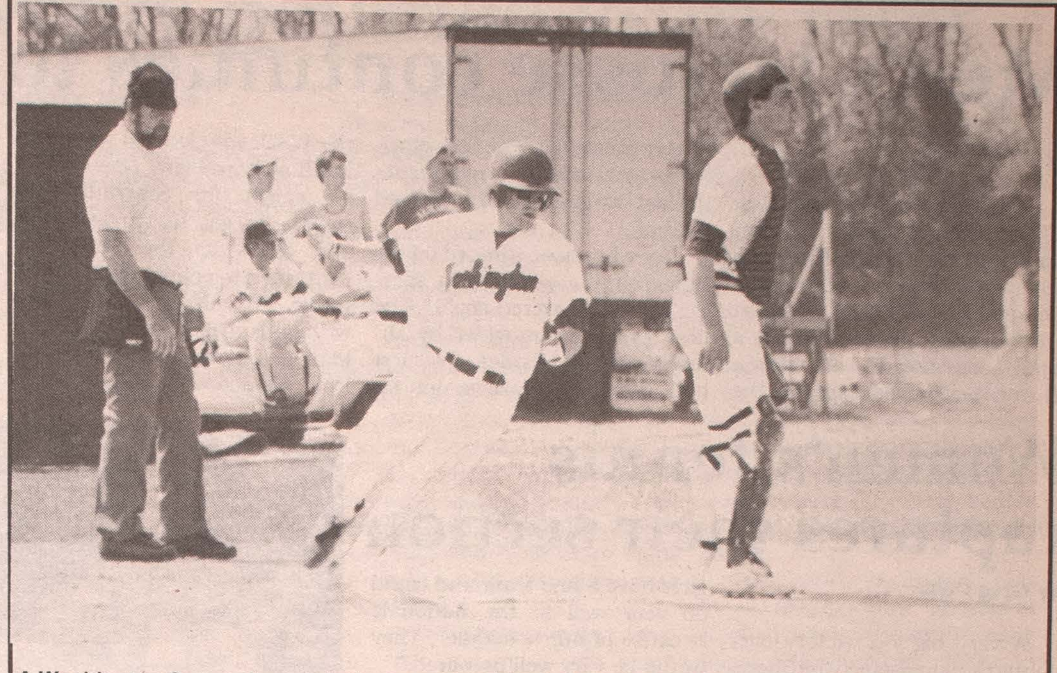
Coming off of this victory, the Shorewomen hosted the Haverford Quakers last Wednesday. They played their final regular season game under beautiful weather conditions, but were unable to defeat this quick MAC opponent.

Clements scored off a Blenckstone pass within the first minute, but Haverford kept the score tied, even after a goal by Coste. With seven minutes remaining in the half, coverpoint Donna White carried the ball from midfield to score unassisted. Haverford still had time to push two more goals past Hilgartner in the half.

The Quakers dominated the second half, scoring nine times, despite Washington's efforts to gain control of the game. Coste netted her second goal and assisted Blenckstone, who scored midway through the half and assisted Tiehel on a goal. Erin O'Neal scored twice, and Clements added her second goal of the game. Haverford had the final goal of the game and pulled off a 14-9 victory.

"I don't think we played as well as we are capable," Coach Guinan said. "Haverford played a better game and deserved to win. Talent-wise we could've beaten them. We just didn't rise to the occasion."

The WC Shorewomen finished their regular season with a 10-2 record, and they are now looking forward to postseason play. The team particpates in the MWCLA tournament this weekend, then will play in the Middle Atlantic Conference playoffs that take place the following weekend, May 4-5. No opponents are known for the MAC tournament, although the games may very well take place right here at WC.



A Washington College baseball player crosses the plate in a recent home game. The team is coming off of a huge win over Johns Hopkins, and they have a doubleheader at home this Saturday against Widener University.

The problems of college athletics

by Brett Lankford

Washington College can be used as an example for many different subjects. The college is an example of a good liberal arts school, the campus is an example of the rewards of renovation, and the town is a wonderful example of a tropical rain forest(although you wouldn't know it from the weather this past week). In addition, Washington College and the people around it can be used as evidence to how successful college athletics can be. The WC athletic program is solid from top to bottom, and the fans in the area are responding to the performances of the teams.

The prominence of collegiate athletics is even greater at the Division I level. The college basketball Final Four and championship game bring in all sorts of money for both the NCAA and the networks who broadcast the games. On any given Saturday during the fall, you can turn to ten different stations and watch a college football game. CBS shelled out huge amounts of dollars to retain the rights to the broadcast of the sport, only to have Notre Dame jump ship and receive nearly as much to play weekly on ABC.

It's now at the point where young boys and girls are not so worried about being a professional athlete when they grow up, since college teams and players get just as much exposure. Instead of dreaming of playing for the Lakers, the Dodgers or the 49'ers, kids now dream of playing in Ann Arbor, Michigan or South Bend, Indiana or Norman, Oklahoma. College athletics is at an all-time high, and things seem to be getting only better for everyone involved.

Or is it? Now that college athletics has completely hit the big time, isn't it time we look at some of the messages that these programs and players are sending to parents and children across the country?

The most obvious message is that winning is more important than anything else. At UNLV, coach Jerry Tarkanian recruited a player named Lloyd Daniels a few years ago. Daniels received unbelievably low scores on his SAT's and had been in high school for six years when Tarkanian signed him on to attend the college. Not surprisingly, Daniels never made it into college basketball. Chris Washburn was able to get into NC State with a 450 SAT score. That's right, 450. You get a 400 just for writing your name. Washburn wasn't even a good guesser.

In addition, a program like UNLV basketball or Oklahoma football gets wonderful exposure. These teams do not run the cleanest programs in the world, but they make millions of dollars a year in television contracts and are consistently hyped by the media. Oklahoma football finally received the punishment they deserved last year, but it took the NCAA an awfully long time to do anything about a program they new was crooked. This win-at-all-costs attitude is being supported far too frequently.

Some schools that used to be known as wonderful schools for academics are now known as sports schools and nothing more. Georgetown University was and still is among the top schools in the nation in regards to academics. Unfortunately, the university is now known as nothing more than a basketball school. You never hear about education anymore when it comes to Georgetown, and that is a shame.

The biggest problem, however, is the fact that almost everyone forgets that the people playing these sports are college students as well as college athletes. It seems that people forget that the main goal of these schools should be to graduate these student/athletes, and the athletes themselves should be seeking out their college degree. What kind of message is being sent when a coach with a .500 record who graduates all of his players is fired, while a coach who is always among the top programs in the nation is able to stay on despite the fact that less than half of his players get a diploma? Coaches want job security, and it is unfortunate that it seems they can only achieve it by going all out for victories and putting education on the backburner.

College athletics has turned into a big business, and it seems that the main goals of these schools should now be to return the academic aspect of college to the forefront.

Men's lacrosse continues to beat top schools

by Matt Giller

Although Washington and Lee (7-4) is a much improved team under their new coach, they were outclassed by the #2 ranked Shoremen (7-3) 12-4. Hobart and Washington are arguably a head above the rest of Division III, and they proved it again in the victory over W&L. The Shoremen have outscored their opponents the last two games by a combined total of 31-17.

The Shoremen jumped on top right from the opening gun, scoring five unanswered goals. The first three were provided by All-American Tim Hormes. The first half was an impressive one for the WAC, who led 7-2 when the halftime horn blew. New Generals coach Jim Stagnitta was unable to get his juggernauts any closer as the Shoremen continued to pepper shots at his goalie. WC outshot W&L 51-25, with both goalies turning in brilliant games between the pipes. Dave Slomkowski turned away nine shots, while the General netminder stabbed eighteen shots but still could not prevent a Shoremen win.

While Hormes paced the scoring with his hat trick, Bob Martino and Ron Council each scored two goals. Middies Steve Klein and Mark Cavallero netted one apiece, and the other goals were supplemented by Nick Darcangelo with a goal and an assist and Brian Johnson dished out three assists to go with his goal.

This Saturday the WAC hosts their Eastern Shore rivals #5 ranked Salisbury State Sea Gulls with the face-off at 1:30. This is the team's final home game of the regular season.

Women's tennis captures their section

by Greg Coss

A very big 7-2 victory over Johns Hopkins helped the Shorewomen take an enormous step for WC athletics. It was the first woman's athletic program at Washington College to win a sectional championship, and the women netters aren't through yet. After Western Maryland defaulted to the Shorewomen after hearing that the Southeastern Sectional was clinched, Washington College now has time to prepare for the biggest match of the year. This all-important match pits the WC netters against Franklin and Marshall at F&M Saturday for the South Sectional Championship. If they were to win this match, coach Holly Bramble said it would be likely that the team would capture the entire conference championship, which would be a tremendous feat for the Shorewomen.

If the women were to win the conference championship, it would leave them at 14-6, which would be remarkable considering their very difficult schedule. The Shorewomen's six losses were to three Division I schools and three top ten teams in Division III. One of their wins was over Holland College, the sixth ranked team in the nation and a likely participant in the NCAA tournament when it takes place this May.

The difficulty of this schedule would leave one hard pressed to understand why the Shorewomen wouldn't be invited to the national party of 12. "In men's tennis," said Coach Wyman, "strength of schedule is critical in determining who makes it and who doesn't. In women's tennis, the committee seems to be concerned strictly with record. I think it's a shame because our girls have a fine team and could do very well in the nationals because of our schedule. They would be very well prepared."

The Washington College women showed their skills while trouncing Johns Hopkins on April 19. Tracy Peel set the Shorewomen on the right foot with a 6-1,6-1 victory over the Blue Jays' Tamar Hausman. Monica Blanco, the #2 player, downed Dawn Stoner 6-1,6-3, and Miriam Dittman polished off Cham Nautiyal 6-3,6-2. After setbacks at fourth and fifth singles, Jennifer Sloan crushed Kathy Buglaw 6-0,6-0 to give the Washington College women a 4-2 lead after singles play.

The WC women netters then swept doubles play in convincing fashion. Tracy Peel and Monica Blanco won in straight sets, as did Miriam Dittman and Rachael Rice. Meg Wheatley and Jennifer Sloan were also winners in two sets, giving the Shorewomen a 7-2 victory. This win set the Shorewomen up for this weekend's grudge match against Franklin and Marshall.

"This one will be a test, but I'm sure the girls can do it," said Wyman. "I look for them to win the conference - they're the best team. We've faced teams much tougher than Franklin and Marshall and faired well. We're very prepared for them."

Who knows what might happen after a Washington College conference championship. A victory at the national championships appear to be a very slim possibility, but you never know. Nevertheless, whatever happens, it's already been a tremendous year for the record setting women's tennis team. Coach Holly Bramble's women netters have already set one record and are looking for more.

Tennis moves to postseason

by Greg Coss

Although very surprised and befuddled by their drop in the national polls from #3 to #7, the men's tennis team kept their composure in defeating Johns Hopkins and Salisbury State. The wins helped them capture the Southeastern Sectional Championship for the fifth straight year. If the team captures victories over Widener and Franklin and Marshall, they will have an opportunity to win the conference championship on Saturday. Their probable opponent in the championship will be Drew, their postseason nemesis from each of the past three years. "Drew has a gine team and this should be a good match," number four singles player Peter Maller said, "We're going to need some support from the students for this one."

The Shoremen whitewashed Johns Hopkins University on April 16, not yielding one set out of the eighteen played in the match. #3 WC singles player Scott Shepard spearheaded the onslaught, defeating Ted Roth 6-0,6-0. Alberto Diaz continued his incredible season in beating the Blue Jays' Bill Braude 6-1,6-1. Peter Maller and Andy Bohutinsky won handily as well, and Allon Rock clinched it for Washington College, defeating John Missner 6-3,6-2. Scott Read rounded out the singles with a 6-4,6-2 victory over Ryu Awai, giving the Shoremen an insurmountable 6-0 lead.

At doubles, the teams of Read and Maller, Shepard and Diaz, and Bohutinsky and Rock all won their matches convincingly. This made the final score 9-0 and gave the Shoremen a record of 16-2. It was a pretty impressive win for WC, since Hopkins had been previously unbeaten in Middle Atlantic Conference play.

The netters' record would be upped to 17-2 after another resounding 9-0 victory, this one over Salisbury State University. In an effort to give Peter Maller, 16th ranked in the South Atlantic Conference, preparation for the upcoming nationals, Coach Wyman placed him at #1 singles. Not by mere coincidence, his opponent was 17th ranked Ron Soliday. Maller responded by coming up with his biggest win of the season, a 6-1,6-1 thrashing over his counterpart. "If we want a shot at the nationals, we need solid play from top to bottom. Peter showed me a lot today," Coach Wyman said.

Roman Inochovsky and Andy Bohutinsky also won easily, and then Scott Shepard won 6-4,7-6 to clinch another Shoremen victory. Allon Rock, at #6 singles, came up with a gutsy 6-1,2-6,6-4 win over the Sea Gulls' Dave Hardesty to round out the singles matches.

Gewer and Read, the nation's second ranked doubles team, won their match 6-0,6-0. Inochovsky and Diaz edged Moore and Lumes, 6-2,7-6, and Bohutinsky and Lim won their match to account for their ninth victory. Peter Maller, however, was the star of the show this day. "That was a big win for me," said Maller. "Now I'm looking for some really big ones."

After Washington College most likely wins its South Atlantic Conference championship Saturday against Drew, they will prepare for the national tournament. Coach Wyman explained why he thought the team's seeding dropped. "It's just one of those things," he answered. "All of the teams behind us had some big wins, and after our loss, even though we beat Swarthmore, the teams vaulted over us. I see no reason to complain, though. These teams are deserving of their rankings and so are we." Despite the recent and sudden drop in their ranking, the Shoremen will get ready to dig in for the championships, and they will look for your support in their match this Saturday at home against Drew University.

After the MAC team event, the Washington College netters continue their tournament play. Aside from a definite bid in the national tournament, the MAC will also hold its individual tournament on May 4-5. This postseason match will give the likes of Read, Gewer, Shepard, Maller and Diaz the opportunity to show off their talents.

Earth Day 1990: twenty polluted years later

by Bruce Hamilton

The twentieth anniversary of Earth Day was celebrated at Merriweather Post Pavilion last Saturday, April 21. It was one of many benefit concerts that if nothing else, attempted to expose problems facing the world.

This concert, however, was a success. It was good music and a good atmosphere. Even if you only bought one of those silly light sticks everybody was waving and wearing, your money went to a good cause.

I got there late and missed a few of the beginning acts, but it was typical Merriweather. People were playing hacky-sack and tossing a frisbee.

A really bad comedian/emcee introduced Crack the Sky, who opened with a great "Across the universe."

Boogie Down Productions was next, incensing the crowd with a dynamic "you must learn," as they criticized the government. The Fabulous Thunderbirds performed a rowdy "My Babe" as well as "Tuff Enuff" and "Wrap It Up". Hornsby did "Mandolin Rain" and "The Way It Is".

Each act had something to say about our relationship to the earth and gave examples of how to take action to halt the destruction of our planet.

The Indigo Girls came on and brought out Michael Stipe. They sang "Kid Fears" as if they'd been singing together for years. Stipe brought out Billy Bragg and sang "Hairshirt."

10,000 Maniacs were probably the summit of the show. Natalie Merchant launched into a 45 minute set of selections from their repetoire. Natalie fell to her knees as she sang, "Poison in the Well". The band also played "Dustbowl", "Trouble Me", "What's the Matter Here?" as well as a powerful "Hey Jack Kerouac". The Maniacs elicited the greatest response from the crowd, people twirled their neon-sticks, making circles in the darkness.

On the way out I bought a magazine from somebody outside the gates. It was a publication filled with organizations and information. It doesn't matter if you don't donate or read any literature. Forget the facts, figures and statistics— stick to things you can do.

Any effort, no matter how small, is important. Recycle at least paper or aluminum. Snip those six-pack rings. Make an effort to stop litter and pick up what you see. Think Globally, act Locally.

Concert features tenor Swenson

by Amy Klamberg

The Washington College Concert Series presents prize winning tenor Robert Swenson this Saturday in Tawes Theater for its final performance of the semester.

A respected performer in the music community who resides in New York and Munich, Swenson has undertaken an impressive variety of performances which have brought him international acclaim.

Swenson studied at the University of Arizona, the Juillard School and the University of Southern California, where his rincipal teachers were Igor Goin nd Charles Roe.

Recognition for his career ulminated in 1987 when Swen-on became the first tenor in early 20 years to win first prize t the Concert Artists Guild In-ernational, New York competi-on. Most recently, he was sec-nd prize recipient in the Concert nd Opera Division for the 1988 lunich International Competi-on.

Over the years, Swenson's erformances at home and road have covered a wide range material, demonstrating his and musical scope that en-mpasses opera and recital for-ats. Debuting in 1988 at Merkin oncert Hall, NY, he has also erformed as part of the San rancisco Opera Schwabacher ebut Series.

His solo presentations have cluded Elliot Carter's In Sleep Thunder, which he performed ith the Los Angeles Philhar-onic in 1985, and he has also een accompanied by the Stock-on Symphony, the Santa Rosa Symphony, the Gottenger Symphony Orchestra in West Germany and the Schaffenhauser Symphony Orchestra in Switzerland.

Swenson's operatic career has brought him in contact with many different people and as well as styles of music; his tours with opera companies have taken him throughout the the US, the People's Republic of China and Europe. Some of the operettic characters he has portrayed include: Almavia in the Barber of Seville ; Alfredo in La Traviata ; Rodolfo in La Boheme; Tamino in the Magic Flute ; and Don Ottavio, in Don Giovanni .

The quality of Swenson's voice has been described by Patrick Franklin of the Peninsula Herald as "near baritone" with a range that "approaches seamlessness." He has a strong handle on the German language and its pronunciation, which has enabled him to gain wide critical acclaim for his German Schubert and Grieg performances.

In reviews of his Barber of Seville performances, Swenson's voice was described as a "refined" and "warm" tenor. Originality is the key to Swenson's winning vocal style. "Even fighting an apparent head cold, he produced sounds that were his own, and lovely to hear with no reference to anyone else, " writes the*Peninsula Herald* .

Swenson's concert will begin at 8 PM in Tawes Theater of the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Students, faculty and staff may use the tickets issued to them last semester. Otherwise, tickets are $8 for adults, and children will be admitted free.

Chemist Molina's environmental crusade

by Jennifer Del Nero
Staff writer

Dr. Mario J. Molina, pioneer researcher of ozone destruction over Antarctica, contributed to Washington College's year-long Celebration of the Sciences by speaking to students, faculty and local community members on the foremost environmental issues confronting the world today.

Molina, who received his Ph.D. in physical chemistry from the University of California, Berkeley, and his team of researchers, including Tai-Ly Tso, Luisa T. Molina and Frank C-Y Wang, meticulously observed and recorded the reactions of chlorine species on ice particles at the National Aeronautics & Space Administration's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, CA.

From the experiment it was concluded that particular reactions occurring on and in the ice surfaces of the Antarctican clouds produce large amounts of the very species of chlorine which actively deplete ozone, O_3. High concentrations of chlorine in its active forms, diatomic chlorine molecules (Cl_2) and chlorinemonoxide (ClO) speed up the destruction of ozone, the layer in the stratosphere that reflects ultraviolet rays and prohibits them from entering the earth's atmosphere.

What these active chlorine particles indicate are low levels of odd nitrogen, nitrogen containing molecules that attach to other molecules because of an unpaired electron in their structure. Otherwise, the reaction would create chlorine nitrate, $ClONO_2$, which is inert with respect to ozone.

Molina and his co-workers discovered that on the polar stratospheric clouds above Antarctica, where the temperature drops below -90 degrees Celsius, chlorine nitrate is rapidly reduced to nitric acid, HNO_3, and hypochlorous acid, $HOCl$—substances which catalyze the destruction of ozone.

The speed of the reaction is affected not only by the hydrogen chloride, HCl, on the ice surface, but by the hydrogen chloride trapped in the ice as well. Molina points out that while ice is not, chemically speaking, a particularly active species, "the surface layers [of ice in the clouds] behave more like a liquid than solid ice." This results in the occurrence of reactions which normally would not take place in ice, reactions which produce the active chlorine particles.

In order to conduct appropriate experiments and to interpret the data, Molina had to take what he describes as an "interdisciplinary approach" combining atmospheric science and chemistry.

What is under current investigation that also requires this interdisciplinary approach is the examination of the role of sulfuric acid, H_2SO_4, in the haze of the stratosphere. Says Molina, "It is conceivable that sulfuric acid particles themselves might behave like ice particles."

At low temperatures and in closer proximity to the Poles, these particles absorb larger amounts of hydrogen chloride, whereas at low latitudes, the acid is concentrated and fails to promote chemical reactions. Over the Poles, the haze grows in direct proportion with the growth of ice.

While research continues in the area of sulfuric acid, there has been an overwhelming response to Molina's findings of chlorofluorocarbons, CFCs, which began in 1974 with the ban of spray cans containing CFCs. The second wave of active response came in '84 when ozone theories were first introduced. Because of published discoveries such as his, Molina says, "Industry agreed to phase out CFCs, and the government eventually responded by regulating CFCs."

Molina believes that governments should get involved in saving the environment, clarifying that "it has to be done on an international level." His pragmatic approach to the problem is to add "some cost to the manufacture and sale of these particles [CFCs] and let the market forces decide who emits what."

Without a doubt, Molina believes that once environmental concerns are expressed to a group of people, they will take action. He feels that for the most part "people are willing to pay to get resources to clean it up," even if it means a few extra tax dollars. But, he emphasizes, people must be educated and effectively change their habits.

The main concern of environmentalists for the future, predicts Molina, is what he refers to as "global change—changes in climate as a result of changes in the atmosphere are big challenges to society." With respect to ozone depletion, Molina maintains that "environmentalists perceive it as a solved problem because people are willing to deal with it."

Yet regardless as to whether the ozone issue is solved, it still exists and will remain, Molina foresees, at least throughout the next century in Antarctica. Although the hole will remain, Molina's goal is that it will not become more severe "because we are preventing the emission of chlorine."

"We know there will be some effects," he concedes, but adds that hopefully, "technology will evolve by the middle of the next century so that one can essentially eliminate chlorine particles...and even the less damaging replacements."

According to Molina, in the future consumers will be more knowledgeable and will flock to organizations displaying an active interest in global conditions: "The stronger industries, those providing a higher standard of living and those that are environmentally concerned, will survive.

It is exactly this type of awareness and action of all people that Molina hopes his research facilitates. "It [his work] is intellectually challenging," he agrees, but stresses, "it is rewarding that it might have some beneficial effects."

The appeal to his work also lies in the fact that "it is an applied, yet fundamental science....You can see the effects of what you do, and simultaneously, the type of chemistry we do is fundamental."

Always thinking of the future, Molina recognizes the need to encourage the youth to enter the fields of stratospheric science and chemistry and says, "What I'm hoping is that I can convey some of the enthusiasm I have to young people in the field."

Recipient of awards such as the NASA Medal for Exceptional Scientific Achievement, the United Nations Environmental Programme Global 500 Award, both for 1989, 47 year-old Molina is currently a professor in the Department of Earth, Atmospheric and Planetary Sciences and in the Department of Chemistry at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Member of both the American Chemical and American Physical Societies, Molina presently serves on NASA's Advisory Committee to Oversee the Scientific Assessment of Atmospheric Effects Associated with Stratospheric Emissions from High Speed Civil Transports. Globally, Molina participated in the UN Environment Program, entitled Scientific Review of the Depletion of the Ozone Layer, held in October of '88 at the Hague in the Netherlands. Also for the UN Environment Program, he authored "Scientific Assessment of Stratospheric Ozone: 1989."

Molina's most recent publications can be found in Science, Journal of Geophysical Research and Oceanus, in which his "The Antarctic Ozone Hole" is printed.

May 7th through May 12th

Monday - Friday: 10 to 12 and 1 to 3

Saturday: 10 to 12

The majority of the books will be bought back by the used book companies we represent. A few, select titles will be bought back by the Bookstore. The used book companies establish the price that is paid and which titles will be bought.

Generally, you will receive about 25% of the original price. If a title has been in publication a long time, you may only receive about 20% of the original price. Similarly, for a title which is in great demand you might be paid as much as 30%. Some books will not be bought. If a book has gone into a new edition or a title has been declared out-of-print by the publisher, it will not be bought. Titles not frequently used at colleges and universities around the nation and books published in a foreign language will not be bought. Additionally, books deemed to be in unacceptable condition will not be bought. "Unacceptable condition" means books with more than 5 loose or missing pages, lab manuals or workbooks with more than 5 pages filled-in and any book missing its cover or a major part of the cover.

You will be required to apply any money you receive to any balance on your Bookstore account. So, if you want to keep the cash yourself, make sure your Bookstore bill has been paid before final exam week!

A word of caution: DON'T leave your books unguarded at this time of year and put your name conspicuously inside the front cover. (Remember, books without covers will not be bought!)

NEWS

Bradlee to speak

Ben Bradlee, the Executive Editor of the Washington Post who led the breakthrough of the Watergate case in 1973, will visit Washington College on Monday, April 30 to participate in a symposium on journalism and deliver a lecture on his experiences as a newspaper reporter and editor. The symposium will take place at 3 PM in the O'Neill Literary House, and the lecture, titled "How to Read a Newspaper," will be held in Hynson Lounge of Hodson Hall at 7 PM on April 30. Both events are free and open to the public.

The symposium, which will take the form of an informal, wide-ranging discussion moderated by President Douglass Cater, will include many representatives from the world of journalism. Cater (formerly the Washington Bureau Chief for the London-based reporter magazine) and Bradlee will be joined by Washington Post Managing Editor Richard Harwood; Julian Scheer, Senior Vice President at LTV Corporation; Roy Hoopes, Washington Bureau Chief for Modern Maturity magazine; H. Hurtt Deringer, Managing Editor of the Kent County News; Susan Di Leo, Editor-in-chief of The Washington College Elm; Tracey Connell, News Editor of The Washington College Elm; Robert Day, fiction writer and Professor of English; and political science Professor Daniel Premo.

In his evening lecture, sponsored by the William James Forum, Bradlee will discuss his work on a new book, tentatibely to be titled "How to Read a Newspaper."

Master Plan

"Bill Smith" lot, especially due to the fact that adequate parking has been such an issue this past year.

Currently in the design stage is a plan to relocate the tennis courts next to the Kibler practice field. Eight courts will be built, but it is not yet decided whether or not they will have lights. This is despite the fact that the tennis team has been at a loss for a lit court this year, having to move inside the gym in order to see when playing.

The Student Center renovations are scheduled to begin in December. Baer stated as soon as results of the SGA survey are available, they will be passed on to the architect. The College also plans to bring in a snack bar consultant who will know "the best way to furnish and organize" the new snack bar. The menu will combine "the best of Miss Dee's with new options" so students will still be able to get their cheese steaks, hamburgers and cheese eggs.

As for cable, Baer says bringing cable back to campus is "not a simple proposition." At this stage, Baer says, the cost is "prohibitively expensive." The College is seeking a long term solution that will network the campus at the lowest cost.

While students who attended the on campus housing lottery conducted by Student Affairs discovered a sign up sheet for students who support their right to have cable on campus, Baer was inconclusive about whether the Washington College administration considers cable beneficial or harmful to the students, saying only that it had been through the proper channels.

Baer concluded by praising the students, who, he says, made it through a "difficult year" of mud and construction.

He also denied rumors that the Elm tree is dying. The tree, Baer says, is "at a very mature stage" and will lose many of its larger limbs. They have started a sapling Elm. American Elms, such as ours, are, in Baer's words, fast growing trees with shorter life spans, and the College wants to ensure that the Big Elm survives as long as possible.

Report

Coleman cited this as an example of student power. "This goes to support the idea that communication can go a long way. With the help of the faculty, administration, and students, this desire became a reality...This situation should provide an example for the future." When asked about the faculty staffing issue in relation to the administration, Coleman stated, "I think they know."

Sarah Hamlin, who represented the English Department, summed up this obvious problem of staffing: "The students' responses to the survey suggested that much is adequate...but their comments and recommendations show that they are interested in more than just adequate education...."

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Spring has finally sprung. It sure felt like a long time coming. With spring comes sunshine, hopefully lots of it right? But too much of a good thing can mean trouble. Be careful in getting your early suntans and also with outdoor sports events. Wear a sunblock and know how easily you burn. Get your tan gradually - you've got all summer. When you're outside drink plenty of fluids to replace what you're loosing through your pores. Don't forget your hat when watching or participating in sports events to protect your face (nose) from the burning rays. So go ahead, be Sun "Gods" and "Goddesses", but be careful out there - the beautiful rays can be harmful.

Saturday is Parents Day. We have a wonderful brunch planned for you and your parents in the Dining Hall from 10:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. featuring:

She Crab Soup
Cheese Blintzes with toppings
French Toast Bar with Fresh Baked Raisin Bread
Cheese Raviolini Salad
Baked Ham
Fresh Fruit Bowl
Assorted Filled Cakes
Homemade Pastries

The evening event will be a Eastern Shore Luau sponsored by the SGA to be held in the Lelia Hynson Pavillion. The buffet will open at 5 p.m. and run until 7 p.m. The menu will include:

Grilled Hamburgers with toppings
Grilled Hot Dogs with toppings
Maui Chicken
Pasta Salad
Fresh Vegetable Baskets
Fresh Fruit

There will be "Boat Races" and a steel band for your entertainment. Hopefully "Mother Nature" will co-operate with us and we'll have fair skies and warm sun!

May Day revelers visited by local police

Students may have to defend May Day tradition

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Many students felt they had to defend their May Day traditions this year when both Chestertown police officers and Washington College Security visited the O'Neill Literary House.

The police interrupted the annual May Day poetry reading on charges that it was "too loud." They threatened that a second visit would enable them to press charges, but according to the local department no information was available to the public as to who filed the complaint or of any of the ensuing events.

According to Director of Security, Jerry Roderick, Security then visited the Literary House after "the noise level went up again. Security attempted to intervene before the police would have to come back, but students were not cooperative."

Security ordered everyone vacate the building.

Roderick stated that subsequently several nude students crossed the road at the crosswalk.

"Passing motorists were not pleased."

The Chestertown Police were summoned again, but, according to Roderick, no other problems occurred on May Day.

Students also dealt with the administration. The Incorrigibles had planned to play at May Day festivities in the Coffee House but were denied the required administrative permission. According to band member Todd Karr, the reason given was that the administration "did not want to sponsor that kind of activity."

According to Dean Maureen McIntire of Student Affairs, the band was denied permission for two reasons.

"We don't do major all campus events during the week," she stated. "And to make an exception during the last week of school before exams...encourages students to do things other than study. If an individual student makes that decision then that's the individual's choice. I just don't think that it's up to the institution to make those endorsements."

McIntire recognized May Day as a traditional student event but felt that the administration should not sanction it. "We've never tried to interfere," she said. As for students, "The best that they can hope for and all we can do is turn a blind eye."

Senior David Johnson thinks this administrative move is "a great double standard. In previous years it's been supported and it's really quite obvious that this year its been suppressed. I know changes in the alcohol policy put them in a difficult position, but in years past we"ve been allowed to have parties. At least they could let a band play." In fact last May Day The Incorrigibles played on Monday of the week before exams.

At the same time Johnson wanted to "speak out for" Secu-

Stenger to move propane tanks

by Susie Mazzullo

The Stenger gas and propane tanks located behind the Cardinal dorms may be removed by the beginning of next semester.

Last week's Kent County News ran the article that announced the relocation of these tanks. Gene Hessey, the Senior Vice President for Management and Finance at Washington College, stated that he had recently confirmed the facts of the article with Carl Stenger, owner of the Stenger Gas Corporation.

According to Hessey, the Chestertown Zoning Commission approved the relocation of the tanks to a location outside of Worton on two conditions: the Stenger corporation must submit a sediment control plan and a landscaping plan to the Zoning Commission before final approval

Trout adresses students' interests

by Tracey Connell
Staff writer

Washington College President-elect Charles Trout addressed a issues from academics to campus cosmetics to Greek organizations in an interview on Saturday, April 28.

Trout began by stating some reasons why Washington College appealed to him. Size and unique opportunities were paramount in his decision to accept the position of president.

He stated, "I think Washington College is an institution that is small enough and vibrant enough to be responsive to change and enhancement." He added that the "liberal arts...commitment at Washington College is clearly attractive."

Trout thanked President Cater for "laying the groundwork" which will make his own job much easier. While many are criticizing Cater for allegedly placing "bricks and mortar" over academics, Trout supported the move to rebuild the campus.

"I don't think that Washington College had skewed priorities in the 1980's. What would those people [who criticize] think of the leadership had they not rebuilt the campus."

Trout then stated that "excellence of the physical plant" effects enrollment and enrollment effects everything else. "If nobody wants to come to Washington College, all the rest is irrelevant."

Because of all that Cater has accomplished, Trout feels that he will be "in a position to pay more attention to faculty and academics," but qualified the statement by adding that, "you're never fully done with bricks and mortar."

One problem area in terms of cosmetics, according to the new president, is the Hill Dorms. "The fraternity graffiti is an embarrassment," he stated.

This lead to Trout's addressing of another major concern that has been expressed by some Washington College students. Some are afraid that he will carry over prejudices against Greek

SGA holds last meeting

by Kyndra Ponder

At its final meeting of the semester last Wednesday, the SGA addressed the quality of President Stuart Neiman's leadership, and heard arguments for four amendments to the Constitution, three of which were passed. Most controversial among them is the amendment which states that the president and vice-president must have at least a 2.00 grade point average to serve in office.

Neiman began the meeting by addressing last week's letter which appeared in The Elm by saying that he responded to the

The new graduation requirement

"...the Senior Survey is a mandatory part of your graduation requirements similar to turning in your room key and returning library books."

This is the slippery and ambiguous statement from the letter—signed by Dean Baer and registrar Ermon Foster—which accompanied the grid survey sent to graduating seniors two weeks ago.

Let's try to figure out exactly what this sentence means. If the Senior Survey is a part of graduation requirements, this would mean that those seniors who fail to fill it out and return it will not graduate.

On the other hand, the letter states that the survey is a requirement akin to returning keys and library books. However, returning these materials is not a graduation requirement in itself.

What a pity that graduating seniors, in addition to all of their other obligations, must analyze a ridiculous sentence in a ridiculous letter accompanying a ridiculous survey.

Beyond the technical standpoint, the implied statement that students' thoughts are lent out to them, like library books and keys, and must be returned to the College upon graduation is ludicrous. Will the next administration mature beyond these childish "if-you-don't-do-what-I-say-I'll-make-your-life-miserable" tactics? It might have been less trouble to simply request that students fill out the Senior Survey, minus the threats. Period.

Furthermore, are students really supposed to believe that their confidentiality will be assured when they are instructed to include their name, social security number, and student ID number? Perhaps the inclusion of the social security number is for reference, when alumni giving time rolls around.

Offended seniors may be interested to know that there is no formal penalty for not handing in the survey. Furthermore, you are not required to answer any/all questions—you can simply turn in the blank survey with the necessary identifying information.

Thanks to the 1989-1990 Elm staff for surviving an experience which no outsider can ever fully understand. Long hours of squinting, brooding, and putting up with an editor who winced (or screeched) each time she heard "I think it's a good idea and I can make it into a really good article." But really, it wasn't that bad.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitation, the editors cannot always publish every letter received and some must be edited for length. Those that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation or grammar. Letters should be signed, except in rare cases where the author's privacy would be violated by disclosure of his/her name. Students should include their year and major. Faculty and staff members should include their positions and departments. Limit letter to 600 words or less and include day and evening phone numbers in the event that clarification of portions of the letter is needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box at the editorial office, or mailed c/o The Elm, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland 21620. Letters become the property of The Elm upon receipt and must be received no later than Wednesday at 8 PM to be considered for publication in that week's issue.

The Elm's business and editorial office is located in the basement of Reid Hall, next to the Reid Hall lounge. Business hours are 7:00 to 9:00 PM on Tuesdays and 7:00 PM to 12:00 AM Wednesdays. The phone number of the Elm office is (301) 778-2800, extension 321.

Letters to the Editor

The grinch who stole May Day

To the Editor:

Well, it's finally happened. The enjoyment of liberal arts at a liberal arts college has been condemned. I refer to an incident which occurred this week at the May Day poetry reading at the Literary House. After a few poems had been read, a Chestertown police cat pulled into the fire lane next to the Lit. House, and an officer informed us that we were being too loud. Our "loudness" consisted of clapping hands and cheering the poetry and the people who read it. No obscenities were shouted, and it wasn't even that late in the evening (around 10 p.m.).

The policeman's reprimand surprised us. We hadn't been rude or offensive; we didn't even think that we'd been that loud. We'd been enjoying some good poems and the company of friends. There weren't hordes of nudists cavorting in the street, either; only two people were naked, and in fact they were both sitting down, relatively out of sight.

When it was pointed out to the officer that were just showing our appreciation for the poetry, his reply was that we didn't have to be so loud. Right. Heaven forbid we show any enthusiasm at all for art of any kind. (And we weren't even shouting, "You suck, you suck," either.) The policeman left us with the promise that if he had to come back, each of us - more than twenty people, mind you - would be hit with a $100 fine. This for applauding at a poetry reading. Wonder what nude cavorting in the streets would get us?

I just wanted to share the news of this event with the rest of the campus, and the campus, and to let them know that going to a reading isn't free after all. It isn't even cheap. It might cost quite a pretty penny, in fact. Does this say something about people's freedoms, or have I just been reading too much poetry?

Thanks for listening,
Clay Eichelberger

Neiman responds to letter of criticism

To the Editor:

In response to Kyndra Ponder's letter to the editor last week, I wish it to be known for the record that with one exception, my actions have been both constitutional and in the best interest of the entire student body. The one exception was a misinterpretation of a clause in the constitution which I believed gave the president the power to set the procedure of the S.G.A. At the meeting prior to the printing of Miss Ponder's letter, I accepted that I was at fault and stood down on the point. Case closed.

As for the rest of her letter, I pay it no more mind than I would a slight pain. I try to analyze the cause and course of the nagging stimulus and having found it to be nothing serious, addresses it with as little effort as possible. Though this sounds like a overly proud approach to genuine complaints, I argue that it is a response to what amounts to nothing more than a personal attack on my personality. While she was kind enough to address my accomplishments (in part) while I HEld other offices, she neglected to recognize or give credit for the positive accomplishments that have been made since I took the office that I now hold. I do not list them here, as to point out that this letter is not meant to defend, rather to respond. Indeed the only aspect of her letter that made it deserving of response was the language that she used. I was indeed impressed with her ability to make use of all those adjectives. As for genuine substance, it seemed to emanate from a disgruntled dorm senator who had neither the guts, sense or diplomacy to face me with her complaints. This has indeed been a problem in much of the senate. I was not elected as president of this student body to be either liked or to increase the number of my friends. I have a job to do, I take it seriously and I get the job done.

If I believed that her opinion was a representation of even the minority of Washington College students, I would do everything in my power to make sure that I made the necessary changes. With all of the letters and comments of support that I have received since the printing of her letter, I am confident that students are happy with the kind of representation that they have received during this TRANSITIONAL period of student government. Based on this, I look forward to a successful year with many accomplishments emanating from the collective efforts of student government as a whole. As for Miss Ponder's letter, I hope that the rest of the student body will forget these immature and baseless comments and will take comfort in the knowledge that she will soon be graduating and thus we will be cured of this remote and insignificant pain.

P.S. I feel a bit funny about coming to the level of a personal attack, but my ego feels much better. Best of luck to everyone in the coming week and the summer months.

Sincerely,
Stuart Neiman

Lithuania as seen from the inside

By Roy Kesey

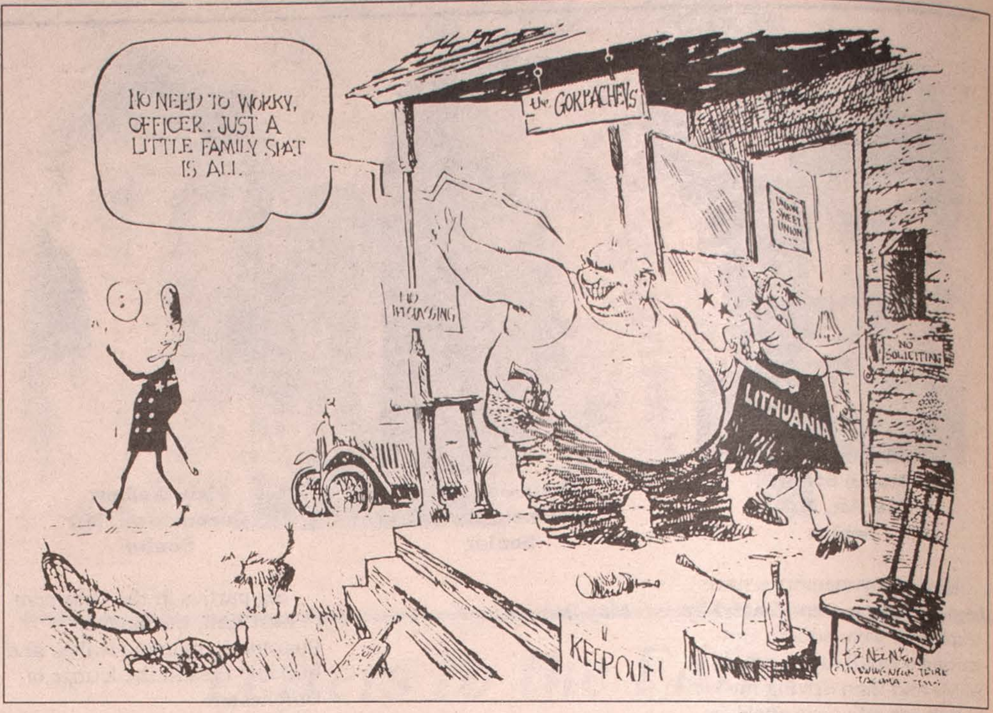
"Tell everyone you meet that we are no longer part of the Soviet Union," said Vilnius University student Elfegas Sinusas. His message was echoed by dozens of other students and faculty gathered in a large classroom here in the Lithuanian capital. Professor of English, Rose Veisaite, declared, "We were never a colony. We were an independent nation. We have been forcefully occupied for half a century, and soon we will be free."

Students and professors are at the forefront of a move toward sovereignty by the Lithuanian people. They always have been. When the Baltic States were occupied by the Red Army at the end of the second World War, the armed resistance was primarily students. They attacked Soviet supply trains and outposts with weapons left behind by the Nazis. These resistance groups took refuge in the forest to elude the NKVD death squads. These 'forest brotherhoods" lasted until 1953, when a final sweep of the forests resulted in the executions of the last Lithuanian soldiers and those suspected of aiding them.

While the forests were cleared of opposition to the Soviet regime, so were the universities. All texts that reflected the non-Soviet history of Lithuania were replaced by a standardized curriculum, designed by Stalin to suppress any latent nationalism.

Now, university libraries are beginning to restock their library shelves with literature from the West. In bookstores across the Lithuanian republic, while forty volume sets of Lenin's memoirs gather dust, Lithuanian, English, German texts are immediately sold out. Technical books are harder to find. "We are caught in a vicious circle," said mathematics professor Algis Kaucikas, "Without hard currency we cannot purchase adequate books and equipment. Without books and equipment, it is almost impossible to rebuild the economy that the Soviet have destroyed, and if we cannot rebuild the economy..."

Still more disturbing has been the repeated Soviet occupation of Lithuanian civil service buildings. The seizures of the National Archives, the National Front headquarters, and most important, the printing plant, have been blatant attempts to provoke violence by the Lithuanian people. If Gorbachev succeeds in this, he will have an excuse to invoke martial law. Male students still face compulsory "national" service in the Red Army. Those that refuse can be, like the ones who took refuge in the Vilnius hospitals, arrested for desertion, which carries a mandatory labor camp sentence.



NO NEED TO WORRY, OFFICER. JUST A LITTLE FAMILY SPAT IS ALL.
the GORBACHEVS'
NO TRESPASSING
NO SOLICITING
LITHUANIA
KEEP OUT!

The Lithuanian people have been, thus far, equal to the challenge, and the students have led the way. The day the Army occupied the printing plant, they also moved on the television tower. There, they were met by hundreds of students who, arms linked to form a protective circle, blocked their way. The Soviet soldiers retreated.

There is little doubt the attempts at provocation will continue. Added to these problems is the economic blockade, which has exhausted supplies of oil and natural gas. But these student activists are not the violent radicals that made headlines on both sides of the Atlantic in the 1960's. They know that a military confrontation would bring only a swift and crushing defeat. They believe at some point, international censure will force Gorbachev to recognize their right to self-determination.

To be sure, desire for freedom burns in the people of Lithuania. But the patience of these people is also unshakeable. Or as Juras Banys said, "we have waited fifty years for our freedom. What Gorbachev does not realize is that if necessary, we will wait another fifty."

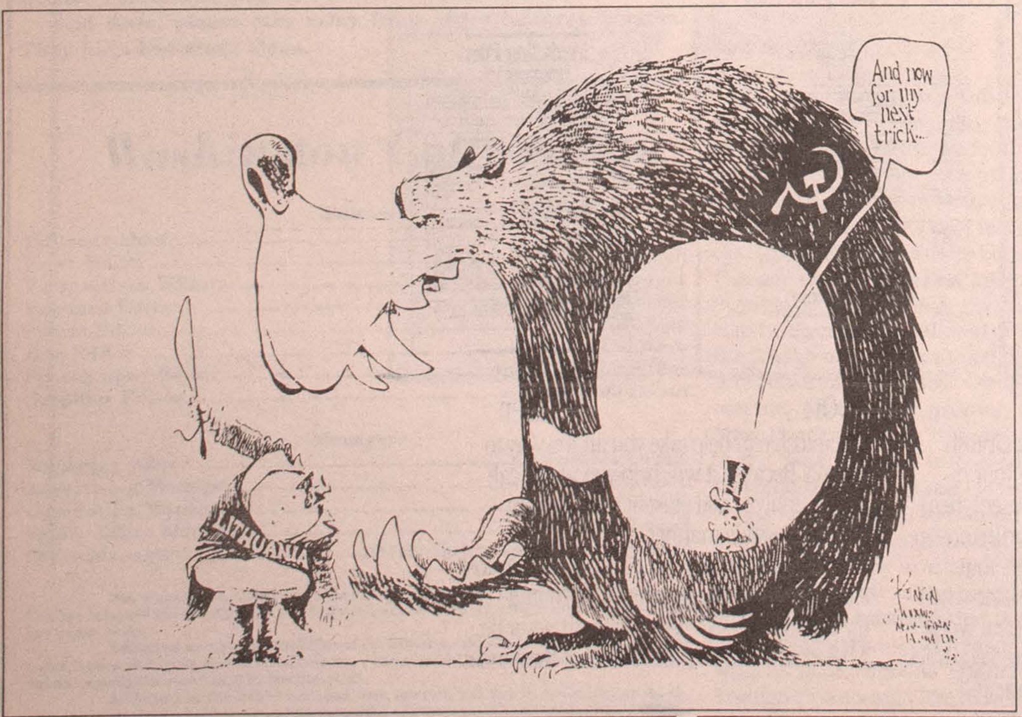
Roy Kesey is a junior spending a year at Manchester College. He visited Lithuania this spring as a member of the Oxford Soccer team.

News from around the world: adultery trial

In Wisconsin, Donna E. Carrol, 28, will be arraingned next month on charges of adultery, which carries a $10,000 fine and up to a 2 year prison term. Many states still have laws prohibiting and punishing adultery. Her lawyers, including one from the ACLU (American Civil Liberties Union) want the law declared unconstitutional, on the grounds the law violates the defendants right to privacy, equal protection under the law, due process and freedom form cruel and unusual punishment. They have also called into question the justness of the charge, filed by her husband, since he admitted to having an extra-marital affair. And the ACLU has requested the law be stricken from the books since adultery is no longer grounds for divorce in Wisconsin.

Vietnam

Nguyen Van Thieu and Nguyen Cao Ky, former leaders of South Vietnam have been touring the US, Europe, and Asia in an attempt to build a personal following, and to find roles for themselves in Vietnam's future. The two have denied any personal ambition instead offering to help rebuild a post-Communist Vietnam. Both, in separate interviews, however, made it clear the Vietnam War is not over for them. They view the fall of Communist governments in Eastern Europe as a sign that change will come to Vietnam soon as well. The two men were political rivals in Vietnam and have led relatively quiet lives since leaving the country.



And now for my next trick...
LITHUANIA

East Germany

The newly elected East German prime minister called for changes in the "structure and strategy" of Nato while visiting Moscow. Soviet President Gorbachev repeated the Soviet opposition to a united Germany's membership in Nato. Although, de Maiziere said he and Gorbachev had expressed differing opinions on Nato membership, he expressed optimism that differences could be resolved at the upcoming negotiations on German reunification to be held between the foreign ministers of both Germanies and the 4 allies powers of World War II, the US, Soviet Union, Britain and France. Gorbachev stressed the need for the synchronization of the issues of German Reunification and a new security structure in Europe. American and Western European officials say they believe the Soviets will want to maintain troops in eastern Germany for several years, since Gorbachev could be under pressure from veterans and military men.

Romania

In Timisoara, tens of thousands of demonstrators called for the resignation of interim president Ion Iliescu whom the accuse of seeking to reestablish some form of Communism in Romania. Iliescu is the head of the National Salvation Front which will run the government until the elections on May 20. Iliescu is also running for President in the election. Communist Party Secretary under Ceausescu, Iliescu fell out of favor and was only given unimportant posts. Iliescu and the National Salvation Front have been the targets of many protests.

Phallic symbols dominate WC's campus

As a student at Washington College, I can hardly help but notice the new visual imagery in the firelane. This imagery strikes me as a monument to white male superiority.

The new Academic Resources Center (the ARC) is supported by hollow, white, synthetic columns. These plastic pillars tower over the obviously inferior, black lampposts leading down the firelane to the crosswalk. There the firelane ends with three short black posts. This visual imagery merely adds to the racial prejudices at Washington College and in the surrounding community.

Another excellent example of obvious racism is the painting over the Deans' and President's secretaries' desks in the lobby of the Buntagon. Note the slave on one knee in the foreground, working below the tall, rich, well-dressed, highly esteemed, white educated men receiving degrees. What kind of image does this project to someone visiting our campus?

The answer lies in the Kappa Alpha Handbook under "Old South Day." These displays of blatant bigotry reflect neither a moral nor a respectable point of view. They reflect a racist point of view similar to the KKK (only we use poles instead of violence). As a liberal arts college, we should do something to change the tides flooding our system, but these things take time.

As an artist, my first inclination is to change the visual imagery so that it does not encourage racial prejudices and tensions. All of the columns ornamenting the ARC and the lampposts lining the firelane should be painted gray. Then it is no longer a matter of black or white; it's just another shade of gray. As for the three small black posts at the end of the firelane, they should be alternately painted black and white to display integration and unity. Fine.

Denise O'Connell

Problem solved? No. What we have failed to consider is that all of these black and white poles are phallic. Phallic symbols are springing up all over the campus. The firelane is lined with phallic symbols. What is this, ancient Greece?

The large synthetic pillars of the new ARC and the lampposts are phallic enough, or so you would think until you reach the end of the firelane at the crosswalk where three giant phallus protrude from the ground.

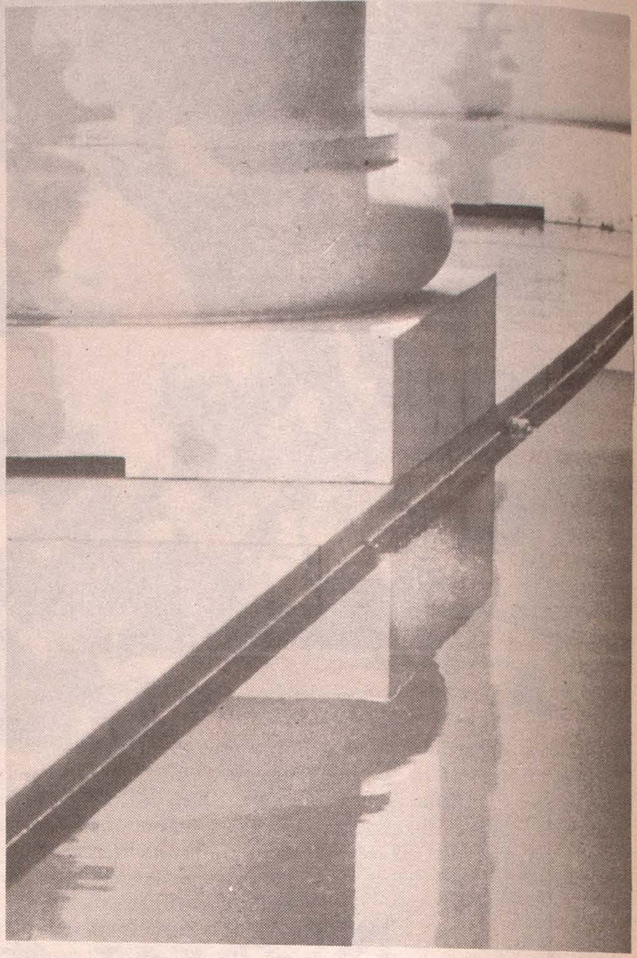
These phallus, erected to prevent cars—and fire trucks—from driving up the firelane, "visually rape women," stated a casual observer. They imply male superiority by "towering over" and "dominating" the firelane space. The female form has been seriously neglected visually on campus. However, these spatially positive forms, the poles representing the masculine, do not compare to the spatially negative space, the air representing the feminine; this theory does not allow for the visual awareness of the female presence.

In order to provoke awareness of the feminine gender, I have designed two feminine sculptures to balance out the crosswalk section of the firelane (models of these sculptures are on display in the design studio of the Constance Stuart Larabee Arts Center).

Made of cardboard, glass, rubber, wax paper, paint and corn syrup, "Born Again" and "Born Again Clone 1," accentuate female sexuality while they imply the process of birth. When done in actual size (7 1/4 ft. X 3 1/2 ft. X 3 1/2 ft.), these sculptures will be placed behind the brick entrance's benches in the firelane. From the firelane side, one can look through the table (4 3/4 ft. to 6 1/4 ft. high, 1 1/2 ft. in diameter), as if looking through the birth canal, while watching the embryo-like form "floating" inside the base. The crosswalk's and Route 213's view shows the flower-like, curved, semi-closed end of the tube projecting out toward the street.

This takes some attention away from the phallic "car-stoppers" while keeping an even balance within the space. The sculptures, made in actual size, will be donated to the school for the firelane in care of the Washington College Art Department. They will stimulate the visual interest of the community as well as display the female form as something positive.

This visually solves the firelane problem, however, with a problem so all en"campus"ing, the firelane is only the beginning. I suggest that the members of the first sculpture class at Washington College each design and build a gray sculpture, implying the sculptors' opposite sex, to be placed where it is needed most.



"This imagery strikes me as a monument to white male superiority."

Perhaps to replace our recently lost, biggest phallic symbol on campus, the water tower, or maybe behind Kent House. The artists will decide where it is needed most.

Perhaps they should erect a phallic sculpture in the lobby of the Buntagon, and take down that horrible painting! Visually, the problem of the dichotomy of blacks and whites, and males and females is solved.

However, with such a deep rooted problem, curing the symptoms only begins to help the problem—what we need is a change of attitude.

The Washington College 1990 year in review

Profound, concluding words from Slice

While the academic year winds down and summer plans are being made, I'd like to take this opportunity to look back on the year that Washington College has endured. Overall, I would like to reminisce about the events, both good and bad, that helped redefine the school's direction for the 1990's and beyond

First off, there were the physical changes modifying the look of the campus. This institutional "face-lift", as proposed by President Cater's "Master Plan", gave us a new fire -lane chock full o' benches and lampposts with little eagles on them- as well as a new building that will house new offices along with other student resources.

While these new facilities will eventually prove to be very beneficial to the college in the future, lit's not forget the negative side effects of all this construction. Mainly, this construction drowned the school in mud and plenty of it. Secondly, there was the presence of WC's "adopted brothers"- the workers of Bob's Backhoe Service.tm Some of these guys, while working very slowly and sporting beards of ZZ Top proportions, would look at our fine female students with bulging eyes becoming of sex-starved men stranded on a tropical island for forty years. Come on guys, take your eye off "the prize" and get our new building finished before this year's freshman graduate.

Phil "Slice" Macek

Lastly, there was the recent addition of a fine mound of cow manure in front of Kent House. I remember walking by it for the first time, thinking it was dirt, until my olfactory nerves clearly told me that the scent I was catching certainly wasn't Chanel No. 5.tm Who suggested that we get a big pile of foul-smelling fecal remnants anyway?

Finally, on the opposite side of construction, I tearfully lament the evil dismantling of one of the greatest structures human hands have ever produced: Washington College's answer to the Eiffel Tower, the Water Tower. Yes, this edifice was truly a grand landmark, and I think that the perpetrators of its downfall are war-seeking, Satan-worshipping, Geraldo-watching communists.

At this point , I would like to get away from the physical look of the campus and focus on the people of Washington College- the people that make this school the finest, friendliest damn little college in the world.

Throughout the year, as everyone knows, there have been certain student outbursts that the administration has deemed simple unacceptable. Mainly, I refer to the malicious and purely evil behavior of the those damn drunken basketball fans. You "sons of Satan" know who you are, and you better repent and change your wicked ways before next season. If you don't mind your manners, other weather beaten country bumpkins will write the President claiming never to attend another WC sporting event as long as they live.

While some students can be held responsible for the deterioration of the human race, there are times when students can join together in angelic harmony to produce an atmosphere of pure love and joy. I speak mainly of the Birthday Ball and the recent SGA Luau. These social functions produced in the students a complete sense of euphoria, consequently suppressing all feelings of demonic evil and belligerence.

However, while applauding this school's fine students for making their college unique, don don't underestimate our wonderful faculty and administration that strive to make this school and academic have for all intellectually minded individuals.

I would, at this point, like to give due respect to the man who has rejuvenated the pursuit for rigorous academic challenge at this college; a man who has put the "wackiness" back in the WAC: President Cater. His doctrine of "writing across the curriculum" has instilled a new vigor in the classrooms of this institution. His trail-blazing fundraising schemes raised this college to a new status, and put this school head and shoulders above other small liberal arts colleges. If I may be so informal, Doug, congratulations on all your success, and we, the people of Washington College, your adopted children for eight glorious years, thank you for guiding us to the threshold of the 21st century.

In conclusion, while this year was filled with ups and down. I think real progress has been made in improving the school. I , for one, look forward to the completion of the "Master Plan." Yet, there are some in our midst who will not be around next year to see the fruition of Cater's grand vision.

Thus, to our graduating seniors I'd just like to say "Bon Voyage," and if any of you ever cone back to visit, look me up, and I'll buy your a beer down at Andy's. Just remember that when your walking down that brick walkway for the last time, diploma securely in hand, George Washington himself is smiling down upon you with special favor because you were truly an asset to this magnificent school. In closing, I would like to say, "Have a good day and a better one tomorrow. Peace."

Congratulations to Slice on becoming next year's feature s editor. I know he will add spice to these pages.

Highlights and downfalls of freshman year

by Amy Klamberg

Well, it's that time of year again! Softball games on the lawn, May Day, sunbathers by the pool, and reggae music blasting from dorm room windows all let us know spring is here, and the 1989-90 school year is almost over. Spring, and the end of school, are seen by many as a time of reflection. As you stare out the classroom window to a clear blue sky, it is easy to find yourself in mid-daydream, pondering what the past school year has brought.

> The positive aspect of my freshman year was becoming more independent by not depending on my family so much and in affect becoming more of my own person and realizing that in order to achieve my goals, I must work towards them myself and not allow someone else to do it for me.
> —Lisa Jones, freshman

For freshman, this period of introspection and reflection has a special meaning. Having gone through the first year of college, they can proudly say they have survived one of the biggest adjustments they will probably have to face in their lives.

When asked to look back on their first year, freshmen responded with a wide variety of emotions and memories. One freshmen summed up her year with the adage "school is hell, men are scum, life is pain!" to Lori Hastings who commented "It was great! Two thumbs up! I laughed, I cried, I became a part of Washington College."

Freshman year consisted of highs and lows. One major frustration of the year, for all students but particularly for the freshmen waiting in line forever, was arena registration. Cheryl Rinehart recalled, "Bring a freshman at registration took about fifteen years off my life. Unless it gets better I'll have lost 40 years by the time I'm a senior!"

Hectic class registration was just one of the many aspects of college life freshman found they had to adjust to . Many discovered that strict schedules are more difficult to keep on campus. The consensus was that a person has to be more spontaneous in college because life is just a little more unpredictable, like the real world. "Balancing more work and social life has been the hardest thing to adjust to since I've been here" reflected Tad Hershey.

> The most positive aspect was meeting new people and making friends while being totally independent and responsible for your own life.
> —Michelle Harrison, freshman

Freshman students have found freedom, as well as frustration and increased responsibility in their new lifestyle. In addition to the new academic opportunities they have found open to them, freshman discovered that they can take the initiative and start clubs, fraternities, or ritually pursue any interest they like on campus "Helping create the Phi Delta Fraternity was one of the most successful, memorable aspect of my freshman year. That is definitely not the type of thing I could have done in high school," Hershey added.

Along with the new opportunities of college comes the meeting and dealing with a variety of new people. These new influences, academically and socially, along with a new sense of independence, are what cause people to change so much their freshman year. Andy McKim concluded that in the future "When I look back on my freshman year, the thing I'm going to remember the most is how much I changed from orientation weekend to this point!" The freshman interviewed agreed that their independence, and new friends have been the most memorable aspects of their freshman year.

When asked what word or phrase might describe her freshman year, Kelly Huber responded with a smile, "It's been utter insanity!" At this point in the year, right before exams, it's no wonder that people are looking back on their freshman year and feeling that it has been crazy or exhausting; for the most part, this feeling of exhaustion reflects a sense of fulfillment that comes from successfully adjusting to a new way of life.

> The most positive thing was meeting new people and starting over from high school. It's good to get new look.
> —Curtis Campbell, freshman

Women's lacrosse earns honors

by Julie Schram

Wrapping up their 1990 season at home last Tuesday, Shorewomen lacrosse suffered their third loss of the year. This defeat came against the fifth ranked Franklin and Marshall Diplomats, 13-4. Despite the wide scoring margin, Washington College (currently ranked thirteenth nationally) played a quick, aggressive game, and saw an exceptional defensive performance by goalie Kristy Hilgartner. Donna White, Amy Tiehel, and Jennie Blenckstone, with a pair of goals, combined for the WC scoring.

Finishing the season at 9-3, Washington wound up an impressive season, outscoring their opponents 151-89. The team's only losses came against teams ranked in the top ten in the country, and the Shorewomen spent two weeks at number ten themselves. This is the highest national ranking for any women's team in history of Washington College athletics.

As of April 21, when the latest polls and statistics were released, first-year goaltender Kristy Hilgartner was the leader among the Middle Atlantic Conference goalies, having the fewest goals scored on her by her MAC opponents.

Sarah Coste and Jennie Blenckstone are among the point leaders in the MAC versus conference opponents. Coste stands at number two in conference scoring, while Blenckstone is at number five.

Beth Matthews was recently selected to participate in the Lacrosse Foundation North/South Senior All-Star Game in June at Johns Hopkins University. She was chosen from seniors playing in Divisions I, II, and III and Matthews is the first woman at Washington College to achieve such an honor.

Eleven players from the Shorewomen squad will travel to Baltimore on May 12 and will participate in the United States Women's Lacrosse Association South Tournament. Beth Matthews will play on the first select team. In addition, Jennie Blenckstone, Kristy Hilgartner, Erin O'Neal, Carole Reece, Amy Tiehel and Donna White will be playing on Team II, and Sam Clements, Sarah Coste, Jamee Dammon and Amy McCleary were all selected as alternates for these USWLA tournament teams.

Tennis captures MAC championship

by Greg Coss

As expected, the Washington College men's tennis team won the Middle Atlantic Conference championships, but their opponents were a big surprise. Albright College stunned Drew University 6-0 in the MAC semifinals, ending a four year run in which WC and Drew met in the finals. Drew had given WC problems in the past, so the consensus feeling among the Shoremen players was that this championship would be tightly played. This was not the case, however, as WC played as though they were out to prove the polls wrong.

The championship was quickly decided, probably in about the first 45 minutes, as the top singles players rolled to victory. #1 singles player Larry Gewer won his match with little problem, 6-3,6-1. Scott Read, playing at #2 singles, wiped up his opponent 6-0,6-1. Peter Maller, at #3 singles, continued his hot streak, winning 6-3,6-1. Scott Shepard and Roman Inochovsky also scored big singles victories to clinch the match, and then Andy Bohutinsky provided the icing on the cake. After winning his match's first set 6-1, Bohutinsky seemed to run out of gas, trailing 5-2, 40-15 in the second set. Amazingly, Bohutinsky was able to survive the two set points and pulled the set out in a tiebreaker(7-1) to win the match.

The doubles teams continued the onslaught. Read and Gewer won again, this time by a score of 6-1,6-2. Alberto Diaz and Jim Lim also won in straight sets, 6-3,6-1, and Shepard and Allon Rock were victorious to finish off the drubbing of Albright 9-0.

To reach the championship, WC knocked off Widener and Franklin & Marshall. Both victories were just as resounding as the Albright match, 9-0. Against Widener, which was a home match with an excellent turnout, the men only lost eight games total in their singles matches. It was the most convincing victory of the year, as the doubles teams were just as dominant.

In the Franklin & Marshall match, held at F&M, Scott Read had the toughest match, winning 6-4,7-5 at #1 singles. Outside of that match, the rest of the scores were almost as convincing as the Widener match.

Now WC looks ahead to the individual events at the MAC tournament. Peter Maller, last year's singles champion, looks forward to defending his title. Washington College's other participant in the singles event, Andy Bohutinsky, should put pressure on Maller to retain his title. The sole doubles team will be Alberto Diaz and Allon Rock, the likely favorites in the event. After these events come the nationals, where the Shoremen hope to show some heart and challenge for the national championship.

Crew prepares for Dad Vails

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The Washington College crew team has been preparing for the Dad Vail Regatta this entire spring season. The Dad Vails are extremely prestigious, and coaches Mickey Dulin and Don Chatellier have been anxiously awaiting this event since the team first hit the Chester River this past fall. Three boats from the WC crew team will compete in the Cadle Cup this weekend, then race move on to Philadelphia and the Dad Vails on May 11-12.

The team will not send any eight boats to the regatta, and instead they will be represented by three four boats. A men's varsity four, a men's novice four and a women's varsity four will all take the water for WC. These four boats will all train together for the next two weeks in order to refine their technique.

The women's varsity four boat will be made up of Elizabeth McGee, Elizabeth Speer, Stacy Maenner and Jennifer Mauser, and they will be coxed by Kristin Schneeloch. "This boat has improved a lot within a span of one week, and they have improved steadily all season. These women deserve a shot at the Vails," said Chatellier.

The men's varsity four is blessed with an abundance of power in the boat. Greg Terry, Whit Maroney, Vicco von Voss and Than Hansen will row in the varsity four, and Mindy Stark will be their coxswain. "This boat has been up and down this year," Chatellier commented. "They won earlier this year against LaSalle, and this past weekend they missed an opportunity to row in the finals at Bucknell by 3/100 of a second. Still, this will be the first time they have been able to train together as a four boat for almost two weeks, and they should be ready."

The other men's boat at the Vails will be the novice four. That boat will be comprised of John McCarthy, John Mulvany, Todd Sowden and Rod Benson, and they will by coxed by Liz Carone. "They have not had much of a chance to row as a novice four this year," Chatellier noted. "They raced together once and rowed very well. They're working together a little bit, and I think they have a reasonably good chance to have a strong showing at the Vails."

On the whole, the coaches seem very optimistic about their prospects for the Dad Vails. Chatellier noted that everyone was reasonably healthy at this time, and that they should be relaxed and in control going into the race. "We don't have any pressure on us, because no one is really expecting us to compete. We might be able to surprise a few people."

Before the Dad Vail Regatta, the boats will first compete in the Cadle Cup. Chatellier called this race a "Dad Vail Preview", since they would be rowing against such stiff competition as Georgetown and George Washington. The heats at the Dad Vails begin on Friday, May 11, and if any WC boats qualify they would advance to the finals on Saturday, May 12. Coaches Dulin and Chatellier hope that their three solid boats will be able to perform well and bring respect to the Washington College crew program. It seems that the Dad Vails may be the perfect opportunity for WC to gain this respect.

Keehan earns two scholarships

by Matt Giller

During the last couple of weeks another chapter was added to the Shoremen basketball storybook season. Captain Tim Keehan received one of four postgraduate scholarships awarded to basketball players in Division II-III. Along with this $4,000 scholarship, Keehan was offered the outstanding opportunity to be graduate assistant at Mount St. Mary's College in Emmitsburg, Maryland, which includes $6,000 plus tuition remission in the MBA.

Besides providing leadership as captain and 4 year letterman, Tim has proven himself in the classroom as well, compiling a 3.310 GPA. He is a member of the Omicron Delta Kappa National Honor Fraternity and has been on the Dean's List for the last three years.

Tim is also an active member of both the Faculty Athletic Committee and Athletic Advisory Committee. He was named first team All-American for the MAC region in 1988-89 and was named to six all-tourney teams. Keehan led the basketball team to the winningest four years in Washington College history that included 3 NCAA appearences. He personally locked himself into the record books by scoring over 1500 career points, placing him second in the school's long and distinctive history.

With those accomplishments behind him, only a bright future lies ahead. "Being a scholar-athlete has opened up a lot of doors that wouldn't have been available otherwise," Keehan affirms. Not only can his academic dreams be fulfilled, but his strength on the hardwood has given him another option he hopes he can fulfill as well. This summer he plans to travel to Somerville, N.Y. with Chris Jamke to tryout for a select team that hails from Holland. Keehan realizes that a quality education lies ahead of him, but would like to test the waters of European professional basketball in hopes that it will prepare him more for whatever his future endeavors may be.

Although no speeches were granted at the athletic banquet Tuesday night, Tim would like to thank all the faculty and peers that supported his efforts. Tim Keehan, who has never taken his fine education at Washington College for granted, will certainly not waste the tremendous opportunities that await him. Whichever road Tim decides to take, he will make the most of it.

Lacrosse shoots down Salisbury's Sea Gulls

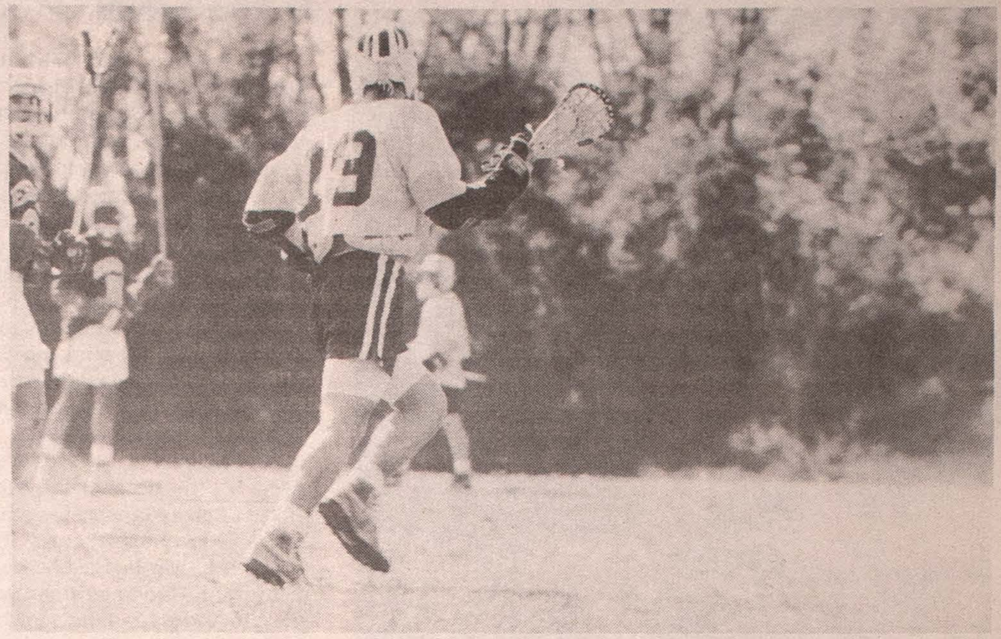
by Matt Giller

Last Saturday afternoon the Shoremen (8-3) increased their win streak over their Eastern Shore rivals Salisbury State University (9-3) to ten straight. The Shoremen were able to fight off the 90 degree heat and the Kibler Field dust to defeat the Sea Gulls 14-12.

Bob Martino, who played one of his most inspiring games of the year with a hat trick, opened up the scoring on the Shoremen's first shot. Steve Klein and Tim Hormes followed, stretching their first quarter lead to 3-0. But then the visitors netted two of their own. Jed Cronin and Greg Mouracade completed the scoring for the first half as the horn sounded, with WAC leading precariously 5-4.

The third quarter saw the two teams trading goals. Martino and Cronin scored for the Sho'men, making the score 7-6 Washington before Salisbury got it by Dave Slomkowski two straight times. But when they needed it, Martino was able to supply another key goal and Cronin followed. Junior Geoff Hall's two goals and Cronin's blast opened the fourth frame with a few scores, increasing the home team's lead to 11-8. But the Sea Gulls' juggernauts never let up, scoring three goals of their own and cutting the lead to 12-11. Greg Rupert and Hormes completed the scoring to fatally wound the Gulls and send them squawking back to their nest.

The Shoremen travel north to lock sticks against West Chester State this Saturday. Hormes' two goals this week increased his season total to match his uniform number at 33 and added on to his career sum of 178 goals. Only Ray "Flip" Wood, who netted 187, and John Cheek at 212 are in front of Tim on the career goal scoring list.



The men's lacrosse team won last Saturday over Salisbury State, and they begin their playoff run with a home game on May 9th.

WC athletics continue on to postseason play

by Brett Lankford
Staff writer

The month of May has finally rolled around, and that means that the Washington College athletic programs are preparing for postseason performances. Four of this school's seven spring sports have earned the right to participate in an assortment of tournaments, and they hope to equal their regular season success this month.

The men's tennis team will move on to the Division III championships at Swarthmore from May 13-20. Coach Fred Wyman's crew is seeded fourth in the tournament, a ranking that pleases the tennis coach. The team receives a first round bye as a result of this high seeding, and they should be able to go far in the NCAA's.

Coach Holly Bramble's women's tennis team were knocked from postseason play by Franklin & Marshall, but they will still be represented in the singles competition. Tracy Peel, WC's top women netter, will play in the Division III singles tourney at Trenton State later this month. Peel has been dominant in both singles and doubles this season, and she is sure to have a high ranking in the tournament.

Men's lacrosse has continued its streak of dominance this year, registering a record of 8-3 and earning the #2 ranking in Division III lax. Barring a shocking upset at the hands of West Chester State this weekend, the Shoremen will begin the playoffs at home on May 9. The team does not know their opponent at this date, but they hope to meet Hobart in the finals.

The Dad Vail Regatta is the equivalent of a postseason tournament for crew, and the WC boaters will head to Philadelphia to compete in these races on May 11-12. The coaches will send a men's varsity four boat, a women's varsity four boat and a men's novice four to the Vails.

Those programs that did not make the playoffs should still be proud of their performance this spring. Women's lacrosse has been ranked in the top ten this year, and they presently have a 9-3 record. The team suffered two devastating late-season losses to top five opponents to knock them out of the playoffs.

The men's baseball team has an 8-13-1 record with one game remaining, away against Washington Bible College this Saturday. Despite their sub-.500 record, the Shoremen have knocked off top opponents Johns Hopkins and Widener during this season. The women's softball team has been decimated by injuries and illnesses to both players and coaches, but their 3-15 record is not indicative of the bright future that lies before the program.

Student work featured in annual art show

by Bruce Hamilton

On Friday, April 27th, the Student Art Exhibition opened in the Constance Stuart Larrabee Art Center. The exhibition is a selection of works from a group of art classes, including Visual Design, Advanced Design, Beginning Drawing, Advanced Drawing, Beginning Painting, Silkscreen and Pottery. All of these courses are taught by professors Susan Tessem and Tex Andrews, who selected the works from completed assignments within each respective class.

The Neilsen art awards were given by the decision of three judges: Robert Janson-LaPalme, Marcie Dunn Ramsey, and Shin Ja An. The Award of Best Achievement by an Underclassman was given to Andrea Butchart for her study of apples. The award of Best in Show was given to Becca Hutchinson for her silkscreen, entitled "Spamanimal."

Tessem believes this year's show is more polished than past years and that she was "most emphatic" that the sophistication of image is "more apparent" due to the addition of new equipment. This, she adds, was especially true of the Silkscreen and Advanced Design classes. Tessem says the works in the show were clear evidence of the Art Department's emphasis on "traditional skills of drawing and design." She says, optimistically, that these pieces were "strong," predicting that the "prospects for next year are good."

The show is incredibly diverse. The "Spamanimal" piece is a silkscreen, a fantastic pop representation with tremendous energy and a vibrant sense of color composition.

Butchart's apple piece is a triptych study of Cezanne. It demonstrates a deep understanding of impressionism in a very emotive flow.

Certain works stood out in the show, such as the pop paint-by-numbers American flag by Jackie Wheeler. The flag is presented in an unfinished fashion, with the numbers appearing where the stars are outlined. Placed on the wall in subtle but conspicuous folds, the flag is a confrontational piece.

There are a number of impressive and original three-dimensional works: small geometric structures and shapes in cardboard, wood and plastic. The pottery is beautiful as well, but it is from a previous semester's class and the amount of works to select from was limited.

There are a series of chalk pieces by Dan Helgerman. One pastel is a startling juxtaposition of a fish and a plant. Most of this series depict different scenes of the old boiler plant. These are intricate studies of color and composition with a bold, geometric feel.

One individual piece by Chris Smith is almost breathtaking: an acrylic painting of a butterfly presented as a postcard and an almost completed puzzle, with a few fragments below.

Vicco Voss contributed some ingenious silkscreens, including a self-portrait entitled "Fate."

Students whose work was highlighted expressed tsatisfaction with the show. Sophomore Kristen Lewis, in Beginning Drawing, explains, "I like the fact that they chose a wide variety of students."

Andrews said that the show was more "even" this year, describing how there is usually a great variance in the level of each artist while this year "everyone was close to the same level." Many students praised the efforts of Tessem and Andrews in the Art Department.

If these works are evidence of talent and ability, then they are also proof of the integrity of the department.

The exhibit is open from now until May 20 during class hours in the Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center.

Vega's Days of Open Hand : returning with a new vision

by Raphael Koster

After far too long a hiatus, Suzanne Vega has returned to the listening public's ear with a new album, entitled Days of Open Hand. This time around, in the wake of the success of her single "Luka" from Solitude Standing, she has changed her style substantially. Joined by Shawn Colvin on back-up vocals, Vega and her collaborator, Anton Sanko, have produced a tight, classy album full of instrumental surprises and peculiar lyrics.

Vega's work, until now, has been hard to categorize. She is based in New York, and her success with "Luka," in the midst of the Madonna craze, led Time Magazine to term her "the ethereal girl." Her first, eponymous album was highly incisive and occasionally hard on the ear. Still fairly unknown, she began to be recognized by rock stars such as Sting, who is a admirer of her work.

Vega's moderate success on the charts opened the floodgates for many new female singer-songwriters with such instantly recognizable names as Etheridge, Chapman, Brickell and Shocked. Solitude Standing, featured increasingly ornamented music, along with an emphasis on her simple vocal style and her poetic lyrics. Those who bought the album based on "Luka" found that the rest of the material differed greatly.

And now she is here, in the new decade, with eleven new songs. How do they stack up against the old?

The first single, "Book of Dreams," is already playing on 99.1 FM, WHFS, and even some mainstream stations. It is not hard to tell why. The tune is catchy, simple and recognizable. The steel acoustic guitar in the background sounds suspiciously like "Luka." The lyrics, however, tackle a more abstract subject than child abuse, dealing instead with a sort of philosophy for being a songwriter. Yet lyrically and musically, "Book of Dreams" has to be dismissed as disappointing.

So, never mind the single designed for the public ear. It's the rest of the album that is worth listening to: songs like "Men in a War," "Institution Green," "Fifty-Fifty Chance," and "Pilgrimage." Narrative songs, one of Vega's strengths, pepper the album with vignettes of frightening situations. Simple images like "Those whole girls/ hurl down words/ run in packs/ with bloom to spare" make up brief songs that fall into your memory and linger somewhere near the memories of your first school and your first kiss.

"Men in a War" is a simple song with an interesting arrangement. "Men/ in a war/ if they've lost a limb/ still feel that limb/ as they did/ before," Vega sings. It is not until Vega sings the very last verse that we realize where all this discourse has been heading: "And she lay on her back/ she made sure she was hid/ she was mute and staring/ not feeling the thing/ that she did." With this idea of sexual debasement and loss of innocence, the refrain of "You just make do with what what you've got" turns the song into a thoroughly frightening listening experience, likening the life of an amputee to the troubles inherent in a woman's sexual identity.

The bizarre twists continue in "Institution Green," a terrifying picture of voting cloaked in music that resembles a horror movie soundtrack written by Philip Glass. A martial drum occasionally rattles a reminder of the mechanical nature of the process as Vega quietly sings about the loss of individuality she undergoes. "Teach me how to pull the lever/ push the curtain closed/ take what's needed then just/ let me go," ends the song.

The general stylistic change that Vega has undergone is evident in the instrumentation she uses. Perhaps the most obvious musical development of the past few years has been the exploration of international rhythms, instruments and melodies such as Byrne's Rei Momo, Simon's Graceland, and most of Peter Gabriel's, particularly Passion.

Songs like "Room Off the Street" and "Big Space" use exotic instruments like the ney, dumbek, chinese drum, and shaker. Percussion ranges from high-tech blastics to hand-claps. Background orchestration is not limited to strings— even orchestral bass drums make an appearance.

A song like "Pilgrimage" will appeal to those of us who love the complex instrumentals of old Genesis— I'm specifically thinking of Abacab— Gabriel's Passion, some Floyd, and even the Alan Parsons Project before they went completely pop. It has the same smooth, atmospheric feel. It also reminds me of certain "cool jazz" performers, although there is not a horn to be heard on the whole album.

And the down side? Well, there are some clunkers. One of the most notable is the most memorable lyric on the album. "Fifty-Fifty Chance" is backed by a simple chord progression played by strings, over and over again. It sounds like warmed over Sinead O'Connor but without her voice. The lyrics are blunt to the point of obtuseness: "50-50 chance/ the doctor said/ in the cardiac room/ as she's lying in bed" In the next verse we learn that the is something black in a pan on the floor. After some fairly predictable lyrics about love, we get the climax: "She's going home/ tomorrow at ten/ the question is/ will she do it again." The problem is not that suicide is the topic. The problem is that it is treated like a third-grade textbook, with music to match.

So why is this song one of the most memorable on the album? Perhaps because we have forgotten when song lyrics did not tell us what they were about. In a day when Heart's latest single goes dedicated "From Frank to Linda with love" maybe we need bluntness. I sometimes wonder if "Frank" recognizes that the song is about a woman who sleeps with the first man she picks off the street in order to gain a child for her sterile husband? Maybe it was the pop cloaking that fooled "Frank." "Fifty-Fifty Chance" emerges as a frightening tune for several reasons.

Days of Open Hand is an excellent outing for Suzanne Vega. Often hard-hitting lyrics are coupled with complex, fascinating music that is overall a more commercially savvy affair. Her less than distinguished voice is treated well by Padgham. Also, the album is mixed so that it must be played fairly loud to be appreciated. The arrangements and instrumental work are often more appealing than the lyrics, as opposed to her stark debut album and the vocal-favoring Solitude Standing.

Senator Wirth to speak at commencement

United States Senator Timothy E. Wirth (D., Col.), a leading advocate for environmental protection legislation, will address Washington College's 208th commencement class on Sunday, May 20, and will receive the College's honorary Doctor of Laws degree. It will be the final Commencement for outgoing President Douglas Cater.

In making the announcement, President Cater stated: "This is another first for Washington College. Senator Wirth spoke on campus in March, and has been invited back by popular demand to deliver the Commencement Address. Those who heard the Senator speak I feel certain will welcome his return."

Wirth, who was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1986, visited the Chestertown, Maryland, campus in March to discuss the global environment in a lecture and special seminar with political science students. An avid outdoorsman, he has paid special attention to Colorado's conservation, public health and environmental issues and has been a leading spokesman for stronger federal clean air laws. He is the author of the major Senate legislation addressing the issue of global warming.

Wirth is a member of four Senate Committees: Armed Services, Budget, Banking, and Energy and Natural Resources. He also serves on the Board of Visitors of the Air Force Academy, is National Chairman of the Alliance to Save Energy, and co-chairs the Northern Atlantic Assembly's working group on conventional arms control.

He earned his bachelor's degree and master's degree in education at Harvard University, and his doctorate from Stanford University. He was an enlisted man in the United States Army, and prior to his election to Congress, taught school and then was in private business in Colorado. He was a White House Fellow under President Lyndon B. Johnson, and has served as a member of the Board of Planned Parenthood and of Denver Head Start. From 1974 to 1986, he served six terms in the U.S. House of Representatives, where he led efforts that dramatically altered American telecommunications policy.

He is married to the former Wren Winslow of Baltimore, Maryland, who is national vice-chair of the Environmental Defense Fund and a leader of Congressional Wives for Soviet Jewry. They have two children in college.

letter in a personal manner. He expressed regret at having to "stoop" to a personal level, but felt that such a move was needed.

He then asked for a motion from any student who would like to see him impeached. No student spoke. He then stated that if a majority of the students thought that he was not doing his job, then he would voluntarily step down as SGA President.

On that note, Neiman officially called the meeting to order. A quorum was present and the meeting was official.

Under the first order of New Business, Gordy Scherer was voted on and approved as the SGA Parliamentarian and installed officially into that office.

During the second order of New Business, Senator, Sean Murphy proposed amendments for the SGA Constitution. The amendments were voted on as follows:

Amendment One: to Article 2, Section I

The Senate shall be composed of the executive board, elected senators, and class presidents, or their Vice-Presidents provided that twenty-four hours notice is given by the Class President to the President of the Student Government Association. Also, a faculty observer shall sit in at meetings but shall have not vote.

-to Article 5, Section 2

Each Class President, or their Vice-President, provided due notice has been given, has one vote during Senate Proceedings. Other class officers have no vote, but are welcome to attend all Senate Proceedings.

-to Article 9, Section 7

Every constituency has a right to full representation at all Senate and SAB meetings. In the event of a representative's absence, a substitute may sit in his place, but will have no vote. Class presidents, however, may send their Vice-Presidents given that due notice has been provided who will be given the right to vote.

This amendment in three parts passed with a unanimous vote of the Senate.

Amendment Two: to Article 2, Section 2

It shall be the duties of the Senate:

h) to provide a check (through attendance and as guardians of the Constitution) on the SGA President and the Executive Board so as to establish and maintain the accountability of these officers to the student body.

This amendment was lost with a unanimous vote of the SGA because it was seen as unnecessary and redundant of Article 4, Section 3.

Amendment Three: to Article 3, Section 1

rity. According to Johnson and other students who were at the Literary House celebrating the Rites of Spring, the festivities drew a small group of non Washington College residents whom Security asked to leave.

"Security understands that the students do this every year and helped us out by protecting the largely defenseless nudist crowd against a bunch gawking townies."

Johnson concluded by stating, "It's really quite a fantastic day and it's the only unique tradition that this school has. I don't know of any other school that does this. May Day is not going to disappear so the administration should at least recognize it, if not support it in some way."

As for McIntire, he said, "May Day's been going on a lot longer than she's been here."

He stated that the faculty vote against fraternities at Colgate was largely attributable to the "totally unacceptable behaviour" of a particular fraternity. Specifically,

Letter to the editor

To the Editor:

In response to last week's letter by Kyndra Ponder, we would like to say thank you to Stuart Neiman and the entire SGA for helping put on a successful SGA Luau/Lambda Key West Party. The cooperation of the SGA and Lambda Pi Delta fraternity showed how well things can work for social events when the SGA supports the Greeks. Without the efforts of Stu and the SGA our party was going to be canceled; and it is this effort that shows the success of the present student government. We feel that Stuart is an excellent voice between student interests and the administration, and this quality will assure smooth social events in the future.

Sincerely,
Lambda Pi Delta

Correction - In the Volume 61, Number 23 issue of the Elm it was reported that Ryder Daniels is "Head Resident Assistant" in an article entitled "RA salary increase proposal accepted." According to Daniels, no such position exists.

he stated that many faculty felt that academics were being damaged "by institutions that are anti-intellectual."

No such criminal suspicions are being investigated at Washington College, therefore he plans to have "a very open mind. I belonged to a fraternity in college and enjoyed that experience very much."

Trout commented that he is excited about meeting Washington College students and becoming acquainted with the community in all its aspects.

Trout stressed his excitement about the coming year. He declined to comment on specific plans, stating that he wanted to "allow President Cater his well deserved victory lap" and that "to start making sweeping comments about the future of Washington College would be folly."

Meeting

a) The SGA President shall:

- maintain a minimum grade point average, cumulative, of 2.00 on a 4.0 scale.

- not be on Academic Probation (AP) when elected or anytime while serving in his or her capacity as President of the SGA.

Should this situation arise, the President will voluntarily resign and the Vice-President will assume the Presidency. The new President shall then appoint a new Vice-President, who must be approved by a simple majority of the senate. If both the President and the Vice-President fail to maintain said GPA or are placed on AP, a special election will be held in which both offices will be filled in accordance with SGA procedure. Should the President refuse, impeachment proceedings will be initiated.

b) The Vice-President shall:

- maintain a minimum GPA of 2.00 on a 4.0 scale;

- not be on AP.

Should this situation arise, the Vice-President will voluntarily resign, or face the consequences of impeachment. The President will appoint a new Vice-President, who must be approved by a simple majority of the senate.

The chair of the SCC will be responsible for making sure that all such officers have the required GPA.

After a great deal of discussion, this amendment was voted on and was passed, with a vote of 2 nays and one abstention. Murphy pointed out that that amendment was presented because there are students and administrators who believe that the SGA President should be a representative "academically, socially and in other aspects of college life."

The fourth and final amendment cleared up a wording error in the Constitution as it is now printed. The amendment reads: Article 6, Section 3 b) candidates for all offices of the Student Government Association Executive Board must be taken from the rising sophomore, junior and senior classes. d) candidates from all senate offices will be taken from the freshman, sophomore, junior and senior classes.

It passed unanimously.

SGA Treasurer, Brian Gimelson then reported that the Luau was a success and that the SGA covered its alcohol and band costs and may have even broken even on other aspects of the night.

Gimelson added a report of club funding for the spring semester. Only five of the twenty-one clubs who received money spent all of their allotted sums. He requested that all clubs which have bills for the spring semester turn them into him by September 15, 1990. Clubs which do not meet that deadline must have prior approval from Gimelson before the September date.

After the meeting, Neiman commented on the third amendment which was made at the meeting.

He said "The senate has taken away the ability of the voters to elect the candidate of their choice., The students have had their right of choice limited and equated with success in the classroom. So much for 'government by the people, for the people.' I only hope that next year's student body realizes the implications established by this vote and will promote legislation to change this." will be granted.

The next hearing held by the Zoning Commission will be at the end of May. If both plans have been submitted and approved the construction at the new Worton sight could begin in early summer.

No major problems are expected, according to Hessey. "These are minor conditions that need to be met and the plans should be approved easily."

Stenger's tanks were a source of concern for students who lived in the Cardinal Dormitories last year as well as a plague to local fire officials, who at one point last March, answered two alarms within three days.

Fireman are required to follow strict procedure at every alarm as propane leaks are potentially dangerous. Answering these types of calls most often involve evacuations of nearby buildings and stopping traffic.

According to Walter R. Strong and Jeff Thompson, two volunteer firemen who commented on this issue last year, tanks are relatively safe if properly maintained.

Stenger's tanks had been cited repeatedly in the past and had wrought three alarms on the fire department within one month. The two men stated that not only are Stenger's tanks subject to employee error inevitably, but they are situated in an active area of town and next to the college, thereby increasing the odds of vandalism.

Strong stated that in a worst case scenario an explosion of Stenger's tanks would effect an area with a radius measuring from the Cardinal Dorms to the Fire Station itself.

While Stenger was unavailable for comment at this writing, he stated last March that he had no immediate plans to satisfy requests that he move the yard and would not do so unless, in the interests of family members, "it would be profitable."

MOM'S COOKIE JAR

Here are a couple of fascinating facts I thought might interest you. Bananas are frequently mentioned as a food high in potassium, but potatoes actually contain nearly twice as much. One large banana has 450 milligrams of potassium, while a large baked potato with its skin contains about 850 milligrams. The skin of the potato alone has about 235 milligrams of potassium.

Saltwater fish are generally no higher in sodium than freshwater fish. Fish have an internal regulatory system that prevents their flesh from taking up sodium from the water. How about that?

Now for some "cultural information" that should be of interest to all of you. Calcium is the most abundant mineral found in the human body, most being found in the bones (97%) and teeth (1%). The remainder is found in the soft tissues of the body where it performs a variety of pertinent functions.

Bone is constantly being broken down and rebuilt; thus the body's constant need for calcium does not stop after childhood, but continues throughout life. If calcium consumption is inadequate over time, calcium will be released from bones, weakening the skeleton, resulting in osteoprorosis (porous bones). As you may know women are more prone to osteoprorosis than men, mainly due to a smaller bone structure.

Washington College students returned to campus last week to find many changes on campus. Most obvious is the near completion of the College Lane. Landscaping was put in last spring prior to graduation and the area around the lane has a pleasant green feeling to it, a marked contrast from the line of backhoes and other heavy construction equipment which greeted the student body last fall. The only areas of the lane which were not totally finished were the crosswalk in front of Reid Hall, and some limestone installation in front of Tawes Theater and the Casey Academic Resources Center. As soon as the work in front of Reid Hall is completed, the area will be cleaned up and grass will be planted.

Summer rain was again responsible for construction delays, including the building of eight new tennis courts near the Kibler practice field and Cardinal dormitories. The tennis courts will replace the old one presently located next to the Cain Gymnasium. Clint Baer, director of planning and special projects stressed that these new "fenced, state of the art courts" will be finished this fall, weather permitting. The courts will not, however, have lights.

The three Hill dorms were also subject to some improvements this summer. The back of the dorms were pressure cleaned to remove dirt and graffiti, and white panels will be installed over the bricked up windows. There are plans to rebuild the back porches on East and West Hall. Middle Hall will not have a back porch since the door and stairs which led to the first floor were removed some time ago. There are no plans by the architects, Bucher-Meyers Associates of Silver Spring, to bring back the shutters which were also removed.

Cecil House, in the new dorms quadrangle, was remodeled this summer. Maintenance replaced ceilings and stair treads, installed new lights, and partially re-carpeted the dorm. Baer stated that there are plans to refurbish all of the new dorms, one a summer, for the next summers. He also stressed the need for "good stewardship on the part of the occupants" and praised the maintenance for their accomplishments in the face of a full conference schedule.

The Casey Academic Resource Center is, in Baer's words, "still on target" for its October 1 opening, but some work will still remain to be finished at that time. The college is currently in the process of ordering Audio/visual for the ARC, and has already ordered furniture. The building will be open by "mid-fall" and ready for classes by the spring semester. Currently, work is almost completed on the third floor, but remains to be finished on the staircases and the forum. Landscaping will be done around the ARC and the north entrance to the college this fall.

The Dunning lecture hall was re-carpeted and re-tiled this summer. New seats were installed as well as enhanced Audio/Visual equipment. The top two floors of the O'Neil Literary House were renovated, and the offices were moved upstairs to provide more space for the print shop program. PCB transformer removals were completed, and Baer stated that the College is now in 100% compliance with the EPA regulations and that they are currently negotiating the reduction of the fine from $150,000 to $25,000. Power and water lines were extended to the athletic fields on the other side of the train tracks, and a new lamp was installed on the bridge to the athletic fields. The maintenance trucks were repainted tan with the college logo on the side.

But construction on campus is not behind us yet. In a few days, work will begin on a road which will provide access to the Cullen dorms, Kent House, and handicapped access to the Dining Hall. In addition to making it easier for residents of these dorms to move in and out at the beginning and end of the academic year and eliminate the necessity of parking on the lawn to do so. The new road should also help the drainage problems in that area. Construction will last, weather permitting, only until the beginning of November.

Back so soon?
Dazed students wonder where the summer went in such a hurry.

Faculty update:Eleven new faces on campus

by Kyndra Ponder

Welcome back to another year of fun and excitement at Washington College. As you have walked around campus this week, you have undoubtedly noticed some new faces - not only among the new Freshmen and Transfers, but also in the faculty.

There are eleven new faculty members who have joined the W.C. community this year. They range from the new Registrar - Dr. Jack Hamilton to several tenure track professors, guest lecturers and new library staff.

Dr. Hamilton, Registrar and Lecturer in the Education department comes to Washington College from Cornell University where he served as Graduate Registrar and Director of Records. He received his B.Sc. in English Education, his M.A. in Education and his Ph.D.in Education from Ohio State University.

Ms. Jannette Hartley has been appointed to serve as the Technical Services Coordinator in the Miller Library. She returns to Washington College after graduating from here in 1988. For the past two years, she has been working as a research assistant at the University of Michigan while working to earn her Master of Information and Library Studies degree.

Dr. Lida Baldwin has been appointed the new Assistant Professor of German after receiving her Ph.D. from Rutgers University in 1990. She has been a Teaching Assistant and Lecturer at Rutgers for the past eight years and has taught such courses as Advanced German, German Methodology and Introduction to German Literature. Dr. Baldwin received her B.A. from Queen's College in 1974 and her M.A. from the University of Georgia in 1976. In addition to wide classroom experience, Dr. Baldwin has a great deal of experience in language laboratory technology and pedagogy.

Dr. Tahir Shad will be serving as the new Assistant Professor of Political Science. He has a wide range of knowledge including African, Near Eastern, South Asian and West European Political Systems, Comparative Politics, International Relations and American Politics. Dr. Shad comes to Washington College from Wesley College, where he served as as the Chairman and Assistant Professor of Political Science. He received his B.A. from the University of Sussex, U.K. in 1979 and his M.A. and Ph.D. from the University of Pittsburgh.

Dr. David Russell, Assistant Professor of Biology brings to Washington College his expertise in Marine Biology. Dr. Russell received his B.A. from Claremont McKenna College in 1975, his M.S. from California State University in 1980 and his Ph.D. from George Washington University in 1987. He has served as the Senior Marine Biologist at Cove Corporation in Lusby, Maryland from 1987-1989 where he worked to identify different invertebrates for an environmental study of the U.S. Atlantic Coast and the Puerto Rico coastline. In addition he has served as the Research assistant at the National Museum of Natural History at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

While Professor Richard De Prospo in on a year's sabbatical, Dr. Benjamin Alexander will replace him in the English Department. Dr. Alexander received his B.A. from the University of the South in 1971, his M.A. from the University of Dallas in 1975 and his Ph.D. from the University of Dallas in 1979. He enjoys teaching American Literature, theology, Dante and Medieval Culture, rhetoric and social values.

Dr. Ruth Shoge, who is serving as Reference Librarian and Visiting Assistant Professor comes to Washington College from Upsala College in New Jersey. She received her B.A. from Howard University in 1973, her M.S. and Ph.D. from the School of Library Service at Columbia University. Dr. Shoge replaces Jeff Chaffin who will be on leave until 1992.

Ms. Louise Amick is replacing Dr. Eugene Hamilton for the Fall Term, 1990. She received her B.A. from Washington College in 1969 and her Master's Degree from the University of Delaware in 1975. Ms. Amick has previously served as an Assistant Professor of Mathematics at Lincoln University.

Mr. Joseph Bigott has been appointed Lecturer on History and will teach two courses each semester during this school year. He enjoys teaching various aspects of American History including 19th and 20th Century Social and Urban History, American Immigration History and American Religious History. Mr. Bigott is a Ph.D. candidate from the University of Delaware.

Ms. Renee Curry will be serving as a Lecturer in English and will also be teaching two courses each semester during this academic year. She enjoys teaching American Poetry, American Literature and Women's Studies. She is currently a Ph.D. candidate at the University of Maryland.

Dr. Metka Zupancic, visiting Assistant Professor of French for the Fall Term, will replacing Dr. Yon who is on sabbatical. She has served as the Visiting Associate Professor of French at the University of the South in Sewanee Tennessee in 1989-1990. Dr. Zupancic received her Ph.D. in Philology from the University of Zagreb, Yugoslavia in 1988.

Finally. let us not forget perhaps the most well known of Washington College's new faculty, Dr. Charles Trout. Dr. Trout comes to W.C. from Colgate University where he served as Provost and Dean of Faculty. He is replacing Douglass Cater and will serve as the college's 24th President.

The Elm wishes all of our new faculty members the best possible year at Washington College. We hope that your stay here is both pleasant and productive.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

A summer's view of German reunification

By Carolin Leibig

The events that have taken place during the past year have changed the face of Europe dramatically. The fall of the Berlin Wall on November 9, 1989 is a symbol of the changes that are underway: the oppressed people of eastern Europe have been freed. Besides the emergence of new governments from Poland to Hungary, East and West Germany will soon become one nation. Viewed from a distance, like, say in the U.S., the reunification of Germany seems like a joyous occasion for both the east and west. In the U.S., we hear only about the good parts, like relatives being reunited, communist dictators falling at the hands of the masses. We hear about the backwardness of the East and how the advanced West will assist its ailing other half. These things are true, but there is so much more to reunification that we do not really know about here in the United States.

I went to Germany for three weeks this past May and June. I arrived thinking that everyone was happy about the impending reunification. I knew that there were problems both economic and political, but assumed that goodwill and a sense of nationalism could override the major obstacles. There is goodwill, but nationalism is in scarce supply. The only people that are nationalistic are those who remember Germany before it was divided. They always maintained some hope that the Germanies would and should one day be reunited. This brings me to another point: vocabulary. I was corrected when I mentioned the "re"unification; I was told that East and West Germany are being unified, not reunified because the two sovereign nations as they exist today were never united in the first place. I heard this explanation in the West. West Germans of the post war generation, who have no ties to the East, see their eastern counterparts as foreigners. It is probably the same in the East. It is safe to say that nationalism is not a factor that led to the unification process Germany is now going through. Economic factors are most likely what led to the current situation.

East Germans entered the West in search of a better life. Most of the people who migrated were young, usually in their 20's, who were not yet leaving behind secure jobs and guaranteed pensions. These people were pulled to the West by the promise of opportunity and wealth. When the thousands of East Germans began arriving in West Germany, they were welcomed with open arms and even given 100 Marks as "Welcome Money". Eventually, there were too many people coming to the West to continue this policy. Some East Germans even entered the west more than one time so they could collect the 100 Marks each time. We did not hear about that in the U.S. Nor did we hear about West Germans going East to dine at the cheap restaurants there or otherwise taking advantage of their less fortunate neighbors. That great mass of Germans that came to the west does not, as I once thought, reflect the overall picture. Not all Germans, both east and west, necessarily want unification. However, most seem to feel that it is unavoidable and will probably be a benefit in the long run. East Germans, I learned, are quite satisfied with their lives and fear a western style capitalist economy. In the East they had to wait 15 years for a car, but they were taken care of for life and the price of bread has not gone up since the 50's. The East German work ethic is also much different from that in the west. A joke that I heard several times in West Germany summarizes the situation: An East German, who has recently arrived in West Germany, works at a construction site with West Germans. They begin work early in the morning, and work hard all day. Finally, after hours and hours of work the East German asks, "Don't you ever run out of cement here?" The joke is funny if you know that West Germans tend to be workaholics (which got them where they are today) and East Germans simply go home when they run out of material, which seemed to happen every day. It did not matter if it was 10:00 a.m. or 2:00 p.m., they just left their place of work. Needless to say I heard many complaints about the East German inability to work, but most people in the west are willing to give easterners employment.

The main gripe that the West Germans have about the East Germans is that the latter seem to feel they are entitled to the benefits they have at home (guaranteed employment and pensions, state sponsored day care...) while enjoying the advantages of the west. Many West Germans do not want to pay higher taxes and give their poor neighbors a piece of the capitalist pie. West Germans make the point that they worked four decades to get where they are today, so the east should have to also (with help from the west). It is true that both East and West Germany started from the same point at the end of World War II, and today the west is represented by the Mercedes Benz, the Autobahn, and meticulously reconstructed ancient cities. The East, on the other hand looks pretty much the way it did when the war ended except now there is more pollution. In East Berlin, which is said to be the city which was given the most money and materials for reconstruction, I saw more than one building with bullet and shrapnel holes in it from the war. Our tour guide in East Berlin said (several times) as we drove through the city: "This area was 70% destroyed, unfortunately we have not been able to rebuild it yet." It will cost the West Germans billions of Marks to help the east rebuild and catch up and the western "yuppies" are not enthusiastic about sharing their prosperity. West Germans in their twenties or younger do not seem to care one way or the other about unification. They have not yet made a lot of money or settled into a well paying job, but they know they will because the East Germans (even those that went to universities) do not have the education to compete with westerners. In short, East Germans end up being waiters/waitresses, construction workers, etc.

After October third, history will let us all know if German unification is a good idea. One thing is for sure, the East Germans have much potential and West Germany is reluctantly willing to give them the help that they need to achieve it. The past four decades have seen the development of two very different Germanies, the next four will hopefully be decades of recovery; political, economic and social.

News from around the world:

UNITED STATES:

In retaliation to the Iraqi order that the U.S. Embassy in Kuwait be shut down, the U.S. has expelled 36 people from the Iraqi Embassy in Washington. Among the expelled embassy employees were seven accredited diplomats and all of the embassy's commercial department. The commercial department was expelled because the United Nations officially approved the U.S. embargo of Iraq, thus making this department virtually nonfunctional. Those expelled are expected to take their families with them when they go back to Iraq. The Iraqi Ambassador to the U.S., Mohammed Sadiq Mashet, was informed of the expulsion by Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger when Mashet was summoned to the State Department on Monday. State Department spokesman Margaret Tutwiler issued this statement regarding the expulsion of the Iraqis: "Unlike how the Iraqi government is handling things, we are handling our diplomatic relations exactly by the letter of the law." The Iraqi Ambassador made no comments.

Statistics released by the census bureau yesterday show that population shifts are likely to effect the nations political lines. California and Florida, two key republican states, are likely to gain 7 and 4 house seats respectively. This change would give California a 52 person house delegation and the additional four seats in Florida equal the total number of the Arkansas congressional delegation. Political lines based on the Census Bureau population figures will be redrawn before the 1992 elections. Eight states are expected to gain seats while 13 are expected to lose them. Tentative developments include the addition of one seat to Georgia, Arizona and Washington. Louisiana and Kentucky will both lose a seat. The overall pattern favors the republican party. The findings also dispel democratic concern that republicans used counting techniques to reduce urban population.

IRAQ:

While daily protests demanding the whereabouts of U.S. citizens held in Iraq and Kuwait continue, more Americans are reported seized each day. President Bush has demanded the release of those held. Ambassador W. Nathaniel Howell and a small group of embassy employees remain at the embassy compound in Kuwait. Although electricity and water have been cut off by the Iraqis, those left at the embassy are said to have enough food and water to last for several more days. They also have an emergency generator.

Meanwhile, Americans and other non-arabs continue to escape Iraq in large numbers. It is estimated that some 240,000 Arab, Asian and Western evacuees have fled to Jordan. Because this mass influx of refugees will have an impact on the already ailing Jordanian economy, Jordan has asked for international aid to help handle the crisis. Another 10,000 foreigners and 4,000 Turks have escaped Iraq by fleeing to Turkey.

BULGARIA:

The headquarters of Bulgaria's ruling Socialist party were burned and looted Sunday night. The fire was started by demonstrators protesting the continued presence of a red star atop the building. A resolution passed by the parliament last month called for the removal of all symbols of the old regime, but the star on top of the building remained. The violence, which police were unable to control, is an indication of the troubling situation in Bulgaria. The Socialists, who won a majority in parliament in June's democratic elections, have not been able to deal with Bulgaria's vast economic problems including a $10.6 billion foreign debt. The Union of Democratic Forces, the Socalists chief rival, received only 38% of the vote in June, but now has the support of 57% of Bulgarians recently polled. Bulgaria's Prime Minister has said the only solution would be for the socialist and Union of Democratic Forces to join in a coalition. The U.D.F. has so far declined. The instability within the country has led to the loss of western investment, making recovery prospects bleak.

A "slice" o'the Freshman experience

Hello all freshmen. Welcome to Washington College - the land of easy living. Yes sir, it's time to leave home and high school behind and move from the lap of luxury into the lap of lechery. Here at the college, we are committed to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happy hour. This fine college takes great pride in its founder and namesake - old George himself; and like George, the school places great emphasis on honesty, especially in one's schoolwork. Oh, by the way, I'd like to clear up this myth about George and the cherry tree once and for all. Do you know why George's father didn't punish little George when he found out what happened? Was it because he admired his son's commitment to honesty at all times? Hell no, it was simply because little George was holding an axe in his hand when his father caught him. This is the legacy that the school's honor code was built on, so if a teacher busts you for cheating, grab an axe, it'll be a big factor in determining your punishment.

Slice

Besides the history of our school, I'd like to prepare the freshmen for their first real college weekend (otherwise known as two day "slop fests" complete with drunk people yelling loudly, urinating in phone booths and on furniture, and finally passing out in some shower stall curled up in the fetal position).

In all reality, weekend parties are really why we're all here. However, we are not social degenerates, and as civilized humans, we should never use alcohol as an end in itself. Alcohol should be the means to a more important end: hooking up with as many people as you can after getting good and sauced. Yet the real fun comes in the dining hall the next morning while telling your tall tales to your buddies over brunch. However I do find something a little strange about these drunken pursuits for flesh. Why does a guy wake up on Saturday morning with a severe hangover, an excruciating headache, and bad breath, lying naked next to a complete stranger who might have given him some strange fatal disease and say that he got lucky? I guess some mysteries of nature are just too deep for man's limited wisdom to grasp and comprehend.

While leaving one mystery, I'd like to uncover another mystery - dining hall food. Granted, this isn't Mom's home cooking but I am taken aback from hearing such things as, "Hey man, cut me off another hunk of that soup," or my personal favorite, "I think this orange juice should be labeled freshly killed." Yet, in the face of all this mystery food, try to dwell on the positive aspects of boarding at Washington College. Hell, this is probably the only place on Earth where you can get a good solid Chicken Gorilla Sandwich and for those who remember, A Steve Attias Sandwich.

In closing, I would just like to tell the freshmen that this college is certainly an unique experience, but if you stay drunk you can probably come out of here a better person than when you started.

Trout Reveals Future Goals for Washington College

by Susie Mazzullo

An interview with President Trout on Thursday, August 30 , revealed that his main goal this year is to listen and learn. "It's a mistake to arrive with preformed visions. I have arrived with questions," he said.

Making the strong stronger and then concentrating on strengthening other areas is what President Trout plans to do this year. W.C.'s areas of strength mentioned by Trout include an emphasis upon writing, academic computing, the rebuilding process that is currently in effect in the science programs, and the Senior Obligation in the form of a thesis. He also spoke admiringly of Washington College's athletic tradition. "I want to preserve that," he says.

He plans to encourage the changes taking place in the science areas. Possible ideas that he mentioned were the addition of environmental and neuroscience programs, as well as an increase in student/faculty interaction. According to Trout, one way of increasing this interaction is by having upperclassmen team up with members of the faculty on major research projects. A long term goal of President Trout's is to have some of these team efforts result in publication.

The Senior Obligation or Senior Thesis is important to Trout because he considers it the capstone to the college education. "Students should be exposed to evolving methodologies and therefore, more should be expected from them year after year. The senior obligation is a move on the student's part to intellectual independence."

President Trout is also looking to the future and to the college's needs then as well as now. Trout's long- term desire is to make Washington College as interesting as possible in all areas, for the students and faculty already here and also for those looking at the school as a possibility. "I have a respect for the total climate of the institution, not just the academic areas, although ultimately the learning experience is the most important."

Trout stated that there are many reasons he is looking to what will be best for the Washington College of the future as well as the W.C. of today. It is especially important to look ahead now, he says, because the college is not immune to external forces. The Mideast crisis, for instance, could easilyh trigger rampant inflation.

Within the next decade, Trout sees a fierce competition for faculty. "It will be a seller's market instead of a buyer's market." Washington College won't be at liberty to pick and choose but rather those looking for positions will have the upper hand. He explained that the faculty around the nation who began their careers in the 60's will begin to retire in the 90's. Therefore, institutions all around the country will be looking to replace them. Because the number of PHD's is declining, Washington College must compete handsomely for faculty who will positively enhance the students education.

Trout also sees competition for students within the next decade increasing. As Washington College must compete for faculty, it must also compete for the best possible students. Trout says that a student body must be vital and diverse. "Students need to learn from each other as well as from their professors," he says.

Washington College must also take advantage of it's location, according to Trout. "The Eastern Shore is very special." He describes it as an exciting laboratory that the college should experience. There are many areas of learning, including environmental studies, as well as the culture and the history of the area. Trout believes that it would be profitable for the students and the faculty to engage with the people of the region.

by Susie Mazzullo

All was not quiet on campus this summer despite the fact that there were not any classes in session. For the fifteenth year, Washington College had conference and meeting facilities available. These meetings, organized by The Washington College Conference Programs are run primarily by Mary Brown, the Associate Director of Conference Services.

Groups come to the school to hold meetings on a variety of subjects. Brown says however, "that the main target is to attract programs with the same mission as Washington College. This means that the groups are academically oriented and that they contain students of possible recruiting potential. " Additional revenue and as well as visibility for the college are also goals of the program.

Not all of the groups that hold meetings here during the summer are for young people. Many adult groups also attend. This summer, the college hosted approximately thirty-three different programs with a total of approximately four thousand people.

Group such as the Maryland State Department of Education, The Maryland State Department of Education's Gifted and Talented Writing Program, the Maryland Leadership Workshop, Girls State sponsored by the American Legion Women's Auxilary, and various athletic camps were held her at the campus throughout the summer. Most of these groups are returning groups, that is, they hold conferences here each summer.

The athletic groups are a tennis camp that is held for two weeks, a girls basketball camp, a boys soccer camp, and a boys lacrosse camp.

New groups this summer included the Chemistry of Pyrotechnic group led by Dr. Conklin, chemistry professor here at Washington College and recently elected to the Board of Visitors and Governors, The Maryland Student Assistance Program, and the American Lung Association Bike Trek.

These groups stay anywhere from two to thirteen days. During their stay they are housed in various dorms and most meals are served in the dining hall. Almost all of the Washington College facilities, such as the Pavillion, the pool, the gym and the Coffee House are available to the groups for any special events upon departmental approval. Department heads meet weekly to discuss what facilities will be needed for the upcoming conference groups. Phone service in the dorms is also provided if requested.

According to Mary Brown, the success of the program takes an enormous amount of organization and cooperation between various departments within the college, and also requires the help of the students, both high school and college level, who are hired for the summer. "One of the best

College is what we make of it

Stuart Neiman, most esteemed president of the student body, took a big risk at Convocation. His speech, a radical departure from Steve Attias's warm and heartfelt greetings last year, caught many people off guard and raised a bit of resentment in his audience. But hopefully, it made us think. College is, after all, what we, as adults, choose to make of it. It is a time to party and get drunk for some people, but it is also a time to prepare for what lies ahead for all.

If a student would rather drink than study, it is his right to make that choice. But that same student, especially the under age student, must understand that the college will not make it easy. The college is here, after all, to try and educate us. So much of our education and our future lies in our hands, shouldn't we be taking our responsibility to ourselves a bit more seriously?

The choices we make here at Washington College will effect us profoundly for some time. Yes, it is possible to overcome poor grades in college, but it is very hard. For some people, poor grades will translate into low paying jobs, or others, graduate schools will deny them entrance.

The only way to avoid a dry campus, is to use alcohol responsibly, and grades are an indicator of that success or failure .

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Senior takes offense at Slice's advice

Dear Editor,

I was quite offended by the closing advice of Mr. Macek. I really do not feel that staying drunk will do anyone any good. Have your fun and a few beers if you choose, but get real. If you stay drunk you'll be getting out of here a lot faster than planned, and you'll have to prove your worth at Detox or your local community college.

Sincerely,
Don Steele

Fall convocation: Neiman questions student lifestyle

by: Kyndra Ponder

Students returned to school last week to find that many things have changed during the summer. After moving in, unpacking, enduring the line at the bookstore and learning about how their lives would be devoted to books for the next semester, students had one more Washington College ritual to endure - Fall Convocation.

For many students familiar with the Cater years, the word convocation conjures images of extreme pomp and circumstance, professors in their gowns and LONG speeches on topics that are rarely interesting. This year however, students were greatly surprised. Convocation was marked by a friendly, short greeting from President Trout as well as an address by Professor Nate Smith which interested many of the students who attended. In addition, the Welcome by SGA President, Stuart Neiman, was far from the traditional speech that many students are so accustomed to.

History Professor, Dr. Nate Smith presented a speech on the state of the union in the U.S.S.R. In his lecture, Dr. Smith summed-up the efforts of Mikael Gorbachev to create a decentralized power structure in the Soviet Union and commented on how effective those efforts are proving to be. He stated that wile Gorbachev's ideas are good and are needed in the Soviet Union today, the actual chances of any significant changes occuring are slim.

Brian Gimelson, junior, reported that he enjoyed the convocation because " it was humorous, but it touched on some of the serious problems facing the freedom seekers across the sea." Many students in fact seemed to enjoy the 209th convocation of the college. Junior, Jennifer Stickney stated that this year's Fall Convocation was the first one that she "didn't want to fall asleep at."

Not only did the address by Dr. Smith change the tone of the convocation, but the Welcome given by Stuart Neiman added to the sense that this year, things have changed at Washington College. Neiman, instead of extending the usual greetings to the students, chose instead to talk about how the death of a friend in a drug-related incident this summer had pushed him to a new point of maturity and gave him very little tolerance for drug and alcohol abuse.

Neiman said that he mentioned the incident because he feels that at Washington College, the students often forget the reason that they are here is to learn and may be sacrificing the quality of their education for a lot of parties and nights in local bars. He urged students this year to not just "accept mediocrity" from themselves and their work, but to strive to make this school year the best that can be.

Many students applauded Neiman for having the courage to speak out about a problem that exists at the College. Carolyn Leibig stated that she felt that Neiman "has got a lot of nerve." Tamara Braunsten said that she "was glad that a student was saying this to other students."

Dean Baer then presented academic awards to those students who achieved academic excellence at Washington College last year. One student from the Senior, Junior and Sophomore classes received these awards. In addition, the Infraternity Loving Cups were presented to the Fraternity and Sorority with the highest Grade Point Averages for the last year. The Lambda Pi Delta fraternity and the Alpha Chi Omega sorority each received the award for their academic acheivements.

Kyndra Ponder is a junior majoring in English. She is also Elm Circulation manager.

W.C. grads team up to take on Dyson

Julie Greene

Two of Washington College's alumni are involved in this Tuesday's Democratic Primary Election. Delegate Barbara Kreamer, class of '70, is running against three other candidates for Maryland's 1st District seat in the House of Representatives. Sean Murphy, who graduated last year, is her Field Director.

During Murphy's internship at the Maryland General Assembly, he introduced himself to Delegate Kreamer and asked if he could be on her campaign staff. He went through two interviews, the second for his current position as Field Director. He started a week and a half after graduation.

As Field Director, Murphy is responsible for Kreamer's visibility and name recognition. He is in charge of bumper stickers, lawn signs, hit-the-streets campaigns, and campaigning at grocery stores. Murphy does a great deal of traveling since the 1st District covers the entire Eastern Shore as well as Calvert, Charles, St. Mary's and part of Harford counties.

While at Washington College, Murphy studied both philosophy and political science. He feels that a liberal arts education is a good mix, and that it benefits him in his current role. "You can't come in with a certain mind set, you wouldn't be able to do it. You have to be able to adapt." He also stated that he received a good understanding of the system through Washington College's Political Science Department.

When asked how her Washington College education has influenced her life and career, Barbara Kreamer responded, "the reading, conference, and writing methods at Washington College were exactly what I needed for public office. Reading people, their concerns, and what they hope for is very important."

An English major at the College, Kreamer played the part of Lady MacBeth in Tim Mahoney's production of MacBeth. She remembers one dress rehearsal in which they were going over her murder scene. "The guy playing the murderer had such a convincing look that I screamed and ran off stage. I was told not to do that again."

Kreamer was a student senator for Queen Anne dorm, and the following year for Caroline. During her stay at WC the college made the transition from house mothers to resident assistants. Kreamer was an R.A. in Reid Hall. Both of these experiences taught her how to speak out, which is quite useful in her current role.

Kreamer feels her experiences at Washington College have fostered her participation and have given her confidence. She participated in many activities on campus including being a member of the Young Democrats and an officer of the William James Forum. She had the opportunity to meet and talk with Senator Joe Tidings and Julian Bond who was a Georgia state legislator nominated for the Vice Presidency. Kreamer noted that WC was able to attract many important speakers who found Washington College charming.

As a freshman Barbara Kreamer was a copy editor for The Elm; in later years she was a reporter and the news editor. Her job at The Elm gave her occasion to meet her husband, Robert, class of '68. She didn't have a car and had to get to the printer in Centreville. When she asked if she could borrow his car he replied, "Do you have a license?" He let her borrow his car and they later started dating.

Barbara Kreamer attended Johns Hopkins University and the University of Maryland Law School after graduating from Washington College. In 1978 she was elected to the Harford County Council and in 1982 she was the top vote-getter for the Maryland House of Delegates.

Today Kreamer is a member of the Visiting Committee of Washington College. While in town for a fund raiser at the White Swan Tavern last Thursday evening, she scheduled time to attend Fall Convocation. Kreamer said she enjoyed meeting our new president. She and President Trout discussed his concerns with the curriculum, mainly why more Washington College graduates do not attend law school.

Kreamer's campaign literature states she will not accept PAC contributions from defense contractors, contrary to her major opponent, incumbent Roy Dyson. Congressman Dyson has taken a great deal of honoraria from defense contractors within his ten years of office. One questionable dealing occurred when he had breakfast with representatives from Oshkosh Truck, a defense contractor, who gave him $2,000 in honoraria. Later that same afternoon Dyson voted for the Army to purchase over $100 million in military trucks from Oshkosh, that the Army did not even want.

The Washington Post recently uncovered that Representative Dyson did not go to the Vietnam War because he signed a statement saying he was "opposed" to the Vietnam War. In order to stay out of the draft a man must be opposed to all war. Congressman Dyson not only takes PAC contributions and honoraria from defense contractors, but supported the Panamanian Invasion and currently the sending of U.S. troops to Iraq. If Dyson is so morally opposed to war how can he condone such actions?

Del. Barbara Kreamer supports the Clean Air Act soon to be voted on in Congress as well as other steps to better our environment. She is supported by many environmental groups on the Eastern Shore, as well as the Sierra Club. Kreamer wants to "foster basic services such as recycling." She is also interested in building a coalition of the men and women of Congress to help landowners with restrictions concerning non-tidal wetlands. The law defining what is considered non-tidal wetlands is vague and needs to be more well-defined so that not all farmland will be taken away.

Kreamer is also supported by many women's rights groups. In the past Kreamer has gone out and initiated laws and followed through with them until they are passed. One such act mandated "that raises for state employees to be based on the principles of pay equity." Kreamer is also pro-choice and supports the idea of federal Medicaid funding for abortions.

As a County Councilwoman and as a State legislator, Kreamer has consistently supported laws which outlaw the sale of drugs, and the giving, as well as the selling, of alcohol to minors.

As a wife and mother of two children, as well as a former schoolteacher, Barbara Kreamer is adamant about improving education. She has started and completed legislation dealing with alternative educational programs for disruptive youth. She also believes that education should be improved starting at the preschool level and goes all the way to the teachers themselves. She realizes how few teachers there are compared to the great demand.

When asked about his feelings concerning the primary election Sean Murphy stated that he feels confident. Concerning the general election Murphy said "the Democratic Party is two-thirds of the district's population and if Barbara does win the primary the party will be behind her fully."

A great deal has been made in local publications, such as Salisbury's The Daily Times and The Baltimore Sun, about the punches Kreamer has been delivering to Dyson. Murphy stresses that there have been no personal attacks on Dyson. "It is not negative when comparing how candidates voted. If it seems negative then you are supporting the wrong guy."

If Kreamer survives the primary election she will most likely be up against Wayne T. Gilchrest who gave Dyson a close running in the last election. Gilchrest is for the family as is Kreamer, but he has no political experience compared to Kreamer's twelve years in public office.

Many of Washington College's students as well as faculty and staff are in the congressional district Mrs. Kreamer is running in and are strongly encouraged to vote. If anyone wishes to help Kreamer in her campaign they should contact her campaign headquarters in her hometown of Aberdeen at 118 Bel Air Avenue or call 1-301-272-7828. Don't forget to vote!

Julie Greene is a junior majoring in Political Science.

In the world: Gulf crisis continues

United States

There is apparently no end to the conflict in the Persian Gulf to be seen in the immediate future. Although more than 700 Westerners have been allowed to leave Iraq and Kuwait, an estimated 11,000 still remain, and the numbers of those stranded increase daily as more and more Westerners are rounded up.

The cost of the continued deploying of American troops to the Persian Gulf is expected to reach an estimated $6 billion by the end of 1990. Even if war is avoided and the conflict resolved, American troops will reportedly remain in the area to constrain Suddam Hussein or any other Middle Eastern aggressor and to limit the risk of Iraq's use of its chemical, biological, or nuclear weapon potential.

In other news, a recent survey financed by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America found that an ever-increasing segment of the American public, including teenagers, is rejecting illegal drugs, regarding their use as dangerous and unattractive.

Soviet Union

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev has ordered political reform of the Armed Forces, the KGB, and the police. This week, Gorbachev signed a decree providing for the reconstructing of political organs in the military and the police so that they now pursue the state's policy of defense instead of that of the Communist party. Previously all three units were controlled by and used for the benefit of the Party.

Koreas

The Prime Ministers of North and South Korea met for the first time on September 4. Formal talks were to take place over the next three days. These talks focussed on the easing of military and political confrontation and the launching of multilateral changes.

South Africa

Violence continues to erupt throughout South Africa. The most recent outbreak took place in the black township of Sebokeng. Thirty-six were killed, including eleven citizens shot by soldiers sent to reinforce the police. Ironically, this outburst occurred on the morning of President F.W. de Klerk's highly publicized tour of the troubled township of Soweto where he called for an end to the strife occurring throughout the country.

Citizens, supported by Nelson Mandella, accused the police and army units of assisting Zulu vigilantes in an attack on a migrant worker hostel located in the township. Eyewitness reports suggested the army 'came "determined to shoot. The army says its soldiers were attacked by an angry mob of 5,000 and acted entirely out of self defense. The shootings are being investigated, however, as this is not the first time the army has been accused of collaborating with the Zulu vigilantes.

Putting this campus into a stupor

Phil "Slice" Macek

If one has the courage, one can venture down to the basement of Minta Martin. For down there lives a man combining the political savvy of Henry Kissinger, the military prowess of Napoleon Bonaparte, the oratory skills of Winston Churchill, the human compassion of Adolf Hitler, and the grand vision of Douglass Cater (remember the Master Plan?). Of course, I'm talking about Stuart L. Neiman, the president of the S.G.A. Stu has redecorated his apartment totally in black (even the silverware is black-now that is smooth). Somehow I have the same feeling that Stu would do the same thing to the White House if he were elected President of the United States.

In an effort to acquaint Stu with the new students and faculty, I sat down with him and conducted an informal interview. Hopefully, the questions reflect Stu as a complex individual with many sides to his personality (and yes, even an acute sense of humor-which should surprise some people.) While Stu's face was thinly veiled by blue-gray cigar smoke, I asked him the following questions:

Slice: What kind of pressure, if any, do you feel following Steve and all his success?

Stu: I don't really feel any pressure. Every S.G.A. President brings his own philosophy to the office, and one President's success or failure shouldn't have any bearing on his successor. Plus, Steve and I worked very closely last year and I intend to carry on the programs he has already established.

Slice: What is the state of the Honor Code? Is it being given a "face-lift" or not?

Stu: The Honor Code has not been changed. In order to change it a committee would have to be set up. The S.G.A., faculty, and administration would merely suggest changes; it would be up to the committee to actually implement these changes. The present deadlock is over whether the Honor Code should encompass social behavior as well as academic work. Personally, I feel the Honor Code should pertain only to academic work.

Slice: What kind of reaction do you get when you tell people you sleep with three different sororities every night?

Stu: I have always wanted to sleep with 250 women on top of me, and I figure this is the closest I'll ever get. Of course, I'll keep trying.

Slice: Your convocation speech was a radical departure from previous speeches from S.G.A. presidents. What has been the response?

Stu: At first, I thought it caught people by surprise by its bluntness. Since the initial reaction, I have received no fewer than 8 letters and dozens of comments in support of my stand. We don't need to make radical change. However, we do need gradual change in attitude towards what is considered normal social behavior.

Slice: Granted, we all know about your disgust in the alcohol/drug abuse at this school. Do you think that you, as S.G.A. President, can successfully deter this abuse?

Stu: In response to the wording of your question-No. I am not anti-alcohol. This has been one of the greatest political misconceptions since the time of the Carter administration. The only thing that I have a problem with is the flagrant stupidity that often accompanies flagrant drinking. As far as I'm concerned we are at an age where we must accept responsibility for each and every one of our actions, including those of launching appliances from the second floor of dorms and setting off fire extinguishers at 4 a.m. just to see a womens' dorm practice fire evacuation techniques. As for drugs, it's a problem everywhere. As an adolescent addiction counselor, I have attended too many funerals and tried to help people through too many bad trips to understand why people are so willing to put themselves at risk for a simple high.

Slice: So we can assume that you don't want this campus to be dry?

Stu: Absolutely, Slice. As a representative of the students I would fight any attempt to make this a completely dry campus. But, people have got to start acting more responsibly before someone gets really hurt or even killed and we are subsequently forced to make this a dry campus.

Slice: Where did you get the black silverware from?

Stu: Chesapeake Pottery. They have a fine assortment of black things. In fact, my whole room is black—a color which people seem to think represents an aspect of my personality.

Slice: How have you handled the negative things that were said about you last year? Have there been any repercussions?

Stu: Last year I made a very serious mistake—I fought the criticism instead of trying to use it constructively. Whenever someone puts themselves in this position they open themselves up to criticism. With the exception of one incident last year where I do admit fault, I feel the rest of the criticism was based on personality. I know that I can be difficult to get along with (Boy do I know this. Let's face it, not everyone likes cigar smoke.) In terms of repercussions, no, there have not been any. I'd like to work with those people this year, but I do wish that they would have the common decency to sit down and talk with me instead of writing notes in blood red ink on the backs of poll forms.

Slice: Do you have one main goal for this year?

Stu: My goal for this year is namely this: to get people to understand what it means to make a conscious decision about their own personal actions. The definition of a conscious decision is two-fold. First off, to know what you're doing presently and to know what the future ramifications of such actions will be. Secondly, you will not try to pass the blame when you get in trouble because of your decisions.

Slice: Do you have any brothers or sisters?

Stu: I was an only child and grandchild on both sides of my family until last October, when my stepmother gave birth to little Jaqui (a more spoiled child there never was.)

Slice: What sign are you?

Stu: Pisces. Just like one of my idols—Albert Einstein (the other idol being Peter Sellers). Old Al and I really have a lot in common: we both have big noses, we are both Jewish , we both smoke a pipe, we both have receding hairlines, we both have similar gastrointestinal problems, we both have the functional inability to learn a foreign language, and most importantly, we both have the same birthday (March 14).

Slice: O.K. Bush gets assassinated, Quayle is off playing Nintendo, and there is really nobody left to turn to. You are offered the position of President of the United States, do you accept?

Stu: Absolutely, if for no other reason than to prove that a five foot, five inch, Jewish bachelor could sit in the oval office. What's more, Slice, I would make you, Secretary of Defense; Nick D'arcangelo, Secretary of Education; Phil Tom Jackson, Secretary of the Treasury; and Doug Cater, Secretary of Health and Human Services. Thus guaranteeing one of the shortest presidencies in history.

Slice: Do you want a Stu Neiman sandwich in the dining hall?

Stu: No, but I do want a Stu Neiman drink at Miss Dee's. I also want the front porch of Kent House to have a plaque with a bronze cigar and my name on it.

Slice: What do you plan on doing once you graduate from Washington College?

Stu: I hope to finish my book on adolescent substance abuse, which could lead to a possible career in writing. I'm definitely going to graduate school for psychology so I can eventually practice in the field. Finally, regardless of what I do, I will continue to lecture in the country about adolescent substance abuse so that others will be able to make truly conscious decisions.

As I left Stu's apartment I couldn't help but feel a few tiny pangs of jealousy about Stu. After all, here was man with the school in the palm of his hand, the best movie collection I have ever seen, the respect and adoration of the entire free world, and 250 available women directly overhead. God Bless America.

What is WacHappenings ? Basically it's the Washington College day in a nutshell. The paper is run, and compiled daily by Brian Gimelson, a Junior who is double-majoring in Business and Art History. "I had a couple of goals in mind when I got the idea of starting this kind of paper," says Brian. " First of all I thought that it would be convenient for the Washington College community to have a list of daily events all compiled into a single sheet. I thought this hopefully would give students who may not normally know of an event, any information they would need surrounding it. This I thought hopefully would cut down on some of the mailbox stuffing of flyers and information that students and faculty both are inundated with quite frequently. Also I had hoped that by starting some kind of a paper like this, that it would develop a better sense of community on the campus, by letting the community as a whole know what all of its' parts are doing at any one time." Gimelson says that he has received a lot of encouragement for this paper from students and staff alike, but he has also received some negativity as well as to the papers usefulness. "Some students question me with whether or not a daily paper is needed at WC, and I've heard some things like 'who has time to read a daily paper', to which I reply to all who doubt it's usefulness that if you want to be better informed WacHappenings is there for you, and it is there for you even if you don't. I feel that one of the reasons people go to college is to become better informed about one thing or another, and I am just trying to give people some insights into their surroundings that they may not otherwise be familiar with." The paper comes out on a daily basis before 8:30 A.M., and there is a copy placed in every classroom (in Bill Smith, Dunning/Decker, and Gibson, as well as posted up in high traffic areas such as in the foyer of Bill Smith, the faculty lounge near the mail room, and the corkboard leading up the steps to the Dining Hall. "A big problem that I've seen so far is that a lot of students see a copy of WacHappenings and they take it. The paper is meant to be read and left where it is. This way it will be there for the next people to read it as well. So if you want information from it, memorize it, write it down, or look at another copy of the paper later, but leave it where it is." Additions to the paper are free to all campus organizations and the Administration. Personal ads can be placed at a rate of $1 for the first 25 words, and 10 cents each additional word. In addition there are drop off boxes located in the mail room, student affairs, the faculty lounge. You can leave additions to the paper in these drop off boxes, up until 3:00 PM for the next days issue. Or you can leave additions to the paper at Somerset 205 up until 7:00 P.M. for the next days issue. Gimelson hopes that this paper will take off, and at one point receive funding out of the student activity fee. "This paper has a lot of possibilities for helping out the Washington College Community. However it is up to the students and the faculty to ultimately decide it's fate. I didn't design this paper to be a replacement or even a supplement to the Elm. The Elm reports a lot of the features that go on around campus, while WacHappenings merely reports the facts. Due to it's frequency though it can accomplish some more impromptu things that would require much more planning in order to get into the Elm ."

Washington College takes Bermuda by storm

As we embarked to this mysterious and primitive isle, feelings of uneasiness ran through our minds while we were on our way to the Bermuda Triangle.... Thoughts of lost ships and downed planes made us anxious when entering the "BERMUDA ZONE". All our anxieties were set aside when we saw the tranquil turquoise waters, the clear blue skies, and Dr. Munson waiting eagerly for us to get through customs (well, then again, maybe not all our anxieties – we were being graded).

ADVENTURE #1: TAKING A SHOWER

Due to the lack of precipitation, we had a choice of three different types of showers: military, two minute, or three minute – needless to say the majority chose the three minute option. During these three minutes of haste we were given the opportunity to reminisce of our homes; so far, yet so near (the government of Bermuda imported water from several New York springs).

ADVENTURE #2: THE DISCOURSE

Amidst all the fun and the folly, we were required to gain some knowledgeable insight about Bermuda and its coral reefs. We were lectured to by various members of the Bermuda Biological Station community, by Ben Walter – a graduate student assisting Dr. Munson, and by Dr. Munson. All persons were very experienced in their field of study which became apparent during these seminars. The lecture topics ranged from Bermudian Geology to the subtropical marine environment, and included Mangrove Swamps, Corals and Coral Reef Fishes, Fauna and Flora of Bermuda, Plankton Dynamics, and Reintroduction of Native Species.

ADVENTURE #3: FIELD STUDIES

It should be reminded to everyone that suntan lotion (waterproof, that is) is required for this trip. (One should bring their own for it tends to be a scare commodity on the island – unless you wish to spend approximately $14.99 for an 8 ounce bottle.) Most of our daytime was spent in the field (water) and some in the lab. We snorkeled about many different locations including Ferry Point, Nonsuch Island, South Beach, Harrington Sound, and North Rock. In the lab we entertained ourselves by identifying basic structures and functions of corals, tunicates, sea cucumbers, and various other specimens collected at the various field sites (it should be stressed that removal of corals and other organisms from the reefs is prohibited by Bermudian law and is strictly enforced. The Biological Station is permitted to gather specimens for scientific study and those specimens are latter returned to their respective field site.) One of the "highlighted" lab trips was the night-time plankton tow. We gathered plankton on the night-time plankton tow, after having disturbed people eating dinner on a cruise ship, and later returned to lab to identify the planktonic structures and to compare these specimens with our earlier daytime plankton tow.

ADVENTURE #4: COLLEGE CREDIT

This trip was the lab component for the Society, Ecology, and the Chesapeake Bay course, Biology 200. Our grades were based upon our performance in the lab, an exam (yes there was an exam) which was given on the Tuesday prior to our departure, and an oral presentation based on a library research topic. The preparation for each presentation consisted of many late nights in the bio station's more than adequate library. The topics for the presentation could be anything pertaining to the subtropical marine environment.

ADVENTURE #5: EDUCATIONAL VOYAGES

Apart from the regular field studies, we visited the Bermuda Aquarium and were given a tour of the facilities by the director of the aquarium. We also participated in several outings to Saint Georges and Hamilton, which are "cities" (but what we would consider towns). One should take note, shopping in Bermuda can cause severe financial deficit. Don't spend too much money – there is an exit tax of fifteen dollars.

It was a great trip and a terrific learning experience.

A long last look at orientation

by Stephanie Fidler

The place is Washington College located in Chestertown, MD. On August 23, each of the new members of the Washington College community arrived with eagerness as they congregated in the school cafeteria for registration prepared for four days of hectic fun. Greeted by the newcoming President., Charles H. Trout everyone was made welcome.

Lisa Katchadurian, a member of the Freshman class commented on her arrival at Washington College.: "I was really nervous about coming here, but when I saw the school my nerves were calmed. Eventually the friendliness of the people really made me feel comfortable here. In one way the school is exactly what I hoped for, because I feel so comfortable here. Coming from overseas it really hasn't been that difficult of a transition for me. "

Throughout the four day weekend there were programs entitled "Choices" including "Honor Code", "Academic Computing", "Academic Success", "Planning for the Future", and a variety of optional sessions which were all beneficial to college life and quite enjoyable. In addition, the peer and faculty advisors gave a lot of their valuable time to help make the weekend as enjoyable as possible for students as possible.

Sunday, the 26th of August the All-Campus picnic took place at the Lelia Hynson Boating Park. It gave all of the Washington College students as well as faculty members an opportunity to learn about one another while offering much enjoyment. Canoes, Sailboats, Volleyball, and eating great food were some of the festivities in progress until about 6:30 p.m.

Matthew Langan, a transfer student from Radford University in Virginia, gave us his opinion on Washington College in comparison to Radford. "I like W.C. a lot more than Radford because the people are more open-minded and relaxed. It's a small school so people have little time to be ignorant of other people, which I like. The academic side to things is quite good—as far as student-faculty ratio. Washington College food in comparison to Radford blows it away!! But I think the cafeteria should serve Maryland crab soup three times a week with a touch of old Bay Seasoning."

Eventually the orientation weekend came to a close leaving behind fond memories and giant hopes for the upcoming four years. Spencer Beck, a freshman from Lancaster, Pennsylvania, had a few comments about orientation weekend. "Now that I've been here

Changes in the Athletic Department

The Athletic Director's office was busier this summer than it has been in recent memory. Two new coaches had to replace two retired coaches; a new Cain Athletic Center Coordinator had to step into a vacancy left by Jeff Troester; furthermore the decision was made to drop men's cross country in favor of men's swimming.

Last spring Athletic Director Geoffrey Miller released the news that former assistant soccer coach Peter Allen was replacing Dr. Tom Bowman.

Bowman resigned as a result of the increasing demands of his veterinary medicine practice. Dr. Bowman joined the W.C. soccer staff in 1972 as an assistant to Ed Athey. Bowman took full duties as head coach in 1982 where he has since posted a career record of 45-76-9 for the Shoremen booters.

Allen is not new to Shoremen soccer; He has spent the last eight years as Bowman's assistant. Allen, this fall, will become only the third soccer coach in the last 34 years.

A changing of the guard was made this summer in the water as well as the land. Washington College announced that former crew coach Don Chatellier, who is retiring from coaching after 35 years at the school, was replaced by former University of Albany coach Mike Davenport.

Although Chatellier's enthusiasm will be missed, Davenport comes to Chestertown with impressive credentials. In 1987 Davenport revamped a club program consisting of 20 to 90 members in just three years.

Davenport's other credentials include having been an assistant coach with the United States National team this past summer. His other coaching endeavors include assistant at University of Central Florida from 1986-87, and head coach of the women's team at the Florida Institute of Technology from 1980-85. He is a USRA certified coach, and has taught a variety of physical education classes including First Aid, CPR, Backpacking, Canoeing, and Cross Country.

With the resignation of Jeff Troester from Cain Athletic Center Coordinator duties, it became evident this summer that a large void had to be filled. Geoffrey Miller filled the position with Todd Helbling, a graduate student in the University of Massachusetts Sport Management Program.

Helbling, who earned a B.B.A from Milsaps College in Jackson, Mississippi, replaces former coordinator Troester, who recently accepted an administrative position in the Kent County Parks and Recreation Program.

Helbling's responsibilities include security, supervision, and scheduling of activities in the gym. The first 13 weeks of Helbling's tenure will serve to complete an internship for the University of Massachusetts Sport Management Program.

The most recent announcement was the decision to drop the men's cross country team in favor of a men's swim team thereby holding onto the 14-sport program at the College.

The decision was made in the wake of waning interest in cross-country during the last several years. Because of the increased interest in the men's swimming club, W.C. has decided to promote it to varsity status in 1990. Dennis Berry will guide the new varsity sport in conjunction with assistant Kim Lessard. Berry has coached the highly successful women's swim team during each of its first five years while Lessard has been his assistant the last two. Berry and Lessard will continue their duties on the women's coaching staff.

REC sports announcement

As REC Sports enters its third year, there is heightened anticipation as each day draws closer to the start of REC Football. Upperclassman, both men and women, have spent the long offseason reviewing tapes, recruiting players to cover-up there weaknesses, and holding informal minicamps.

Freshmen beware hence this is no kid's game. Each year the number of participants grow, this one should prove no exception.

The ALPHA BABIES and the PSEUDO LAMBDAS, women's and men's respective reigning champs, look just as strong this year. Make your rosters and see Frank Garlitz before September 5th.

There are softball tournaments and then there is the Theta Softball Tournament. This year promises to be the biggest one ever.

In an era lacking dynasties the Theta Tourney possesses the Surf and Turf team. They have taken home the cup the last three years and four of the last five(the author anchors 1b for S&T).

The first pitch for this gala weekend is September 22nd. Contact Matt Giller with your teams by September 21st.

REC Sports has added another event to its fall schedule by adding volleyball for both men and women. When schedule is posted see Matt Zeuch.

If you don't like contact sports and/or you just can't find the time in your busy schedule for much activity, REC Sports has something for you. Beginning September 10th on Mondays and Wednesdays at 5pm Aerobic Dance will be available. If interested contact Christy Hilgartner for more details.

At the end of the year, the team that wins the most tournaments and league play takes home the All-Sport Award. This award, by the way, can only be surpassed by the Sophie whatever-you-call-it prize.

Shoreman Soccer wins

Last Saturday the Shoremen(6-3) went north where they outdueled the Dips of F&M(7-4) 19-14. The rain stayed away but the goals were poured on as senior All-Americans Bob Martino and Tim Hormes combined for 9 goals to lead the #2 ranked Shoremen over the previously #4 ranked Diplomats.

Although F&M played a tight zone as anticipated, the dry field made it easier for the deer to run wild and work an impressive and effective fast break. The WAC shot out to a 7-3 first quarter lead and never looked in the rear view mirror as they were in the driver's seat the rest of the way.

The home team cut the lead, however, to 12-9 before the halftime horn blew. The Shoremen spread the lead to 16-11 after three frames; but Dave Slomkowski was excellent in the second half between the pipes not allowing the Dips to threaten.

Hormes led all scorers with five goals. Martino excelled with four goals and three assists while Hank Miller netted three and assisted on another on the same middie line. Jed Cronin and Greg Rupert each scored two while Nick Darcangelo and Bennie Lamanna tallied one goal and two assists apiece. Freshman Dave Lipinski scored a goal and Mark Cavallaro completed the scoring with an assist. Slomkowski finished with 16 saves.

The Shoremen are on the road this weekend at Washington and Lee and vastly improved team that is ranked #11 in the latest poll. The Juggernauts return home the following Saturday, April 28th, to face off against the #6 ranked Sea Gulls of Salisbury State.

Bramble,Wyman honored by Volvo

Matt Giller

In August Holly Bramble and Fred Wyman, the women's and men's respective tennis coaches received coveted Volvo Tennis/Varsity Award Program Grants.

It was announced this summer by the Intercollegiate Tennis Coaches Association (ITCA), which administers the program, that the men's program will receive $750 and $100 will be awarded to the women's program.

Volvo North America awarded over $60,000 in grants to tennis programs across the United States through the unique, first-year program, which will continue in 1991. Coaches qualified for the grants by contributing a minimum of 10 hours of community service and documenting successful efforts to publicize their tennis programs.

Wyman's community service included giving free clinics to area players and running a local tournament. Bramble's community service included running an adult tennis clinic and donating equipment to local schools.

A maximum of five awards was given in each women's and men's Division I region and small college division (II, III, NAIA, Junior College), with first through fifth place determined by a team's position in the Volvo Tennis/Collegiate Rankings relative to the other schools that entered. Wildcard awards were available to unranked teams.

Washington's women's team finished the year unranked nationally in Division III. The $100 grant represents a wildcard award in Division III. However the men's team finished the year ranked No. 6. The $750 grant represents a third-place award in Division III.

On August 28th Volvo honored Wyman with the 1990 Coaches Community Service Award for Region I men's coaches.

Wyman's second award was selected by a special committee from the ITCA, Volvo Tennis, and the USTA. The committee tabbed one men's coach and one women's coach from each of the ITCA's eight regions. They were selected for their outstanding volunteer contributions to tennis in their communities.

Wyman, a full-time dentist who is a volunteer coach at W.C., is a frequent speaker in the Kent County area. In addition he gives clinics for juniors, seniors, and intermediate players throughout the year.

His men's team boasts the Division III singles Champion, Larry Gewer as well as the runner-up, senior Scott Reed. Larry Gewer made the 1990 Rolex All-Star Team.

The Great Sabha speaks...

It is an honor for me to welcome to the Elm sports staff one of the most respected psychics in the Milky Way, the Great Sabha. Although his name is of Indian origin, he journeyed to the United States five years ago and until now aided the intellectuals at the Institute for Advanced Studies in Princeton, New Jersey. At the Institute he worked for loaves of bread and monthly shelter; he will work for less on this staff. His credentials include predicting natural disasters, stock market trends, World Series runners-up, and both Bud-Bowl results-we are truly in awe. For our exclusive subscribers, he will flawlessly predict this year's pigskin events-the winners, the losers, as well as other tidbits that flow from his unearthly vibes.

College National Champion: Fordham - any program whose hardest competition is Hofstra should win it all. Scratch dat. Florida State - if they can get by Miami and Auburn in October (the month of the Indian) they should cruise to an undefeated season.

Heisman Trohy Winner: Ty Detmer - Let's just say BYU 's QB's are overdue.

Other events the Great Sabha foresees:

Lou Holtz will leave Notre Dame to be a forest ranger. Scratch dat. He will coach the Bears, not feed them.

A University of Miami football player will apply for a library card and be rejected.

The USC cheerleaders will propose marriage to the Great Sabha - religion will prevent him from marrying more than six of them.

Navy will beat Notre Dame. Scratch dat. All the Midshipmen are soaking in the Persian Gulf sights. The Irish will prevail.

The UNLV football team will have a better winning percentage than their basketball team.

Super Bowl Champ: San Francisco will be the first team to win 3 Bowls in a row. Moon will direct Houston's run-and-shoot offense to the annual toilet bowl; however they will prove to be better in defeat than the Orange Crush.

Surprises: New York Jets - The best offense coupled with the worst defense will get them a wild card bid in their weak conference.

Rookie Stars - Both Big Apple teams have them. Giants have got a great running back in Rodney Hampton from Georgia; the Jets have a Toon protege lining up on the opposite slot by the name of Rob Moore. The Colts front office has been smoking opium since they moved out of Baltimore - Jeff George is a Sudra (Indian for bumb).

Other events Sabha foresees:

Philadelphia Eagles coach Buddy Ryan will find religion as his guide in life. He will change into a loving man erasing all urges of vengeance. Scratch dat. He will sucker punch the team reverend during a pregame prayer.

Stadiums will properly enforce the limited use of alcohol of all ticket holders before and during games. The Great Sabha's vibes are not that strong here; however the Great Sabha's religious beliefs provoke him to wish this.

Atlanta Falcons coach Jerry Glanville will leave a ticket for the Great Sabha (and date).

Jimmy "The Greek" Snyder will be the proud grandfather of an eight pound six ounce baby boy named Tyrone.

Bo will meet the Great Sabha and will be heard saying to the prophet,"nice shoes."

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Christian Slater Pumps up the Volume

Christian Slater had gone a long way towards erasing the startling impression he made as the teenage anarchist in "Heathers" with a string of dogs typified by the dismal "Young Guns II". Certainly films like "The Wizard" and "Gleaming the Cube" were not about to sway Slater's detractors who accused him of being a mere brat pack Jack Nicholson impersonator. While his latest film, "Pump up the Volume", is no cinematic masterpiece there certainly seems to be a much more appealing continuity to Slater's career if his films between this one and "Heathers" are ignored.

Slater plays Mark Hunter, a shy alienated teenager attending a suburban high school in Arizona. Among his teachers and peers, Mark is painfully inarticulate; after school, Mark finds his voice by using a short wave radio console to broadcast his own pirate radio show aimed at similarly disaffected teens. Mark transforms himself into the radical Hard Harry with his own cynical live-to-shock personality and ends up becoming the cult spokesman of what could best be described as the "River's Edge" generation. When Mark targets his high school administration as central to many of the local teens problems, the adults in control strike back. The crisis worsens when a suicidal listener of Mark's kills himself and Mark suddenly finds himself in the the strangely familiar position of backing down or taking a stand. When the sensual, rebellious Nora (Samantha Mathis) discovers Mark's alter-ego she challenges him to take responsibility for what he started. It's easy to sympathize with writer-director's Allan Moyle's ambition to make a teen film along the lines of Oliver Stone's and Eric Bogosian's "Talk Radio"- after all, cult radio has become a potent metaphor for the dark undercurrents of the American psyche. The problem with the film is it is impossible to accept Hard Harry as some sort of incredible emotional catharsis for the teens in the film. It's too bad that Moyle settles on offering a series of easy answers for hard questions and glosses over the truly difficult part of being a teenager: knowing the right questions to ask in the first place. It is as if Moyle believes that giving teens a spokesman will solve the real problem of teenagers, which is finding an identity. In avoiding the hard issues of being a teenager, Moyle's screenplay ends up pandering and manipulating. The truly interesting aspects of the film are the performances of Slater and Mathis and the film's well chosen soundtrack. Finally Slater has found another film where he can unbridle his perverse manic intensity and come out smelling like a rose; too bad "Pump up the Volume" is little more than a showcase for his talents.

Sinead O'Connor at Merriweather Post

There are vocalists and vocalists. Some have good material, and others bad. For example, if you go to see Whitney Houston in concert, or Anita Baker, you can expect some wonderful delivery of musical inanity. If you get to see Mariah Carey, you can hope to hear the full seven-octave range of her voice displayed in pop R&B that barely allows her to strut her stuff. And if you see Sinead O'Connor, you hope to get amazing vocal stunts and interesting songwriting. Her latest album, I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got, after weeks at number one, is now holding at eleventh on Billboard's charts in its sixteenth week. This is one 26-year old sensation who has the material to match the voice.

So why am I so ambivalent about her concert at Merriweather Post last Sunday night? Maybe it was the short set, the lack of a punch, or the use of prerecorded instrumentation. I certainly have no complaints about her vocals. They were like the album: alternating between strident and soft, rock and folk. When O'Connor opened with "Feel So Different", the song that has become her anthem, everything seemed fine. The song sounded much as it had on the album, but there's not much you can do to it. But after listening to "The Emperor's New Clothes," which also sounded exactly like the album cut, I began to get worried. The crowd was standing, but the dancing was not enthusiastic.

One of the reasons one goes to a concert is to hear new twists on songs one already knows. In the case of O'Connor, whose dancing is not exactly professional caliber, new arrangements would have been the best reason. So what approach does she take? Upon beginning "I Want Your (Hands On Me)" she removes her jacket and starts to dance in a white swimsuit. It approached the point of self-parody- why does Sinead O'Connor have to dance on stage with her hands grabbing her crotch? Then came an acoustic set.

"Three Babies" sounded just like the album version, until the very end, when she finished it with a refrain of "I'm lonely" that got plenty of applause. "Black Boys on Mopeds" was emotionally charged, but again, was unchanged. At the beginning of "Last Day of Our Acquaintance," she asked how many women in the crowd had been screwed over by men. She then dedicated the song to them, and proceeded to render the song quietly, punctuating the chorus with "Fuck off" until the band burst in near the end of the song. It was the highlight of the evening- and it was followed by a remarkably bland "Nothing Compares 2 U" dedicated to the men, "who are nice- sometimes."

"Jackie" was followed by "I Am Stretched On Your Grave." It also sounded just like the album version, which is not surprising, considering everything but the vocals was prerecorded. The lights kept flashing on an empty drum set. For those who don't know the song, it consists entirely of drums and O'Connor's voice, except for a violin solo at the end which was provided by a hard disc. The lush string sounds of the album were provided by keyboards that controlled a recording: no fingers were flying over that Roland. And that was the end of the concert.

Oh, there was an encore, consisting of an Irish folk song that was a vocal marvel but little else, and an unremarkable new song with mostly unintelligible lyrics, but the crowd just stood through it, expecting a searing finale, perhaps "Troy," or "Mandinka," or "I Do Not Want What I Haven't Got." It never came, and when the lights went on, people just looked at their watches, realized that an hour and fifteen minutes were all they were going to get, and left. Ambivalence in a review is unusual, I suppose, but it is confusing and saddening to see an artist of Sinead O'Connor's caliber stoop to Madonna moves like pre-recordings and bathing suits. It was a great light show, but where's the $22.50 worth of performance?

Perhaps the 26-year old Irish lass lacks the stage experience to do the best job with the wonderful material she's got. Perhaps her extremely short set stems from the extraordinary difficulty of her vocal lines- but if so, an intermission for a brief rest, and perhaps a lower price tag, might help. One should not walk away from a concert ready to play the album because one hopes it will excite more.

In memoriam: Stevie Ray Vaughan, one of the premier guitar artists in the rock and blues world, died this week in a helicopter crash. Born in Texas in the mid-'50's, he was best known for his work with his band Double Trouble, and won several Grammy's for his guitar artistry, as well as being nominated for best rock performance and blues performance on several occasions. Also killed in the crash were some non-performing members of Eric Clapton's entourage.

Parental advisory : explicit lyrics

I have never been asked to produce identification when purchasing a record album. Before a few days ago, I had never seen a record with a warning printed on the cover. I picked up the new Jane's Addiction compact disc and there was a small rectangle in the upper right hand corner which read "parental advisory/ explicit lyrics". The same is true of Prince's new "Graffiti Bridge". This same warning will probably start popping up all over your own record collection in the future.

There was a letter to the editor in the latest Rolling Stone from a thirteen year old claiming that until 2live Crew had received all of the negative publicity none of his friends had heard of them. Now all of them own a copy of their album. Rather than provide a warning for parents, this new advisory may have the same negative effect. When I was younger, I wanted to see 'R' movies because they were more graphic. Will this warning become the same sort of stigma?

I don't mean to say that record companies really care if parents are filtering out all the explicit music for their children. It's something they've done in response to the efforts of organizations like the P.M.R.C. and other philistines. I mean to say that this kind of negative hype has a way of heightening the problem. There's a real market out there for crudity, violence and sexism. That and all the media attention has been the key to 2live Crew's success.

Some people read an article about art and obscenity with 2live Crew's album cover printed as on of the chief examples and they organize a record burning in their town; some people force their local record store not to sell 'obscene music' by way of pickets or boycott. Some people want to know what all the fuss is about and they buy the album right away, and then they're stuck with a record that has no aesthetic value at all. Just drum machines, a string of spoken expletives and a synthesizer. If they ever played 2live Crew on the radio, there'd be one long continual beep.

for about a week I have discovered Natty Boh and an unlimited amount of preying mantis."

The hustle-bustle of the four day orientation may have ended but with all of the activities going on such as the play, the cookout, the dance, and the movie, students realized where they desired to be—Washington College.

Caroline Jensen, a freshman in Minta Martin noted her rough schedule throughout the weekend and commented: "During freshman orientation weekend, mixing field hockey with seminars and trying to grab something to eat at the same time was virtually impossible! Student affairs packed my schedule so tightly that I only saw my roommates when I woke up and went to bed."

It is easy to see that Washington College has a lot to offer all of its students and hopefully everyone will take advantage of all of the opportunities here. One final comment from Matthew Langan, "Bring back the Phi Sigs!"

you want to have a little idiotic rectangle warning you away from every record for years to come just because 'darn' was what the guitarist muttered during a solo and the microphone picked it up? Censorship is not the answer. There aren't many of us out there that don't know what's being said during that beep when 'Darling Nikki" is played on the radio.

There aren't many adolescents out there that actually let their parents do their record shopping for them (unless they're parents are extremely generous and they're broke). Besides, 2live Crew is nothing other than amusing. That someone could record that type of boring and crude rap and it would be taken seriously is laughable. That is has sold as well as it had is humorous.

This type of 'music' sells on the pretense of shock value and attitude. As long as there is someone to say that it's offensive and obscene, there will be someone to listen to it. I just hope they don't start printing up those annoying little boxes on everything. I can see it now: John Denver, G. New Kids on the Block, P.G.-13. The Doors, P.G. Prince, R. 2live Crew, X. And when you just have to pick up the latest: sonny, do you have I.D.?

THE CHEF'S CORNER

Welcome Back....

The Washington College Dining Services Staff welcomes all returning students, incoming freshman and transfers. We wish you well during this academic year in all your endeavors in our community. Do not hesitate to stop in and talk with the Supervisor on Duty if we can be of further service to you.

"Congratulations and Welcome" to several new members of the WCDS staff:

Mr. Joseph Lill (formerly of Morrison's Food Management Company) joins us as Dining Service Supervisor II. Joe's credits include training at the Culinary Institute of America and extensive food preparation in many restaurants and hotels along the East Coast.

Mrs. Sharon Crew now serves as your Snack Bar Manager.

Mrs. Ruth Dickerson and Mrs. Sharon Hurd also join us as "Cook Emeritus" and Assistant Manager of the Snack Bar, respectively.

Mrs. Lisa Travis (Dining Service Supervisor I), became a proud mother for the second time with the birth of Joseph Michael Travis on 4 August 90.

Several special meals are planned for you this year. The Welcome Back Dinner will be held as part of the Fall Convocation Celebration on August 30th. Also, get ready for our Beach Party, coming on September 5th. The menu will include Eastern Shore Fried Fish, Steamed Clams, Hamburgers, Hot Dogs, Beach Fries, Steamed Zuccini & Yellow Squash, Fozen Yogurt, Almond Ginger Sand Tarts and Pina Colada Punch. The event will feature live entertainment on the Hynson Lounge Terrace; limbo contest to be held, prizes will be awarded.

As always, we have a few general reminders for your convenience. The serving line closes promptly at the designated time and the Main Dining Room closes to all patrons 30 minutes later. If your are involved in late-running athletic events, have your coach call the Dining Service Office and talk with the Supervisor on duty.

FURTHER INFORMATION

1. I.D. cards must be presented to the numbers person during every meal. One grace meal is permissible during each week.
2. NO CREDIT is given on any WC board or ticket program for meals missed.
3. Washington College operates with 19,14 or 10 meal board plans. The 19 meal package is the most inexpensive per meal cost. Should you want to change your meal plan, please see the Student Affairs Office.
4. Box lunches are available for both boarding students or cash if ordered 36 hours in advance. See a WCDS manager for more information.
5. Menus are posted at the entrance of the Dining Hall and sent out to all RA's, academic and staff offices. The daily menu is located at the entrance of the serving line.
6. All checks concerning the WCDS should be made out to Washington College. Billings should be paid at the business office.
7. Please be sure to read the Dining Services Information packet. It includes all meal times, carry-out policies, meal plans and other info. If you did not receive one during registration, please ask for one at the dining hall.

Trout

detailed, he has many plans to make this campus the best that it can be. He hopes to do this by meeting and interacting with the students and faculty and hearing what their concerns are. "My long term goal is to integrate living and learning, and to show students that alcohol is not the only lubricant of social discourse on campus," says Trout.

Trout believes that Washington College is not only to affect the lives of the students here, but to educate them so that they will in turn be able to affect the world in which we live in a positive way.

In his Convocation night speech, he spoke of some of the problems in the world and what Washington College's role was in dealing with them. These problems included drug dealing and drug use, the homeless, acid rain and pollution. "Washington college is a citadel of intelligence," he says. Students, according to Trout, are supposed to take what they have learned here at W.C. and turn it into 'know-how' when dealing with the many problems that plague the nation.

President Trout is starting his first year at Washington College and like the freshmen who began a week ago, he needs to watch and listen in order to see what W.C. is all about:— its strengths and weaknesses and all the areas in between.

things about this program is that it provides employment for the full time staff like those who work in maid service, " says Brown. Because of this program, many people do not find themselves unemployed for the summer months.

Approximately thirty Washington College students stayed in Chestertown this summer to work under this program along with the twenty five high school students who were also hired to work part time.

Each college department hires their own employees. For instance, the dining hall and conference staff is hired by Mary Brown. Admissions, Maintenance, Student Services, the Library, as well as any other department that requires summer help will each hire individually.

Admissions duties include giving tours to prospective students while those who work for Maintenance are hired to repair those things that need attention over the summer and throughout the programs. Those who work for the Library may be working on completing special projects for the college by continuing in the research process or even beginning research on another project.

The Dining Hall Staff throughout the summer conferences serve all the meals, arranges any picnics and rest breaks that might be planned, provide catering services, make beds and change linen in the rooms between the departure of one group and the arrival of another, as well as just being available to the guests to provide for their needs.

Brown also has three assistants, the Liasons, who are to fill in when one of the workers can not show up for work, help when extra assistance is needed and generally oversee everything and check to see that every detail has been attended to. This summer, Teresa Alborn, Jen Jefferson, and Jon Longest were the three assistants. Each of them has over two years of experience in working for this program.

Mary Brown, a graduate of W.C., worked herself as a Liason during her summers while attending college. She then worked in admissions as a traveling recruiter for approximately six months and following that she obtained her current position in Dining Services.

During the summer, Brown attends to the needs and organizes the activities of the groups staying here at W.C. "It is challenging to meet the needs of so many different groups, especially the last two years with all of the construction that has been taking place," she said. "The complete college team effort" is what she says attributes to the success of the program.

Even though her job may seem like it should end at the end of the summer, when all of the conference groups are gone, Mary Brown is already hard at work for next year. She must recruit new groups and organize contracts, take an inventory of the supplies that will be available to the groups, complete the bills, as well as help out in the Dining Hall during special events such as the Beach Party Dinner.

Recruiting the new groups is very time consuming as she wants to pick those groups that will be beneficial to the college as well as benefit from the college. "I am very selective and want to pick the cream of the crop," she says.

Students interested in working for this program must go through an application and interview process. Applications are accepted starting in the beginning of the spring semester through February first. Interviews are held from then until the start of Spring Break and those selected are notified by April first.

Brown says that she is looking for those students that are adept in the areas of public relations and customer service, and those who are willing to work hard. "The work is sometimes grueling. It isn't unusual to have three eighteen hour days in a row."

Most of those employed are paid on a salary basis and live in the dorms free of charge. This must be approved every year by the administration and is subject to change.

The conference services are held a week after graduation and continue through the second week of August. Brown's main goal for the summer coming up is to improve the transition between Commencement Exercises and the beginning of the conference program and then the transition back to the beginning of the school year. "I am also looking to continue the open lines of communication between departments as that is a major factor in the running and organizing of all the programs."

Loving Cups Awarded at Convocation

The 1989 - 1990 Loving Cups were won by the Alpha Chi Omega sorority and the Lambda Pi Delta fraternity.

Each year the sorority and the fraternity with the highest grade point average are awarded the Loving Cups at Fall Convocation. These averages are computed by the registrars office.

At the end of the year, the registrar requests that each sorority and fraternity turn in a membership list to them. This list must include active members as well as pledges. From there, the average grade point average is computed by computer. In the years past, before computers, this must all be done by hand.

In the past decade the Alpha Chis have won five times. This is the first win for the Lambdas.

Since 1980 the Kappa Alpha fraternity has won six times and the Phi Sigma fraternity has won three. On the sorority side the Alpha Omicrom Pi sorority has won twice, as have the ZTA's.

The Loving Cups are the highest honor for the sororities and the fraternities. It may also help to end some of the stereotypes that students and faculty may have about a particular fraternity or sorority, as said by Steve Kline, the Lambda Social Chairman. "Everyone thinks that the Lambdas are a bunch of lacrosse players and jocks. Maybe now they will see that at the same time we do get some work done."

The earliest report of the Loving Cups was found in the Washington College Catalogue for 1932-1933. According to the catalogue the Loving Cups were originally called the Erroll L. Fox Loving Cups. They were donated by Mrs. Fox in honor of her late husband Dr. Erroll Fox. Dr. Fox was a professor of chemistry here at Washington College.

Professors on Sabbatical

by Tracey Connell

A number of Washington College faculty members are scheduled to be on sabbatical this academic year.

Dr. Richard DeProspo, Assistant Professor Department of English, is currently in .
He....blah blah blah

William Jeffords Chaffin, Assistant Librarian and Director of Reader's Services, will be away from Washington for two years. Chaffin is at the University of Loyolla's Chicago branch in Rome.

Dr. David Newell, Chairman of the Philosophy Department, is currently at Westpoint. Newell was granted sabbatical to teach philosophy there through the 1988-89 academic year. He was granted an extension and so will remain at Westpoint until Fall semester 1991.

Three professors were granted shorter sabbaticals. Dr. Eugene P. Hamilton, Assistant Professor Department of Math and Computer Sciences, stated that he is planning to commute to the University of Delaware to conduct joint research in the area of "Derivational Derivatives, a form of mathematical analysis". He will return to classes Spring semester.

Dr. Andre F. Yon, Professor of French in the Department Modern Languages, is blah blah blah Yon will also return to classes for Spring semester.

Dr. Daniel Premo, Professor and Chair Department of Political Science and International Studies, plans to spend the second half of this academic year in Central America. He will first be returning to the site of a previous sabbatical to conduct follow up research on the Guatemalan political process. Premo visited Guatemala in 1979 and again in 1987. He stated that he will also visit Nicaragua, which is of extreme interest as elections were held last February, and Costa Rica. The third major site of research will be the Mayan ruins on the Yucatan Peninsula.

Premo commented on the value of such sabbaticals in that professors can return to Washington College and its students bringing with them a fresher outlook as well as a wealth of new information.

"Getting back into the field is very important for the kind of work I do".

Stenger Tanks Still not Moved

The Stenger gas and propane tanks located behind Cardinal dorms have yet to be moved. A possible relocation site was announced early last May by Mr. Stenger and at the end of last semester it was under consideration by the Zoning Commission and was to be voted upon at the end of May. To gain final approval, the Stenger corporation had to submit a sediment control plan and also a landscaping plan to the Commission. The site is located outside of Wharton.

According to Mr. Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance here at Washington college, the situation has undergone some significant changes since last spring. The Zoning Commission did vote on the proposal at the end of May and voted to permit the rezoning of the tanks. Between then and this fall, however, a minimal amount was done to move the tanks by the Stenger Gas Company.

In the last few weeks a halt to the whole relocation process has been in effect. The Fire Marshall of Chestertown has just recently closed the Stenger Gas Company. According to Hessey, this was done because the area was not properly maintained and because the Fire Marshall couldn't find enough evidence of constant upkeep to the machines and facilities.

The question now is whether Mr. Stenger will make the necessary changes in order to reopen his business and then relocate the propane tanks to the new site, or whether he will simply go out of businness altogether. It is not known at this time what will happen to the tanks if Mr. Stenger does indeed go out of business.

Mr. Hessey commented that he doesn't know the supply level of the tanks upon the closing of the business but he does know that there aren't any deliveries or gas operations.

The location of these tanks is a concern to both the students who live in Cardinal as well as anyone who works in the nearby buildings and the local fire officials as propane leaks could be very dangerous.

The fire department answered two alarms within three days last year. These officials are required to follow strict procedure at every alarm which often includes the evacuations of nearby buildings and stopping traffic that is near the area.

Fire officials stated last year at the time of these incidents that the tanks were relatively safe if they were properly maintained. Being in a very active part of town, however, they were subject to an increased odds of vandalism. They also claimed that eventual employee error is inevitable.

One official described the worst case of an explosion as effecting an area with a radius measuring from the Cardinal Dorms to the Fire Station itself. Although the tanks are considered to be relatively safe at the moment, this type of explosion should be of concern to all of those who live in the area.

Turn on the lights

Are we safe on campus?

It is a question that pops into mind walking down the very dark path from Bill Smith to Minta Martin, or walking from the Cecil parking lot back over to any of the women's dorms on the other side of 213.

With rumors flying about the campus about date rape and attacks on female college students, one would think the college would make an effort to at least install more lighting along paths that people use.

A well lit parking lot is a wonderful thing, but not if it's on the other side of the campus from where people live. Most of the women on this campus live on the east side of 213. There are two parking lots for four dorms if one excludes Kent House, and East Hall from wanting to park there. The next closest parking lots are Bill Smith and Fine Arts. There is no path leading from the Cecil lot, and there are not lights either. Must everyone who moves around the campus after dark either use the fire lane or travel in a group of thirteen to feel safe? Has the Master Plan forgotten where the students live on this campus?

There are no lights next to the brick staircase in front of Middle Hall. A tumble down those stairs could easily break a couple bones, and cost the college a hefty settlement, after all, the lights are there. They were once lit after dark, but now they are as dark as the Reid parking lot by the hedge, or the campus north of Somerset, or the walk from Bill Smith to Minta Martin.

Will someone please turn on the lights?

Students protest alcohol policy

To the Editor,

A few good friends were relaxing on Labor Day, while enjoying one of Maryland's most popular pastimes: a feast of crabs and hops. The energy of thoughts moved the conversation through a broad range of ideas, not the least of which was the beginning school year. Rumors of ensuing changes at W.C. flew back and forth across the table, with conclusions as scrambled as the pile of crab remnants. Clarification was necessary.

As freshmen we were told that our handbook was our contract with the school but there is no parallel between what is documented there and what seems to be the case. Nowhere is it stated that kegs are not allowed on campus yet we were told this by our R.A.'s. nowhere is it stated that students are not allowed to attend off campus bars yet it seems that the college is taking action to prohibit this.

The section of the handbook concerning the alcohal policy states as one of it's goals "the practice of responsible social behavior." Last year a group of students planned an off campus party, where alcohal would be served, and asked for a school van with which to provide safe transportation. The administration denied this request. This year when the same group of people organized a similar event they took money from their own pockets to provide a van. Although the need for safe transportation seemed unimportant to the school, it was not to this group of people. They were rewarded for their endeavors. The company from which they rented the van gave them a ten percent discount for keeping the roads safe. This was definitely a show of "responisble social behavior" and why did the school not uphold a goal set for itself?

Although this action on the part of the school occured last year, it evoked concerns in students that did not fade over the summer. It seems that new, and undocumented changes concerning alcohal are occuring. Is a dry campus the goal of our new president? And if so, when is he going to let us know?

The problems concerning the school which have been alcohol related have been fairly insignificant. Washington College students are not stupid. Learning to handle society's drug i.e. alcohol, is a part of social education. We have been

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Issue: What do you think the alcohol policy should be?

The myth of responsible behavior

Laura Hopper

Enough rumors about a dry campus and an anti-alcohol president. President Trout does not, to my knowledge, want a dry campus. He does want us to behave like adults, responsible adults who "know when to say when."

But do we, as a group, know our limits? On an individual basis, we most likely do, but as a group no is the most appropriate answer.

The proof-The Coffee House is dry. Few students remember but prior to 1987, the C-House did serve all students. And the seniors should remember when a student was hospitalized after being beaten by another drunk student.

The problem always lies in the handful of individuals who abuse alcohol and cause damage. The punishment will always be levied against the entire college, as a warning not to repeat the excesses of the past. But they always seem to be repeated.

The only solution is for each and every student to be responsible for their behavior. Responsible behavior is not getting into a car when you're drunk, not ripping a pay phone out of a wall, not dropping a fellow student down a flight of stairs, not date-raping a girlfriend, not starting a fire in the dorm, and not pulling the fire alarm in Reid Hall at 3 a.m.

If we can handle alcohol responsibly as a group, then we should be allowed to drink. If we can't, then say hello to a dry campus. No more excuses, and no forgetting the behavior that got us into our current bind. It's wonderful when a group of students are concerned about the safety of their guests at a party, but it's the exception rather than the rule around here. The group means everyone, from the fraternities and sororities to the sports teams to the students both in the dorms and off campus. We are responsible for the conditions on this campus, and until we can change our behavior, nothing is going to get any better.

And while we're at it, how about some peer pressure. Lean on people who cause trouble when they're drunk, and show them how much better it would be if they did behave within the rather nebulous boundaries of "responsible behavior." It would be a great thing for this college, if the alcohol policy was no longer an issue, because the administration knew we were a group of adults, instead of 937 children

After all, we're all in this together.

Laura Hopper is a senior majoring in International Studies, and the Editor-in-

A dry sea of troubles

Brian Gimelson

To drink or not to drink. This is not really the question. The administration is familiar with the seas of troubles that exist on the campus, and one would like to think that they do everything they can do to resolve them. However, there is always a single thorn rearing its' ugly head in the campuses well trimmed hedges. This thorn of course is the alcohol policy. What is it, who does it apply to and what are the consequences of it being enforced are three of the biggest questions which are commonly asked, by both the students and the administration. Like any debate, there are many facets which are being troweled over. The actual alcohol policy here has a lot of problems with it. Although clearly stated (on pages 26-28 of the student handbook), the words behind the policy have little or no meaning if they are not enforced. The school does not honestly expect students who are minors to avoid drinking alcohol at parties if they are offered. It is natural to experiment with different ways of life, and have new experiences and the administration knows this, they would just like your experiences here to be good ones. At the same time, they do not want to bully the students for fear of 'revolts' of the magnitude that almost the entire student body talks about, each time a strengthening of the alcohol policy is mentioned, be it only in passing. So what's the problem, you may ask, as long as everyone's drinking that wants to drink, everyone is happy right ? Wrong. If students on campus knew how to have a good time, and drink responsibly then this might be the case, but as it turns out there are quite a few people that are unhappy about the policy.

The school has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars designing, landscaping, and rebuilding the campus to get as far as it has come now. Anyone that was or is still involved with any part of this should be upset with what happens to their campus every time you pump a couple dozen gallons of beer through the students' veins. This year after almost every weekend, maintenance and grounds are hit with a big list of new projects to finish, because some group of people left a beer can monument all over the quad, or some other group just trashed a newly refinished dorm. This enjoyment, and misuse of college property gets expensive. Property is one thing, but very often at a party, due to practically nothing else but the presence of alcohol a fight breaks out. On top of severe dorm damage, now the school could wind up being liable for a lawsuit which would wipe out 200 students financial aid, or some endowment to a department. Luckily this hasn't happened, yet. How important is drinking to you if you can't afford to go to school here anymore, because one of your so-called friends hit some one crossing the street ?

The school puts quite a deal of trust in the student body to be responsible. They don't do this blindly, but as a form of trust and hope for the future. A great deal of the faculty are here because they want to improve the future through education. As one teacher from the Business Department recently put it "..knowledge is the only commodity..." The students of this school perhaps do not realize how important this trust that the administration has placed in their laps is, and how vital it is in order for the school to survive. Ideally the school would like to eliminate alcohol from the campus, because it would eliminate a lot of problems. It would however create quite a few more. The students would like to have free reign to do as they please, which would work, if and only if students did not abuse this privilege, a highly unlikely scenario. So, the solution for the administration is to create a happy medium. Which works, until something goes wrong. Ultimately, the students will decide the fate of the alcohol policy; However, if the student body heads in the general direction it has been heading in for the past couple years, the sea of troubles that was mentioned earlier will be a very dry one when it comes to Washington College.

Kyndra Ponder

What is college really all about? Is it about parties every weekend, the Vern and Newt's on their respective "days of debauchery" or seeing just how many cans o' beer one can down in just one sitting? I realize that it is far from midterms or - heaven forbid, finals - yet, but I do hope that some of you have at least asked yourselves just why you are putting your sanity through this thing called College.

Presumably, the general idea of getting a college education is to develop a foundation upon which we, as the young bankers, teachers and doctors can build a strong future. Today, that "strong future" has taken on the meaning of property holdings, how many BMW's are in the garage and overall personal monetary value. Steven and Elise Keaton would shudder!

In the days when our parents went to college, the foundation - the reasons why someone went to college - were more important than the probable increase in earnings that they would receive as a result of the Bachelor's Degree that they held. College was supposed to be a place where minds were opened and hearts made aware of the multitude of dreams that were waiting to be seized. The education was important because it gave our parents the knowledge to help and the ability for their lives to make a difference.

We, the offspring of perhaps the most well-educated and affluent generation in America have taken those ideals and distorted them. Success is not measured by how much your life counts, but instead, how long it takes to count all of the hedonistic pleasures that surround your life.

We accept mediocrity from ourselves and from the world around us. Our literature and other forms of art are fairly base. The level of our sciences have fallen behind those people who, just 40 years ago, were considered backwards. We sit by and watch our promiscuity take its toll on us - in many varied forms. Yet we still continue on, partying our way through college and saying, "I really don't care about getting A's, just as long as I pass!"

When I came to college, I thought that I had become the most mature individual in the world - after all, I was moving away from home. I'm sure that many of you felt the same way, but if we are ALL honest to ourselves, none of us is as mature as we would like to think. Our world is far from ideal, yet just getting by is good enough!

I certainly do not mean to lecture anyone because I am far from perfect myself. I like to have a good time and I enjoy spending time with my friends. I like a little innocent fun from time to time, but I also like to act really bizarre too. We are allowed to do that, we're young. I am just saying lets have this youthful exuberance count for a little more than profits in Miller Brewing Company's pockets.

BEGIN YOUR DAY WITH A BALANCED BREAKFAST

Breakfast comes after more than 12 hours without food...and interrupts the longest "fast" between meals. Those who skip breakfast entirely, or eat a skimpy breakfast, expect their bodies to function for another four or five hours without fuel--nervousness, irritability and inability to concentrate are the side effects.

In addition to the physical benefits, a balanced breakfast helps you begin a good day...you feel more cheerful.

If you skip breakfast, you are likely to have a poor diet for the whole day. You can never catch up at lunch or dinner for the nutrients you missed earlier. A well-balanced breakfast should meet between one-fourth and one-third of the total day's nutritional need.

Breakfast menu should include:

A good protein food:	milk, meat, cheese, eggs
Vitamin C:	citrus fruit or juices
Calcium:	milk, cheese
Riboflavin:	milk, eggs
Thiamine:	whole grain enriched breads, cereals, milk

In the world; Gulf crisis continues

UNITED STATES

President Bush has asked Congress to approve a budget agreement tailored to his specifications that he says will keep the U.S. "strong and vital". While the President used the situation in the Persian Gulf to backup the agreement, he also stated that Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait will fail. Noting that many countries have been working together for a common cause in the Persian Gulf, Bush called on congressional factions to work together on the budget agreement. He declared: "It is Iraq against the world." Bush's message to a joint session of Congress did not indicate how long U.S. intervention will be needed in the Gulf region, or how much it would cost. It also did not indicate whether military hostilities are likely. He did, however, say: "Let no one doubt our staying power. We will stand by our friends." He also laid out the four goals of the intervention: Iraq's unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait, restoration of Kuwait's government, assured stability and security in the Persian Gulf region, and protection of U.S. citizens in Iraq and Kuwait. In his message, Bush indicated a fifth goal: replacing the the cold war era east/west conflict with a "new world order."

The National Transportation Safety Board said yesterday that a U.S.Air Boeing 727, on approach to Kansas City International Airport last year, was flown through electric transmission lines. The plane was damaged and four of the high tension wires were severed. The mishap was blamed on controller and crew error. The plane's crew, landing in poor weather, apparently descended to a few feet above the ground several thousand feet from the runway. The controllers provided the crew "inadequate and deficient services", which helped cause the incident. Because the crew was unaware of the potential danger of the situation and because no one was hurt, the incident was not publicized. However, the NTSB wants to use the incident to bring attention to the need for improved airline crew training and greater quality control in the air traffic control system.

LIBERIA

Liberian president Samuel Doe apparently died Sunday of gunshot wounds he received during a struggle with the rebels who captured him a day earlier. Although loyalists named a successor for Doe, rebel leader Prince Johnson named himself the new head of Liberia. The rebels vowed to continue their struggle, making chances for a possible settlement and end to the nearly nine month old civil war remote. The National Patriotic Front, led by Charles Taylor, demanded that the West African force sent to Monrovia, in Liberia, be withdrawn. Johnson's army controls Monrovia, but Taylor's troops have control of the rest of Liberia. Most reports say that President Doe did indeed die at the hands of the rebels. The U.S. State Department considers the reports confirmation of Doe's death. Gambia President Sir Dawda Jawara, who helps sponsor the peace keeping force in Monrovia, said yesterday: "Now that Doe has been toppled by Prince Johnson...it might help the peace process in Liberia." Both Johnson and Taylor had demanded that Doe step down, although neither are ready for real negotiations to end the civil war.

IRAQ

Full diplomatic relations between Iran and Iraq were restored yesterday. In an attempt to undermine the international blockade, Iraq hopes to to be able to import food and arms in an agreement with Iran. In a television message, Saddam Hussein offered free oil to third world countries to show his solidarity to the poor. Hussein contended that the free oil should not be subject to the economic blockade restrictions. The countries offered the oil need only to find a way past the blockade, Hussein said. The reason for the offer is Hussein's concern about the effects of higher oil prices and he added: "We are all brothers and sisters and we share the same fate." The Iraqi restoration of relations with Iran came one day after Iraq lost any hope of gaining support from the Soviet Union. Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani said nothing to indicate his approval of Iraqi actions in the Persian Gulf region, but did say that although Iran has upheld United Nations sanctions, it may offer "humanitarian" food aid and that this policy kept "with its position toward the region and Kuwait.

"Congratnlations"

The true essence of small town living

Phil "Slice" Macek

O.K. let's face it, most of you people (myself included) did not make a conscious decision to attend Washington College. For me, it happened like this: it was the summer after my senior year in high school and I was cruising down to the Eastern Shore to do a little bass fishing. Well I was supposed to go to Pocomoke City, but as luck would have it, I turned left on Route 213 instead of right. So while I'm lost, I happen upon this place called Chestertown (no one has a real reason to come to Chestertown, they get lost and happen upon it.) So I'm driving through this place, asking people for directions to Pocomoke City, and all of a sudden, I see this school called Washington College. I'm sitting there in my car looking at this fine school (at least I thought it was fine until I saw the inside of Kent House) and I said to myself, "What the hell, I'm free for the next four years. I think I'll go to college for a few years and get some kind of weird degree." With that, I applied for admission, and for better or for worse, I was accepted.

Now mind you, I come from a suburban area, close to a major city (as I suspect most of you do,) so it took me a little time to adjust to small town living. I remember one day in particular early in my freshman year. I was walking down High Street taking in the sights when I got to talking with one of the locals. Well, I'm telling him about my background and he's telling me about his, when he suddenly excuses himself. You see, he had to go check the traps to see if his family would be having muskrat for dinner. As fate would have it, he took me with him and before long we had ourselves three large muskrats. As we drove back to his house in his dull red pick-up truck (I didn't know if it was red from being painted or from being ravaged by rust) he said to me, "These three tender rats will make one powerful good stew. How 'bout stayin' for dinner?" While I appreciated the hospitality of this "townie" I declined his invitation. I just could not bring my self to eat something that I had seen struggling to get out of a steel trap. Actually, I made a worse mistake, I ate in the dining hall that night. If I remember correctly, they were serving pumpkin casserole marinated in tuna juice.

Another thing that took some time adjusting to was the sense of trust between neighbors. You know, people not having to worry about locking their doors or windows. So with my big city mentality I came across a local farmer and asked, "Hey, does Chestertown have a dependable police force?" "Yeah, but he's sick," was the reply. Rest assured, I slept easy that night. I also enjoyed going down to the local barber shop and hearing all the day's gossip. Hell, I felt like an extra on the set of the Andy Griffith Show. I must admit that I was a bit unaccustomed to hearing some "townies" say things like, "Hi there, this is my brother Darryl, and this my other brother Darryl," and my personal favorite, "I take a shower once a week– whether I need it or not."

Now in all reality, I really do love Chestertown. I find its rustic beauty and charming grace to be like no other place I have ever come across. I find the town's inhabitants to be friendly, warm, and receptive, and their kindness has really made my stay here an enjoyable one. Also, I love this town's slowed down pace. It is quite a world away from the break-neck speed of city life. Moreover, I'll always appreciate the time I took to get to know this town and its people. I feel like I could come back here twenty years after I graduate and nothing would have changed. In fact, I was talking to a real estate agent one day and he told me that the town's population had not changed since 1750. "No wonder," I said, "that's probably because the same people are still living here."

I guess as a Senior, you would have to excuse me for getting a little sentimental about this school. After I graduate (and if I want to I guess I better start that damn thesis) there will certainly be things about this school that I will sorely miss. For example, I'll miss all those rowdy weekend parties, especially the ones in the C-House. I'll miss playing intramural football against all those fine Lambda teams, I'll miss the nice view of the rusted propane tanks that my room in Cardinal offered me, and most importantly, I'll miss almost being thrown out of basketball games for obnoxious behavior (after all, it sure is nice to feel needed.)

Overall, I feel like I have given a piece of myself to this school for the past four years. Granted, there have been some bad times, but they fade when I compare them to the good times that I'll carry with me forever. Please excuse me for being so emotional, but all of a sudden, I have a real hankering for some muskrat stew and meeting somebody named Darryl.

Phil "Slice" Macek

For all those who attended the Senior class meeting earlier this week, you know that we as a school are greatly divided over who our commencement speaker should be. This being the case, I would like to take this opportunity to suggest a few possibilities. Hopefully, the administration and all those responsible for getting our speaker will take these suggestions seriously.

Don Knotts— O.K., I know he's not the first name that comes to mind when one thinks about Commencement speakers. However, I think the world's greatest dramatic actor would give one helluva speech. Furthermore, the town could have an official "Barney Fife Day" and we could give Don a key to the town.

Alex Trebek— again, not a name synonymous with commencement speakers but I still think we should make a wholehearted effort to get him. Plus, as an extra bonus, we could have Alex phrase his speech in the form of a question.

Fred Savage— he could tell the audience about what it is like to graduate from Kindergarten and compare that to graduating from Washington College. We probably will not go on to become successful actors on a T.V. show, but what the hell? We ought to at least invite him down to the school on graduation day.

Dexter Manley— actually, this is not a good choice because good old Dexter graduated from and was still functionally illiterate. This means that even if we had a speech already written for him, he wouldn't be able to read it.

Clint Eastwood— "All right punk, you think you're going to graduate? Well, I've got my .44 Magnum right here and it says that you're going to stay here for another year. So, if you want to come here and try to get your diploma, you got to ask yourself one question, 'Do I feel lucky?' Well, do you, punk?"

For what its worth, this is my numero uno choice for a commencement speaker. Consider that no matter how boring Clint's speech got (and if you think Clint Eastwood's boring, you've got real problems.) no body would fall asleep because Clint is packing heat. I think it would make for a fine commencement celebration.

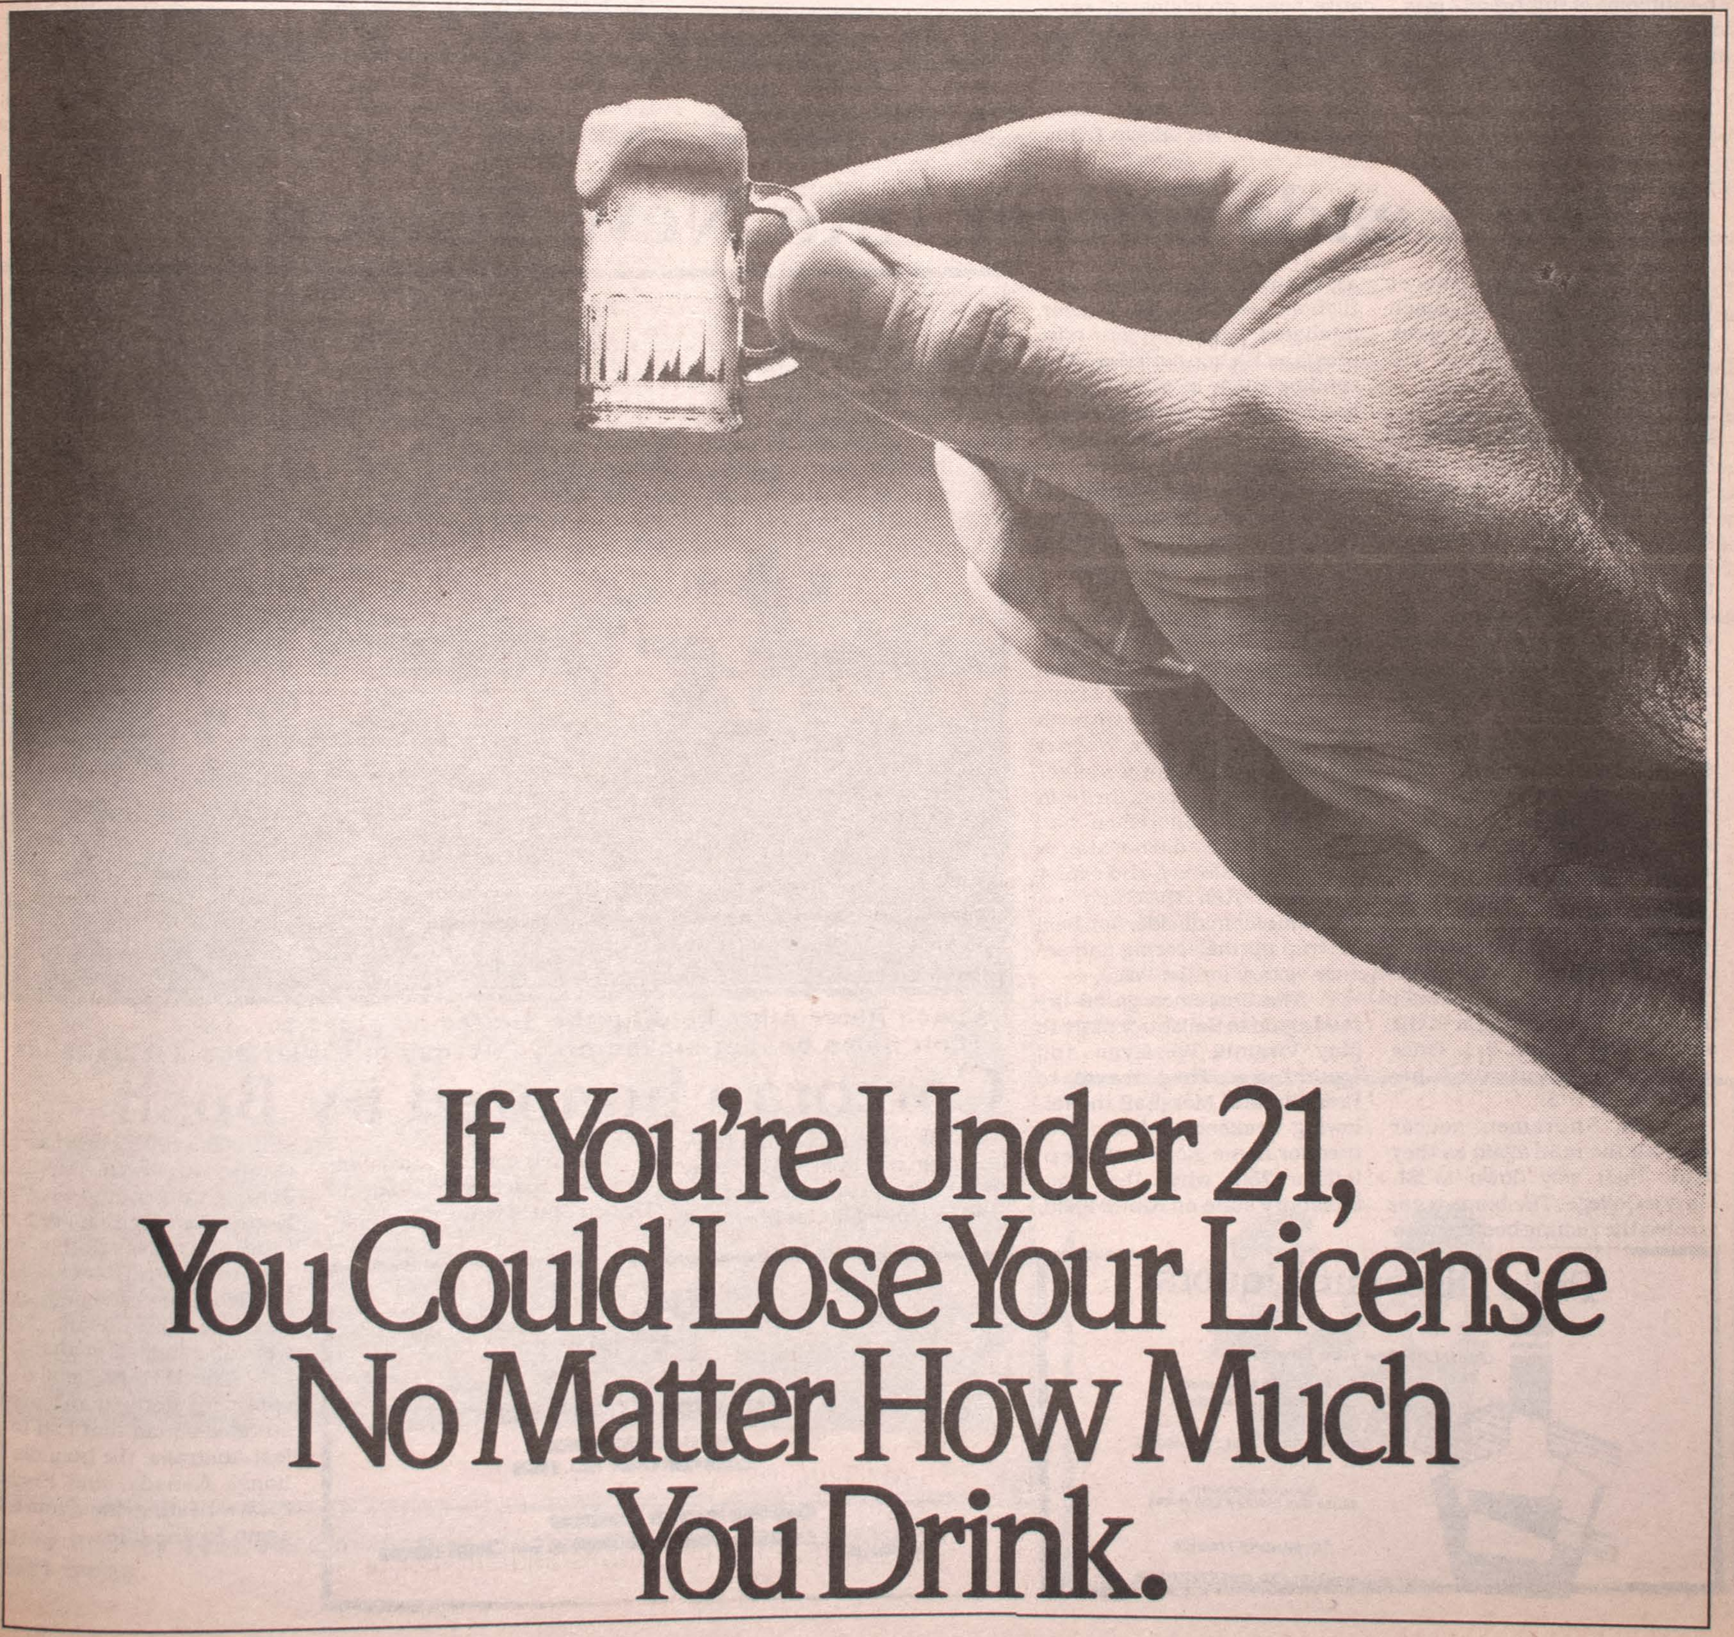
Tone Lōc— I really don't know what kind of speech this deft rapper would give, but at least it would rhyme. The only drawback I see is Tone getting bored during the ceremony and starts doing the "wild thing" on the stage. We can save him as a last resort.

Geraldo— I can see it now: "Is Washington College merely a drunken carnival disguised as a school? Or is it a legitimate academic institution concerned about the welfare of its students? That's the focus of this Geraldo."

Actually, I was checking with Geraldo's agent about the possibility of him giving our commencement speech. Unfortunately, Geraldo will be away on special assignment and has no time for us. His assignment? Well, apparently Geraldo didn't learn his lesson, and now he wants to open Al Capone's underwear drawer.

And finally, I present to you my last suggestion. I think this man would be the perfect speaker to give an engaging speech about ambition and reaching one's goals. Ladies and gentlemen, I think our speaker should be, Norm from "Cheers." We could put Norm's barstool up on the stage so he would feel right at home. We would also have to get a few kegs for Norm, since it would probably be a long ceremony.

Well, there you have it. My own humble aspirations for our commencement speakers. Hopefully, the powers that be at this school will realize that this article is serious in all senses. Furthermore, it is expected that the administration will make a determined effort to get somebody from this list. Again, just for the record, my two personal favorites are Clint and Norm. If you are reading this and have anything to do with selecting our commencement speaker, won't you please help? We don't want some boring politician who will use his speech as some campaigning ploy. Please, I implore you, get Clint or Norm!



REC Sports:Pinzcok's Pigskin Picks

By Deeann Pinczok

The Rec Sports program will begin its 1990 Intramural Football season on Monday September 18th. All teams are ready to go and it looks like it is going to be a very exciting season. The big news is the break up of the Psuedo Budha team that occurred one week before the scheduled season games, due to complications regarding contract agreements. Greg Rupert, unable to come to terms with his fellow teammates, decided to take matters into his own hands and formed his own new football team. Psuedo Budha is a team composed of last year's first and second place teams, Psuedo Lambda and Salt & Budha respectively. It seems like Rupert might be taking an extremely great risk by turning his back on a team filled with great potential, not to mention a team filled with his friends and fellow "business partner." The outcome of this break-up is looked forward to with great anticipation.

This year, as always, we have listed the top five in our Rec Sports pre-season ranking. They are as follows:

1. Psuedo Lambda
2. Dorchester Dawgs
3. Hard & Clueless
4. Team Rupert
5. Team Mule

Psuedo Budha as been ranked in first place for the main reason that it is a team that is a combination of last year's two top teams. This team is strong in that it contains the top two quarterbacks in the league; however, they greatly lack the receivers who can catch the ball. The Dawgs are looking good in that they are a team of "great speed", but they do not have a decent quarterback. The teams major problem lies with its weakest link, Steve Huettner. It looks like this team just might cause some problems by seasons end, though. In third place we have a young team possessing raw talent, Hard & Clueless. This team could be a real shocker! Now we come to Team Rupert, a brand new team that may be full of surprises. The driver of this team will be none other than Greg Rupert - a two time Rec Sports Football All-Star. The Rupe might be out for vengeance and it will be quite exciting to see how he handles playing against the team that he so easily walked away from. And finally, there is Team Mule. A team with good size and the brains to call plays, but they do have their share of problems. The main problem being that they lack any real talent to execute their plays effectively. It should be exciting to watch this team, however, since Don Steele promises Oklahoma style veer offense; but let's wait and see if he can get it off the ground!

It looks to be a season containing not one single dull moment and it should be worth the while to come and see the games. Games begin on Monday and will be played from 4:00 to 7:00, come on out and support your favorite team.

Other events in Rec Sports to look forward to is the Two-Man Volleyball Tournament which will be played tomorrow, Saturday September 15. this tournament is the first of its kind in the Rec Sports program and has been coordinated by Washington Collge alumni, Matt Zeuch. It should be an interesting tournament to watch!

Another fun-filled event that is just around the corner is the annual Theta Chi Softball Tournament that is scheduled for the weekend of September 22. This year's tournament looks to be one filled with many stimulating games. The faculty has gotten together and formed a team of their own; they just have to prove that they can stand up to thier students. Surf & Turf, three year consecutive champs and champs of four of the last five tournaments, have brought back some "big guns" from years past. However there are teams entered in this tournament who are ripe and ready to knock the king off the hill and will come to the tournament with this main purpose in mind. The teams to do this would be the MoFos, the Theta team, and the Theta Alumni team. These teams are rearing to go and are as strong as ever. Heavy competition is what the 1990 Theta Chi Softball Tournament has in store! May the best team win!

Lexercise- Aerobic classes are scheduled to begin on Monday October 8th when our fearless aerobics leader, Lex Frey, returns from her hiking exhibitions in Tibet. Classes will be held every Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday(dependent on class participation) at 5:00 in the dance studio.(Basement of Cain Gymnasium)

Bike Rental- Need something to keep you in shape until aerobic classes begin? Why not rent a Rec Sports bike. Rec Sports bikes are available for Washington College students everyday from 8:00 to 4:00. Is it hard to rent a Rec Sports bike? Not at all! Just go to the Rec Sports equipment room, located in the Casey Swim Center, leave your student ID, and pick your bike. You may even call ahead and reserve a bike for a specific time.

Rec Sports is off to a great start this year and there are many new and exciting things to come. Look for posters listing a schedule of events and come out and get involved!

Allen Leads Soccer Into New Season

The Shoremen soccer team under new head coach Peter Allen finished up this week 1-2-1 after an impressive win over Dickinson 2-0.

The first game of the season however was a different story. The WAC booters went up against a tough Methodist team. Although sophomore goalie Jim Meyers managed to play more than admirably between the posts for the Shoremen with 10 saves, they were unable to generate much offense only getting off two shots and scoring on neither of them. The WAC lost 3-0.

The next day at the same site of Messiah they played another difficult foe in Allentown College. All-American candidate senior midfielder Mike Bishop led off the scoring for the Shoremen when he was assisted by junior striker Glenn Warner in the first half. It allowed them to jump out to a 1-0 lead. However, Allentown scored later in the first half and again in the second half to win 2-1. Once again Myers outsaved his counterpart 6-3.

The Shoremen soccer team hit the road again as they made their way down to St. Mary's College. The home team greeted the visiting booters with a goal 43 seconds into the game. Bishop, assisted by Warner, retaliated. Less than four minutes later Bishop netted another sending them into the second half leading 2-1. Just as it looked as if W.C. would leave victorious St. Mary's snatched a tie by scoring with only 30 ticks on the game clock. Both teams were shut out in overtime sending the Shoremen home with a tough 2-2 tie.

Dickinson was the site of the next Shoremen game as well as the site of the first Shoremen win of the season. Both teams dueled to a stalemate through regulation. However Warner assisted sophomore striker Chris Kleberg to break the tie in overtime. The Shoremen had enough but they did not stop or slow down. Kleberg and senior midfielder Ken Hutchins assisted junior midfielder Jon Seal to wrap up the scoring and secure victory for the WAC.

The Shoremen go on the road again to Salisbury State to play Virginia Wesleyan and Lynchburg. They travel to Franklin and Marshall the following weekend and don't return for home game until September 25th when they host Salisbury state on Kibler Field.

Coach Peter Allen guiding the Shoremen practice. Their home opener kicked off yesterday at Kibler against Gallaudet.

Corcoran honored by Bush

Shoremen lax coach Terry Corcoran was invited Thursday to the White House to be honored by United States President George Bush.

Coach Corcoran was one of three coaches to lead the United States to the championship of the 1990 World Lacrosse Games in Perth, Australia. Joining Corcoran at the White House Rose Garden are Maryland Lacrosse Club's Arlie Marshall and Yale's Mike Waldvogel as coaching honorees. The World Team players were also invited to attend.

The U.S. brought to the continent down under a star-studded squad that had to defeat Australia, the Iroquois National, Canada, and England before beating the Canadians again for the title.

Collegiate sports: slime and sleaze

Matt Giller

The NCAA which took a beating in all sports in the 80's welcomed the 90's. Only problem - the 90's didn't welcome the NCAA's. We have left behind the worst decade in NCAA history. Collegiate sport that used to be regarded as wholesome scholar-athletes fighting for school pride has been jaded by scandals and repeated offenses. This institution was a great resource for heroes. Presently the NCAA's are hard pressed to avoid Enqirer-like headlines.

Unfortunately this new decade filled with promise and hope has made the once shameless shameful. Furthermore those who helped cloud the institution continue to embarrass. Former Oklahoma football coach Barry Switzer doesn't know when to shut up and disappear from collegiate sports- forever. While we're on the subject of scandalous Sooner football- how about the gall ex-Sooner quarterback Charles Thompson has obtaining a 900 number to promote his book "Down and Dirty: The Life and Crimes of Oklahoma Football" while serving two years on drug charges out of his prison cell(Charlie Hustle:taking notes?).

Take Oklahoma football, please.

Speaking of sinking ships - University of Maryland's basketball team. Former coach Bob Wade hardly brought glory back to the Cole Field House and make everybody forget Len Bias. Present coach Gary Williams helped lead his team to an excellent season only to have it overshadowed by Wade's legacy and subsequent suspension of the program that was making strides. Now poor Williams has demonstrated poor judgment(a recent Terrapin trend). Terp's sideline general pleaded guilty to reduced charge of driving under the influence of alcohol and the failure to drive within a single lane.

Williams was given an unsupervised probation before judgment for 12 months, meaning a final verdict on the case will be withheld until he has fulfilled all the terms of the probation, including attendance at an alcohol education class.. Williams was fined a total of $295 on the two charges. A third charge, driving without a valid driver's license, was dropped by prosecutors. Our hero.

1990 has been extra special to Cleveland State and fired CSU basketball coach Kevin Mackey. He pleaded no contest to charges of cocaine abuse and driving under the influence of alcohol. A judge ordered this week that he be detained for 60 days in a drug and rehabilitation center after being arrested on July 13 after leaving an alleged crack house. Let's just say this lowlife ranks right below the humpback horned sloth on the food chain.

So where do we look for virtue and morality in collegiate athletics - Notre Dame, right. Wrong. A school synonomis with team spirit, unequaled sportsmanship and fair play has never been this low since Reagan starred in the Knute Rockne Story. Two weeks before their first football game this year, Sports Illustrated published an article (or confessional) by a former Fighting Irishman. Some former scrub offensive lineman Mike Huffman gave a detailed, vindictive account of his former coach, Lou Holtz. Among other things Huffman claimed that Holtz and his coaching staff subtly promoted steroid use to its players. I see no heroes here.

Foul play dominates Division I athletics; however Division III is not immune to the cancers destroying the bigger schools. Upsala college this summer faces a suspension to their basketball program due to illegal funds from boosters to specific players.

During this age when heroes can turn to felons faster than you can say DUI, the fan is forced to, unlike the old days, root with a cold heart and not become romantically involved with even their alma mater in fear of her breaking their heart.

Those who matter in that world should not be shortsighted. Colleges unlike professional teams (at least most of them) are rich in tradition with a following that grows with every graduating class. Athletic Directors, coaches, players, and boosters who drag the sport

The Great Sabha previews this weekend's football

The Great Sabha is back (under contractual obligation) once again to enhance subscribers with his unique unearthly psychic wisdom. This week and every week hereafter (unless summoned to Mecca) The Great Sabha will amaze you with his psychic accuracy.

Chicago +3 over GREEN BAY - The Bears are back to 1985 form defensively. Whoever is quarterback for the Pack will be endure many a sack. Take the points.

DETROIT -3 over Atlanta - Falcon coach Glanville didn't leave the Great Sabha tickets last week - the Great Sabha hopes he is run over by a thousand Barry Sanderses. Give the points.

INDIANAPOLIS - 2 1/2 over New England - This game is a dog with fleas. Pats don't play well on the road in their division. Give the points.

N.Y. JETS +2 over Cleveland - These two always battle to the last field goal of the game. Give the points.

Phoenix +13 1/2 over PHILADELPHIA - Both are pretty birds but too many points to give in an inter-divisional game. Take the points.

TAMPA BAY +3 over L.A. Rams - Vinnie will burn Ram secondary. Take the points but signal not very clear however.

SEATTLE Pick L.A. Raiders - When Bo arrives it will be a different ball game. Go with the home birds.

SAN DIEGO +3 over Cincinnati - The resurgence of the old Chargers's offense coupled with Bengals's ineffectiveness last week signals win for the lightning bolts. Take the points.

Washington +6 over SAN FRANCISCO - Nobody gives that many points to Joe Gibbs and gets away with it. Take the points.

MINNESOTA -6 over New Orleans - The Saints will go marching home a loser in this one. Give the points.

PITTSBURGH -2 1/2 over Houston - Chuck Noll hates the bad hombres from Houston. Outside the House of Pain they're painless. Give the points.

MONDAY NIGHT: DENVER -5 over Kansas City - Will be close all the way however Bronco field goal will stretch the lead over the hump. Give the points.

BEST BETS

MIAMI +2 over Buffalo - Bet the sacred cow on this one. Big game in the beginning of the year - Marino's rocket he calls an arm and the Florida heat will melt the Bills secondary. Take the points.

N.Y. Giants -8 over DALLAS - If you've got another sacred cow to waver the Great Sabha suggests you do it. If their was a minor league in football the Cowboys would be playing in the Florida Grapefruit League. Give the points. Don't make a move without the Great Sabha

COLLEGE

VIRGINIA -25 over Navy - The Wahoos will throw more bombs at the Midshipmen than Hussein. Give the points.

Princeton -4 over CORNELL - I love the Tigers and the Tigers love me. Give the points.

Harvard -6 over Columbia - The biggest wimps in the Big Apple still think scoring in football is like scoring in golf, lowest score wins. Give the points.

BYU -13 1/2 over Washington State - Miami couldn't handle Detmer you think these Jethros can. Give the points.

NOTRE DAME -4 1/2 over Michigan - Once again I love the Favorite. Its a battle between the two coolest uniforms in football; however the more religious one shall prevail.

Sabha wishes all a safe and sacred weekend.

Field hockey seen here preparing for the upcoming MAC showdowns next week.

Voices of Vincent

In her freshman year when Jeanette Smith submitted drafts of a script to her Playwrighting class, she probably had no idea that script would blossom into her senior drama project. The play is now titled "Voices of Vincent", and the first production of the original script will be performed in Tawes Theater at the end of this month. The production fulfills senior drama project requirements for two Drama majors, Smith as the playwright, and Felicia Shakman as the Director of the production.

As witnessed during forty minutes of rehearsal, Smith and Shakman, friends since freshman year, work well together and share similar instincts about the play. Though the title, the set and some of the details of the script and production suggest the play's basis is the life of Vincent Van Gogh, both Shakman and Smith are adamant in the assertion that the play is "inspirational, not historical." Shakman reiterates, "the play is not historically based."

Smith continues with a more detailed description of her aims as the playwright: "I see this play as a metaphor for misunderstood artists." She explains that while Van Gogh painted during the time of the Impressionists, he is considered a Post-Impressionist because his work is different from theirs. Though one piece of his work on the auction block today goes for millions of dollars, during his lifetime, Van Gogh was impoverished and rejected by society.

Many people, when examining Van Gogh's behavior (he cut off his ear and sent it to his lover) claim that he was crazy. Shakman and Smith argue that Van Gogh's insanity was not inherent to his nature, but rather was a result of society's reaction to him. Smith describes him as a "very passionate man" who was also "very alone." She calls him "highly personal," adding that he "painted what was inside him."

"The essence of the play," as described by Shakman and suggested in the title, "is the battle between the voices in his paintings and the voices in his mind." Smith explains that when Van Gogh first started painting, he heard voices in what he painted. He tried to capture these voices in his paintings. The voices in his mind echoed the people who called him crazy. The battle between these two camps forms the play's main conflict.

Smith also sees the play as a metaphor for today's censorship conflict in the National Endowment for the Arts. Throughout the production, a projector will flash slides of headlines focusing on the NEA conflict, as well as slides of Van Gogh's work.

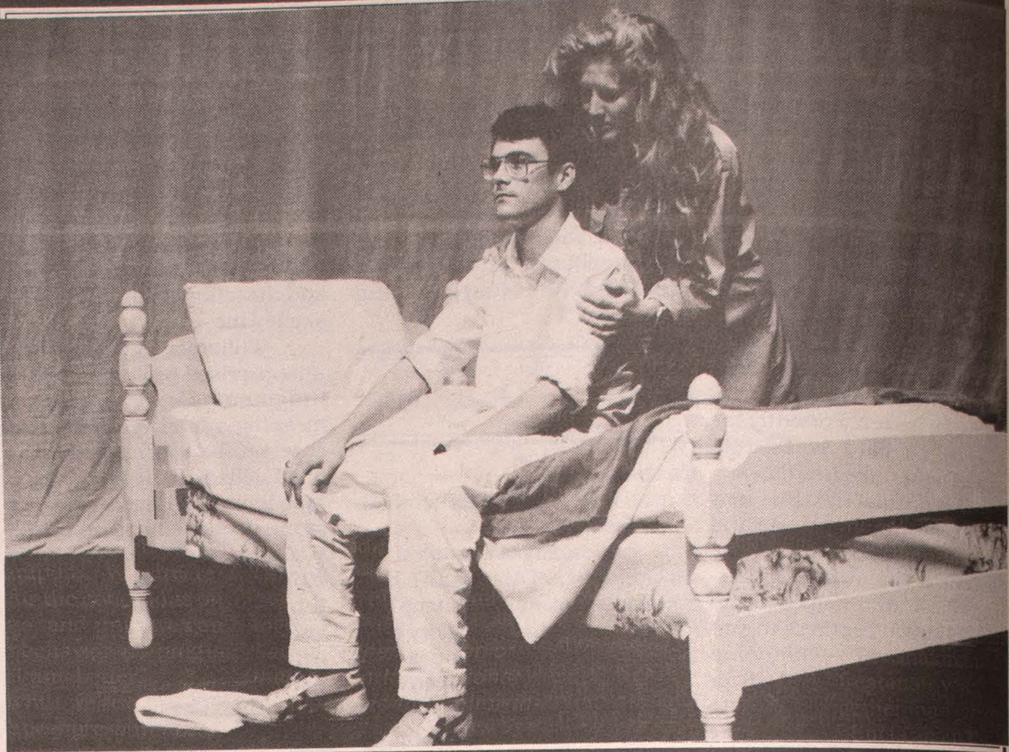
The set of the production also reflects Van Gogh's work. The furniture is painted a shade of yellow which appears frequently in his paintings, and Smith says the set is based on a picture Van Gogh painted of his bedroom in Arles in 1888.

The one and a half hour play spans one hour of Van Gogh's life in which he reflects on himself and his accomplishments. The role of Vincent presents a challenge for WC graduate Todd Karr who is onstage for the full hour and a half, and whose monologues fill the scene breaks.

The roles of Theo, Dr. Gachet, Christine, and Vincent's Mother are portrayed by Martin Buinicki, Kent Arminger, Jacque Collins and Kate Schroeder, respectively. Debbie Johnson is the Stage Manager.

"Voices of Vincent" opens in Tawes Theater on September 21 at 8:00 PM and plays September 22 at 8:00 PM and September 23 at 2:00 PM.

Stephanie Hess is a Junior majoring in Humanities.



Jacque Collins as "Christine" and Todd Karr as "Vincent" are shown here in rehearsal for Jeanette Smith's play, "Voices of Vincent". The play opens September 21 at 8 p.m.

The World According to Sonic Youth : "Goo"

When I was seven years old, I spent most evenings before bed abusively torturing my mother's menagerie of hi-tech kitchen appliances. Blenders buzzing from puree to liquefy in less than six seconds, cake mixers, juicers, electric peelers, all added to the sibilant cacophony which usually climaxed with me rolling back on the floor banging wooden spoons against a metal pan like some snot covered primitive. Just the same, 'Goo' reminds me of my kitchen.

What dynamics give rise to such squalor, you ask? For short, this New York quartet

"Sweetie": too sweet ?

There have been many movies that have taken audiences by surprise. "Sweetie" is definitely one of them. It's graphic sexual nature and slow moving plot cause "Sweetie" to become almost unbearable for some viewers.

As I watched half the audience walk out within the first fifteen minutes, I decided that these people were missing a chance to see life from a new perspective. "Sweetie" was created to make people think about their life. In this way, we should all give this movie a chance to be felt and understood.

The profound vision that director Jane Campion creates is about relationships: the understandings we have with ourselves and our loved ones. The basic story line is about several individuals within a family trying to hold their relationships together. The main focus of the movie is on Kaye, a woman trying to discover her hidden feelings. As she searches for her identity, Kaye's relationship with her boyfriend begins to deteriorate. The viewer suddenly finds themselves watching two lives drifting apart and finally we become introduced to Sweetie, Kaye's sister.

With the introduction to Sweetie, the movie becomes a satire about the values we place on maturity. Sweetie is a very misunderstood character who indulges in finding attention. This may be due to the nearly incestuous relationship that she has with her father.

The lives of each individual in "Sweetie" are not based on reality. The individual has no control of their fate. They are helpless and left in a state of inhumanity. Jane Campion uses this as an excuse for the extreme symbolic overtones.

After watching two hours of grotesque and disturbing behavior, I felt like their was a hole cut inside of me. I felt like I was missing part of my life. The question of my fate must be brought up. The power of "Sweetie" is that it is a masterpiece of afterthought. It can be considered to follow in the footsteps of the contemporary drama: "The Cook, the Thief,his Wife ,and her Lover."

"Sweetie" is an exploration into our values and our beliefs. It helps us to realize the structure of our life and the emphasis we put on happiness. The absurd actions of Sweetie are a way of creating thought in our minds about our own actions. "Sweetie" is a movie that should only be seen with an open mind. We should have a willingness to observe our life and our fate. This is another way for film to question the individual. With any judgement of this movie, we must be judging ourselves.

Visual Artists'
Union Formed

The Visual Artists' Union is a new organization at Washington College this fall. The union brings together people from across the W. C. community, all with varying degrees of interest in art. Members include art majors as well as freshmen, but anyone with an interest in the arts is invited to join.

Several projects are currently being planned for the coming year. The lack of a figure drawing class at W. C. was actually the spark for forming the union; artists previously had no forum to voice ideas on official matters. A student-run figure drawing class was proposed, and the union was organized initially to support this project. Other projects this year include an art film series, field trips to galleries and museums, and the acquisition of supplies for use by union members.

The officers of the VAU are as follows: J. Tarin Towers, President; Deb Kulich, Secretary; and John A. Goebel, Treasurer.

Tex Andrews is the faculty advisor. The next meeting is scheduled for Monday, September 24, at 6:00 p.m., in the Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center. Anyone who is interested in the either the appreciation or production of art is welcomed. Current members are reminded to bring dues to this meeting. Any questions or suggestions can be directed to the VAU officers.

J. Tarin Towers is a Freshman and president of the Visual Artists ' Union.

Concert Series opens

The 39th season of the Washington College Concert Series opens this Friday, September 14, with a return performance by pianist David Buechner. His is the first of six concerts to be presented this academic year for Chestertown audiences in the College's Tawes Theatre.

Buechner, 30, has established himself as a master pianist in his five years on the performance circuit. The highest ranking American prizewinner at Moscow's 1986 Tchaikovsky International Piano Competition and the only American prize winner at the 1984 Leeds Competition, Buechner has achieved a great deal in his short career. His long list of prizes, citations and awards dates back to his days at the Juilliard School, where he received an unprecedented total of six major awards and scholarships.

Buechner's performance at Washington College is a Yale Gordon Artist Concert, sponsored by the Peggy and Yale Gordon Trust. The Trust was established primarily to provide support for various cultural and educational institutions in and around the metropolitan Baltimore area. Implementing concert career opportunities for young emerging artists as well as established artists of the highest professional quality is a continuing activity of the trust.

Season tickets for the Concert Series are $30.00 per person and can be ordered by mail from the Washington College Concert Series, Chestertown, Maryland 21620 - make checks payable to Washington College. Season tickets are also sold a the box office on performance nights. Single admission tickets are sold only at the box office at performances, $10.00 for adults and and free for anyone under 18. All concerts begin at 8:00 p.m.. Seats are not reserved in the 600 seat Tawes Theatre in the Gibson Fine Arts Center.

Date rape: the silent rape

by Matt Giller

"A recent national survey found that one in every six college women is a victim of rape or attempted rape each year," according to US News and World Report.

Ninety percent of all cases are not reported to the police, making this statistic a gaping underestimation of rapes occurring on college campuses. Because the victim knows the assailant in one-third of all rapes, she does not usually report being sexually assaulted.

When the woman is acquainted with the rapist, the rape is defined as date rape, social rape, or silent rape. Silent rape is an appropriate term for victims of date rape because they refrain from reporting it—some women do not recognize that their body has been infringed upon. Therefore, bewildered and ashamed, they remain silent. A woman beaten and violated in a dark alley by a stranger is not the only form of rape; a male who disregards his female friend's "no" also commits rape. It is rape when a woman is forced, intimidated, or coerced to relinquish control of her body while another person defiles and abuses it.

One senior tells how she was date raped during her sophomore year: "I was living with my boyfriend. It was at a time when I was very busy. He was very jealous of the time I was spending away from him. He said I owed it to him. It was a really tragic time in my life, and it is very blurry. But I clearly remember coming in and feeling tired, and he would not let me sleep, but he said, 'I want to attack you'—not 'do you want to make love?'-but 'I want to attack you.' It got to the point where it was easier to detach my brain from my body and let it happen because I didn't have the physical strength, the emotional strength to stop it."

Eventually, the friends of the victim saw bruises on their friend's arms and urged her to leave her boyfriend, but she could not see what was happening to her. Finally, she left him: "I don't really think he knows what he did to me. The really scary thing is that I know in relationships after mine that the same thing has happened and the violence has gotten worse." Her boyfriend mentally and physically abused her for an extended period of time.

Now, she is in "a very loving and caring relationship, but sometimes I have to pull back. I will definitely say I'm emotionally scarred." She also reveals she has spoken with other female students on this campus that have been raped, usually due to the woman drinking and subsequently being taken advantage of.

Beth Roemer, Resident Assistant programming director, says, "There is a need to raise the consciousness concerning date rape here. I think a lot of times people aren't sure what date rape is. They are not aware of what made them feel uncomfortable. Television portrays it as a very overt act, but sometimes it is a very covert act. It can be violent through coercion as well as just physically."

A woman's misunderstanding of her rape is due in part to society's sex role stereotypes. On television women are portrayed as submissive, weak, saying no to sex when they really mean yes. Men in the media vanquish women with their forceful embraces and then carry them up the staircase to the bedroom. In real life, however, men have to comprehend a woman's "no" means NO.

Often date rape occurs when a man and a woman are not communicating with each other about their sexual desires. The woman may wear a revealing dress or give off bodily signals contrary to her true intentions. The man misreads these signals, forces her to have sexual relations with him, and may never understand that he committed an act of rape.

"Date rapists are more sexually active than other males and more likely to have a history of antisocial behavior. Women—alone, in a new environment, suffer from low self-esteem and are not very good at asserting themselves," reports Time magazine on campus rape. Other characteristics of date rapists are displays of anger or aggression, viewing women as adversaries, subscribing excessively to traditional male and female stereotypes, attempting to make the woman feel guilty or accusing the woman of being tense. "Many date rapists are repeat offenders and are skilled at identifying weaknesses in potential victims. The rapist is looking for a woman he can control, since his primary motivation is power rather than sex," explains Carol Pritchard in Avoiding Rape on and Off the Campus. In a large percentage of date rape cases, the victim is often a virgin. A virgin is naive about male and female sexual relations, and is confused about what is happening to her.

Many times a woman is intoxicated; "It's much harder for you to be in control of the situation if you're under the influence of these substances. Be aware of how much your date drinks, too," counsels the pamphlet What Women and Men Should Know About Date Rape.

One of the preventions of date rape is to always be alert—alcohol dulls the ability to be alert. Psychology Today found, "When a man initiated a date, drove to and from the date, sexual aggression was more likely. They also found that if both people got drunk (at a party, for example) and parked or found themselves in the male's dorm room or apartment, then the date was more likely to end with the woman being forced to perform against her wishes." Some men think it is permissible to rape a woman who is inebriated but Roemer argues, "When you are high, it still does count as rape." Although a woman takes many precautions, she is still vulnerable. Roemer says, "Anything a girl can do for prevention is recommended. But you can do all these things and still be a victim."

After this experience, a woman may feel depressed, embarrassed, and guilty. The rapist "stole a part of you," states Roemer. The woman usually loses trust in people and belief in her own perceptions. Date rapes happen usually after the third or fourth date. By then the woman trusts her companion. When she is raped, she finds she misjudged the character of the man who raped her. Roemer elaborates, "They went out with someone they thought they knew. They built a relationship and then that trust was violated."

What You Should Know About Rape suggests women should learn self-defense: "The best-prepared person (in a rape situation) is the one who has thought about and rehearsed many different strategies. Indeed, she is less likely to be attacked because of her attitude in the street and about herself." Self-defense encourages women to be more confident; rapists prey on weak and fearful women.

But, warns Gerald Roderick, Security Director, "you also have to realize your limitations. You're not going to be able to knock down a three-hundred pound guy with a blow to the stomach." Roderick recommends using "good common sense" before entering dangerous situations. Roderick further comments, "I tend to think that people get caught up in a false sense of security because it is a small campus."

Contrary to popular belief, date rape does occur at Washington College. The book, Sexual Assault on Campus: What Colleges Should Do, recommends colleges should revise "codes of student conduct to specifically prohibit rape and other sexual assaults, develop "an official written school policy condemning sexual assault," implement "educational programs on sexual assault" and establish "an effective program to assist the victim of sexual assault. With the implementation of these steps, some rapes could be prevented. But says Avoiding Rape On and Off Campus "for rapes to stop, men have to stop raping. Men must apply pressure on their peers to treat women with respect and as equals. Women must realize that they do contribute to making themselves vulnerable to dangerous situations, although they are never responsible for their rapes. Women must understand that they can lessen their vulnerability by being aware of their surroundings and by being assertive." The silent rape has to be heard, brought out into the open.

Freshman Profile

This year's Freshman Profile isn't that different from the profile of last years class. The major differences are in the areas of previous education and the ratio of males to females.

The average Standard Apptitude Test (SAT) scores for this year's freshman class are the same as last year's class. The average verbal score is 500 and the average math score is 510, combining for a total average score of 1010.

Fifty seven percent of this year's class graduated from public high schools. This figure is up six percent from last year. Fifty six percent of the freshman class are women. This is also up six percent from last year.

This year's enrollment is also up. According to Mr. Kevin Coveney, Vice President for Admissions and Enrollment Management, Washington College was one of only a few college's not only in Maryland but in the nation that had an increase in enrollment this year. "Thankfully, Washington College had a very good year," he said. Last year's freshman class numbered 230. This year's class has 237 member.

The majority of the freshman class are from Maryland, as fifty-one percent are from there. New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania are all next in line with eight, seven and six percent of the students coming from these states accordingly. Some members of the freshman class are from as far across country as California. Two students are from there. Out of the fifty states, Washington College's class of 1994 is made up of students from nineteen states, the District of Columbia, and five countries.

The freshmen class is not made up solely of students from the United States. There is one student here at Washington College from each of the following countries- Argentina, Bahrain, England, Mexico, and the USSR.

Hidden in a cloud of smoke

By Dan Sperling

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network.

A third of all smokers won't smoke around others, far more than those who refrained a decade ago, according to a study in Wednesday's Journal of the American Medical Association.

But the fallout created by the smoking debate shows: Barely half as many smokers as a decade ago will ask if bystanders mind before lighting up.

The study was conducted by Dr. Ronald M. Davis, director of the Office on Smoking and Health, who analyzed 22,000 interviews with adults in 1987. Davis found that although 80 percent of nonsmokers are bothered by the smoke, only four percent ask smokers to stop.

"The bottom line is that most nonsmokers are suffering in silence," said Davis. "I think most nonsmokers find it very uncomfortable to ask smokers to put out their cigarettes."

The researchers found that in public indoor areas, 33 percent of smokers said they don't smoke around others — a considerable increase from 4 percent in a 1978 poll.

But only 14 percent of smokers said they ask if those around them mind before lighting up — down from 26 percent in 1978.

And 47 percent said they light up without asking — vs. 59 percent in 1978.

Stricter anti-smoking laws would remedy that, Davis said "If there are signs on the walls saying, 'Smoking is not allowed here,' nonsmokers would feel more comfortable in asking smokers to put out their cigarettes — and smokers would be less likely to light up in the first place."

charges Tobacco Institute spokesman Thomas Lauria.

"Can't this be worked out the way it's always been worked out, without legislation?"

(Dan Sperling writes for USA TODAY.)

CD players stolen from Miller Library

By: Susie Mazzullo

Two compact disc players were reported missing from the library's listening room last Friday.

According to members of the library staff, the compact disc players must have been taken either late Wednesday night or sometime on Thursday.

The two CD players had just recently been installed. They were a part of the library's effort to upgrade and modernize it's facilities

The NEC player was installed last winter and the Sharp player had just been installed a few weeks ago, following the opening of school.

Because of this incident, all of the new equipment, which includes two new cassette player and another Sharp compact disc player, have been removed from the listening room. The equipment will remain unavailable to the students until a solution to the problem can be found.

Currently, both Washington College Security and the town police are involved. Along with the library staff they hope to come up with a better form of security for the library and especially rooms where expensive equipment is located, such as the listening room. They are also hoping to recover the missing equipment. What that investigation will entail was not revealed.

Mr. William Tubbs, a librarian at Miller Library, calls the whole situation "quite upsetting." "We were feeling very good about getting modern equipment so that the students could benefit from listening to the clear sound of CD's instead of scratchy records."

Mr. Tubbs also wanted anyone with any information to please contact him or Sergeant Lenny Thompson in the Security office. No questions will be asked. If someone wished to return the compact disc players, they may do so anonymously by leaving them somewhere and then informing security or a member of the library staff as to their location.

According to Mr. Tubbs, it isn't known when or even if the compact disc players will be replaced. "Now instead of the whole student body benefiting from this equipment, only those who took the CD players will have the ability to use them."

Senate approves budget

by Kyndra Ponder

At the S.G.A meeting held on Tuesday night, S.G.A Treasurer Brian Gimelson announced the 1990-1991 budget for the Student Government Association.

Gimelson reported that there was $11,334.86 left from last year's S.G.A budget. In addition, the S.G.A will receive approximately $46,300.00 from the Student Activities fee that is collected from each student. As a result the total S.G.A budget for this school year will be $57,634.86.

Rugby Club formed

By: Susie Mazzullo

After three years of struggling to pull together a rugby team, Seth Engel is finally getting the help and support he needs in order to make the project a success.

In the past, the school would have nothing to do with the forming of a rugby club or team. According to the administration and the athletic department, the risks and liabilities of such a team are too great. Despite this, Seth has managed to pull the team together this year.

Dr. Fred Lohn, an orthopedic surgeon at Queen Anne's Hospital and former rugby player himself is the one who has given Seth the most support. Despite his very busy schedule in the hospital, Dr. Lohn is helping with the organization of the team and plans to help out at practices as much as he can. Dr. Lohn also donated some money to the team so that they may get started. This money supplied they with some of the equipment necessary to the game, such as a few rugby balls.

A coach may have been found for the team. No names are being revealed, however, because the coach has not yet definitely accepted the position. This perspective coach was found by Dr. Lohn.

Ms. Beth Armstrong from the Kent County Parks and Recreation has also proved to be an invaluable asset to the formation of the team. With her help, practice and game fields have been located. All practices and games will be played in Wharton Park.

Dr. Sean O'Connor is also helping out the team by being their faculty advisor. Dr. O'Connor is an associate Professor here at Washington College and the Chair for the De-

In response to your letters...

In the rush to put out last week's Elm, many, many mistakes were made. Many students took the opportunity to voice their concern about the health of their paper. Unfortunately, due to the size of the issue, we are unable to print every letter. We did, however, make an effort not to repeat the errors made in the last issue, as well as select a letter to the editor that expresses the majority of the concerns voiced.

The current staff is dedicated to publishing an informative and entertaining newspaper, despite the appearance of the last issue. Although we strive to achieve this goal, some articles or graphic printed in the Elm, will invariably offend members of the college community, even though that is never our intent.

We wish to apologize to both Tracey Connell and Morgan Huff. Miss Connell's clever deconstruction of Richard DeProspo was simply a lack of preventive proofreading on the part of the editor, while the second half of Mr. Huff's article was lost due to printer error.

The article substituted for the one written by Mr. Huff, was "Date rape, the silent rape" which first appeared in the Elm, December 1, 1989, written by Kate Absher. In last week's issue, it was mistakenly bylined to Matt Giller. The Elm wishes to extend an apology to Miss Absher, and to stress that it was not the intent of the staff to defraud Miss Absher, but instead to bring attention to a timely and serious issue, acquaintance rape. The Elm deeply regrets the error, and will make every effort to insure similar mistakes do not occur again.

To all Elm watchers: this is indeed Volume 61. In the fall of 1979, an editor putting together the Elm mistakenly skipped Volume 50, thus throwing the count off by one. Since this is the sixtieth anniversary of the founding of the newspaper, this editor has corrected the error.

President addresses alcohol policy

Dear Editor,

I was surprised to learn in reading last week's Elm that the President of Washington College had arbitrarily re-written the College's alcohol policy and that he is moving in the direction of a dry campus. Let me say that the alcohol policy I inherited on July 1 still stands. Please refer to pages 26-28 of the student handbook for specific details.

I wish to state emphatically that I have no ambition to make Washington College a dry campus. My concern is that we achieve an appropriate level of social responsibility – to "know when to say when," as your "Campus Voices" article put it. To be silent when human lives and College property are trashed is something to which I will not be party. In the meantime, however, I have no interest in abolishing good times at Washington College.

Sincerely,
Charles H. Trout
President

Students express concern over the Elm

To the editors of the Elm:

In the past weeks we have seen three issues of the Elm come to light, and we are disappointed by the lack of quality evident in virtually every page. Some period of adjustment is natural and to be expected, but the faults that are apparent in this last week's issue of the Elm are too much for us to accept. We have written numerous articles for the paper in the past, but we are now declaring that we will not do so in the future unless the quality improves.

Aside from basic flaws in layout such as excessive white space and use of clip art, dot-matrix print in the headlines, excessive typographical errors, and a lack of bylines, we would like to comment on certain errors in last week's issue.

On the front page, an article by Tracy Connell breaks off in the middle of paragraphs with the phrase "blah blah blah." This occurs twice.

There is no caption on the photo, and the border created by the layout program has not been removed. Also, the Courier font looks out of place.

The sole letter to the Editor has the word "alcohol" misspelled throughout. Also, it runs onto a boxed item at the bottom of the page. Although it continues onto page 4, there is

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammar. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Issue: Do you feel security is adequate on the Washington College campus?

Doesn't feel safe parking on campus at night

Kyndra Ponder

Do I feel safe on Washington College's campus? To be perfectly honest, no I don't.

Now, I am not saying this to offend our Security force - valiant though they may be. I am saying this as a realist. I simply do not feel comfortable walking home at night by myself.

Many times this year, I will be traveling to Baltimore, Washington or parts of Delaware at night by myself. This unfortunately means that I will have to drive back to Chestertown late at night - often after midnight and I will be left to try to find a parking place on my own. On the five times this year that I have already had to do this, I have refused to park across campus - in the lots by the quad or at the lot by Gibson Fine Arts. It is impossible to find a legal space empty at two thirty on a Monday night in the Reid parking lot so I have done what so many other students have done - I've made my own space. Of course, as early as possible the next morning, I move my car to someplace legal, but the lack of parking is beside the point. I park illegally, not because I am too lazy to walk across campus, but because I don't want to take a chance then regret it later.

When I work late at night, I will sometimes walk home by myself, but more often than not, I ask a male friend to stop by or I get one of the Security officers to escort me. I live in Reid, and most of the places that I have to walk are fairly well lit so I feel a lot safer, but if I lived in Minta Martin or Cardinal, I would be very wary about being alone after dark. There is almost no lighting in those areas - and that is asking for trouble.

I am sure that someone is probably thinking "Come on, this is Chestertown. What could possibly happen here?" To that I reply - "Wake up!" Chestertown may be surrounded by cornfields and farm animals, but we still live in 20th Century America. That fact means that no matter where we go, there are risks and we are not completely safe. Sad as it is, this is not the world that William Smith knew when he began the college in 1782.

Security seems to be around when you need them or easily accessible, and they seem to know what they are doing. I think the Washington College security force is dedicated and that they are looking out for me.

Not at all, a woman by herself does not feel independent to walk around campus late at night.

I think security could be improved, but I think that the college is making an effort with the recent additions to the security staff. We could use more outdoor lighting and security could try to be more visible.

I feel safe, even when walking alone at night.

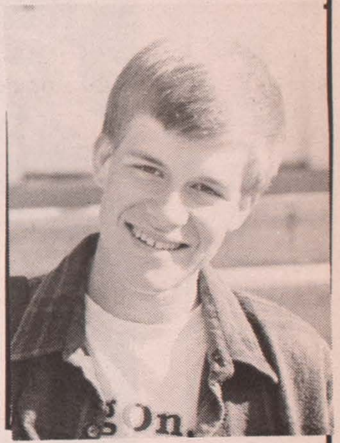
No, it is not adequate, even though this is Chestertown, a lot could happen. Security needs to be a lot more visible and we also need better outdoor lighting.



Doug Peterson

Personally, I feel secure on campus, most of the campus is well lit, I don't feel threatened at night like I would in an urban area. I think that security on campus is adequate.

Need more lighting

Ivette Gormas

As a woman on the campus of Washington College, I feel the security is not up to the level it should be. Not only does one feel unsafe, but extremely weary of walking around campus after dark.

Last year when visiting this school the question of it's safety seemed to present no problem. During the day, Chestertown has the appearance of Mayberry, where your only concern is crossing the crosswalk safely and not get hit by a mack truck. But as the shadows of night roll upon this quaint town, it seems to transform to the crime ridden Gothom City(on a much smaller scale of course.)

One major contributing factors that bothers many women on campus is the problem of insufficient lighting. The only lit area after dusk is the fire lane. From Bill Smith to Minta Martian as well as Cecil and Talbot to Reid Hall, and numerous other places on campus there is no lighting whatsoever. When coming back to the dorms at night from the library, computing or arts centers, or even just a friends, one does not feel safe. Because of this poor lighting situation, walking alone or even with a friend can cause one to feel vulnerable.

Another factor that causes fear among the female student body is the sometimes not nice people of Chestertown, the "Townees." When walking on campus or even into town, it seems these people are truly never happy without hootin and a'hollerin out of their low riding pick up trucks. Sometimes it is just more an annoyance, than actually being afraid, but when they slow up or follow you it can create a problem.

Despite the appearance of Chestertown being the tranquil and picturesque college every mother feels safe sending her daughter to, that daughter must take precautions. It would be nice if security could be a lot more visible more often, just as it would be nice if we had more lights, but until that day we must watch out for ourselves. So as corny as this may sound, please, think rationally. And when walking at night take some friends, don't walk alone. Think about it-it's your life your protecting.

Sue, Julia and Ivette are freshmen.

In the world: past support of Iraq questioned

United States

For the first time since the Persian Gulf crisis erupted last month, congressional Democrats bitterly attacked the Bush administration's conduct, accusing officials of "pursuing a misguided foreign policy that may have contributed to Iraq's seizure of Kuwait." Delegates argued that the "obsequious treatment of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein by a large number of high-ranking officials" encouraged him to take that action.

Reports released by the Pentagon yesterday state that Iraq has increased the number of troops in and near Kuwait to 360,000 compared to the 265,000 said to be there just two weeks ago. Iraq has also increased the number of tanks in the area by about 500. Its forces, however, still appear to be in a defensive position.

The Commerce Department reported the sharpest increase in the trade deficit since August 1982 yesterday. The soaring trade deficit is particularly worrisome because it was recorded before Iraq's invasion of Kuwait sent oil prices—and, therefore, the value of US imports-spiraling. Analysts fear "we are looking at the worst of all possible worlds for the economy, worsening inflation and slower growth." Inflation is now at its worst in eight years, and the chain of effects of oil inflation can be expected to be "massive through the economy."

Atlanta won a final-round showdown with Athens, Greece yesterday to be the site for the centennial staging of the modern Olympic Games, which were first staged in the Greek capital in 1896. Atlanta's $7 million, three-year campaign won in what many considered the strongest field of would-be host cities ever to confront the governing body. Atlanta will be the third US city to play host to the Games.

Soviet Union

In a remarkable sign of post-Cold War cooperation, the Soviet Union has agreed to lend the United States a large ship for ferrying military equipment to the Persian Gulf. There is also discussion between the US and the USSR concerning the US use of Soviet transport planes to help ferry US soldiers and equipment to the gulf. To date, no known agreement has been reached on this.

For the first time in nearly three decades, exiled Soviet writer Alexander Solzhenitsyn directly addressed the Soviet public on a current political topic through an official publication. His stridently anti-Communist manifesto was printed, unedited, by a Communist Party publishing house in a special supplement to the newspaper of the Communist Youth League. In his article, Solzhenitsyn stated that "An independent citizen cannot exist without private property." Indirectly this article strikes yet another blow against the already staggering government of Soviet Prime Minister Ryzhkov.

South Africa

Winnie Mandela, the wife of South Africa's most prominent black leader, was charged with kidnapping and assault yesterday "in a case that threatens to sidetrack South Africa's political reform process." Mrs. Mandela will be tried along with seven others in the kidnapping and murder of a teen-age activist in 1989. Fourteen year old, James Moeketsi, was abducted and taken to Mrs. Mandella's Soweto home last year. Mrs. Mandella's body guard was sentenced to death last month for the murder. This news comes as a "jolt" to the African National Congress. Mrs. Mandela was appointed director of this organization only last month.

Senior tells benefits of living off campus

Amy Tiehel

Dorm life is part of everyone's college experience, unless of course, they are like me and have chosen to live off-campus. Sure, I lived in a dorm. Freshman year I was a second floor Reid Hall delinquent. We drove our R.A. crazy, along with the (I'm doing my thesis) seniors. This in fact was one of the reasons I chose to move out of my dorm sophomore year and try "real life" in Chestertown. There would be no R.A., and I would not have to contend with obnoxious freshmen. However, I quickly learned that off-campus living was not as glamorous as it sounded.

First and foremost, while I no longer had an R.A. to fine me, I now had to deal with the Chestertown police. Also, instead of being awakened by late night Newt's crowds I was awakened by early churchgoers. Being that the church is practically in my front yard, it tends to be a problem.

Living off-campus also brought a new set of problems that I never had to deal with in a dorm room. For instance, toilet paper suddenly became a major expense, as did trash bags, paper towels and butter. I personally thought that butter just sort of grew in our fridge in home, thus I was quite surprised to learn that I had to purchase it at the store. Broken oil tanks in the basement, leaking sinks and toilets, and freezing cold showers were not things that could be left for W.C.'s maintenance crew to fix. The plumber, the electrician, the cable man, and the washer and dryer guys have become a part of my off-campus "family." Cleaning has become an interesting experience as well. Instead of a 4 foot by 4 foot room it is an entire house, bathrooms and all. And, now that I am out of my dorm, my parents make frequent visits just to make sure the house hasn't burned down.

Despite all this, off-campus living cannot be that bad because now I'm a senior and I still have not gone back to the dorms. I guess I'm just not that excited about the prospect of living in a bread box again. Off-campus living also means that what I do is my business. Saturday night's activities will not hit the W.C. "grapevine" until at least Monday morning. It means that I can still find my telephone even if I haven't done laundry for a month. Off-campus living also offers me the opportunity to experiment with new and exotic foods when I detest what is being offered in the Dining Hall. Living off-campus has also changed my perspective about Chestertown. I have met many of my neighbors and they are all quite friendly, even though I am just one of those "college kids." I have found that there is more to Chestertown than meets the eye. Living off-campus I have learned to take advantage of the beauty Chestertown has to offer. Also, it gives me the chance to get away when I need to; all the time knowing my friends are only a few blocks away.

While I do miss the loud and hectic characteristics of dorm life, and off-campus living can be too quiet sometimes, I still do not regret my decision to remain off-campus. There is something I like about not having my bedroom, kitchen, living room, and entertainment area all rolled into one. When friends do stop by (even though it is rare, because you know, I am so far away,) I have a place where they can sit other than my bed. And, I will admit, it is nice not to have to entertain my parents in a dorm room all day. My father enjoys a drink or two on our back deck, while my mother entertains herself criticizing me on my cleaning ability.

While I sometimes feel that I am missing out on a major part of the college experience, I also feel that I have created my own experience that those on campus are missing out on. Like this morning, I woke up early and the whole house was extremely bright with the light of the sun. One of my housemates was dozing in the living room and I did not have to wake him up while I got ready for class (a major hazard when one lives in a dorm room.) I made myself some breakfast and then drove up to class. At night, when I got home, my housemates were hanging out watching the tube and I knew that living off-campus gave me that "home away from home" feeling that I was looking for.

So overall, while I feel that there are both advantages and disadvantages to living off-campus, I have decided that it is better to be a delinquent living off-campus than to be a delinquent living on the second floor of Reid Hall.

Amy Tiehel is a senior English major who is very good at field hockey.

"The first time I saw a Macintosh, I was immediately hooked. It's a work of art. I saw the student pricing and my next move was obvious: get one.

"Some other computers are cheaper, but they're a pain to learn, and working on them can be a grueling experience. Last year, a friend bought another kind of computer against my advice and has used it for maybe 15 hours. What a waste.

"Macintosh, on the other hand, is a logical extension of the mind. It lets you concentrate on what's in your paper, not on how to get it on paper. You can create professional-looking documents in minutes, and you lose the fear of learning new programs because they all work in the same way.

"Once you've worked with a Macintosh, there's no turning back."

Undaunted, the Great Sabha returns

Although the second weekend in September is traditionally the worst two days of the year for psychics, the Great Sabha won a few Zorns by successfully predicting the outcome of more than half of the weekend's pigskin activities. This week the atmosphere is once again clear. Conditions couldn't be more perfect. Subscribers, heed GS's words and get on the horn to win a few Plunketts for yourself.

NFL

N.Y. GIANTS -7 over Miami. LT will run over the Dolphins' inexperienced front five. Marino is going to have to be called on more often this week - just what No. 56 likes. Give the points.

Kansas City +3 over GREEN BAY. Some picked the Chiefs to win it all this year - they'd be undefeated if it weren't for a couple bad breaks. Anyway the Great Sabha believes magic is a hoax. Take the points.

CLEVELAND -5 over San Diego. Kosar and Co. should get on track this Sunday - if they don't, it could be a long season in the Dog Pound. Give the points.

Phoenix +9 over NEW ORLEANS. Rosenbach and the Cards have a lot of confidence coming off win against Eagles last week. Great Sabha likes the Desert Destroyers as the underdog again this week. Take the points.

WASHINGTON -14 over Dallas. The Skins should get some sweet revenge against the Jimmy Johnson and his Cowgirls who beat them in RFK last year. This is a no-brainer. Give the points.

CINCINNATI -9 1/2 over New England. Boomer should finally have a good week on his home (artificial) turf. Sabha warns readers, vibes aren't clear since not even he knows which Bengal team is going to show up. However, give the points.

L.A. RAMS -5 over Philadelphia. Buddy's Bad Boys aren't as bad as they think they are - they're worse. You can be sure that Father Ryan won't be shaking hands with Robinson before he unhappily leaves the Big A.

DENVER -9 over Seattle. The Seahawks aren't flying with both wings this year. A touchdown and a field goal is more than enough against this pathetic offense from the northern Pacific.

SAN FRANCISCO -11 over Atlanta. Neon Deion thinks he's the greatest thing since sliced bread. Rice and Montana will burn him enough to look like toast. Give the points.

L.A. RAIDERS -5 over Pittsburgh. If it wasn't for the Steel Curtain, the Silver and Black would have been the team of the 70's. Art Shell gets his first chance to coach against them and Coach Noll. Give the points.

Detroit +2 1/2 over TAMPA BAY. Last year's worst defensive team in the conference better make some adjustments if they are going to stop Sanders and the Silver-Stretch offense. The Bucs better do a rain dance Sunday morning. Take the points.

BEST BETS

HOUSTON -9 over Indianapolis. The last thing Jeff George will remember about this game is getting off the plane in Houston. Welcome to the House of Pain, Jeff. Give the points.

CHICAGO -2 Minnesota. The Battle at Midway. Don't expect more than a touchdown from the Scandinavian Marauders from the Twin Cities. Sabha says wager 50 Hannahs on this one. Give the points.

COLLEGE

MARYLAND -2 1/2 over NC State. The Terps are the hottest team outside of Charlottesville in the ACC. Krivak's job is on the line here at home. Expect a win from the kids from College Park. Give the points.

OKLAHOMA -35 1/2 over Tulsa. The Battle of the Sooner state? Ah, no. The Sooners should have the spread well in hand by the end of the first half. Don't pass this one up. Give beaucoup points.

WISCONSIN -3 over Temple. If Bill Cosby suits up for the Owls this Saturday then this football program will truly be a joke. By the way Temple can't play on the road, or in cold weather, or outside their conference, or against teams that wear red or blue or green or yellow or pink or plaid or... Give the points.

Notre Dame -6 over MICHIGAN ST. The Irish are missing Lyght. However, it is extremely rare that ND loses to the spread twice in one season let alone two consecutive weeks.

Florida St. -26 over TULANE. State is gunning for respect. Will want to run the score into triple figures. Bowden is certainly capable of it. Give the points.

Great Sabha's results this season:

NFL: 8-6

BEST BETS: 2-0

COLLEGE: 2-3 (SABHA'S NOT DOING ANYMORE IVY GAMES)

Softball: this weekend's top ten

By Matt Giller

This Saturday, I'm sure you have heard by now that a softball tournament will be played. Since not all the teams and their rosters have been available to our home office in Geneva, Illinois, we are unable to make any seedings. However, we have been supplied with a couple top ten lists for your amusement.

TOP TEN THINGS OVERHEARD AT THETA CHI SOFTBALL TOURNEY THIS WEEKEND

The world according to Sonic Youth: Goo

By Morgan Huff

When I was seven years old, I spent most evenings before bed abusively torturing my mother's menagerie of hi-tech kitchen appliances. Blenders buzzing from puree to liquefy in less than six seconds, cake mixers, juicers, electric peelers, all added to the sibilant cacophony which usually climaxed with me rolling back on the floor banging wooden spoons against a metal pan like some snot covered primitive. Just the same, 'Goo' reminds me of my kitchen.

What dynamics give rise to such squalor, you ask? For short, this New York quartet pledges allegiance to a philosophy of Sonic Life, and have been doing so for over nine years. A snippet from the groups classic album Evol, speaks aptly well for those of sonic conviction: " We're gonna kill the California girls. . .We're gonna find the meaning of feeling good / And we're gonna stay there as long as we think we should."

More importantly, however, within the past four years since Evol 's release, the Youth have refined their twin guitar attack to an admirable level of intensity and primal scream. In the early days, guitarists Lee Ranaldo and Thurston Moore created the sonic approach through altered tunings and ear ringing feedback. Granted much of their earlier work is unbearably amorphous at times, but it stands as the genesis to a decade long sonic evolution where no end is yet in sight.

Think of this band as a distant cousin to Hendrix's "Third Stone From the Sun" or the Velvet Underground's "Sister Ray" and you won't be surprised at what they offer up on much of Goo. The swirling dissonance of "Mote" pounds you and hypnotizes via it's steam-roller momentum and conventional appreciation for repetitive atonal sound. Other songs, such as "Mary-Christ", beckon back to the unbridled ferocity of early garage rockers who liked to grab listeners by the nuts and make them sweat a little.

Kim Gordon's bass playing reaches an all time high for intestine twisting low end sleazy on the song Goo, and Steve Shelly's tasteful slosh on drums has finally risen from the sludge of earlier albums. A listen to the leading track "Dirty Boots" recalls the raw driving riffs of Keith Richard's, a la "Jumping Jack Flash", but refuses to mimic anyone. Sure, Goo may remind you of rock past, but it's only a nostalgic whisper underneath oddball tunings and extraterrestrial overtones dripping seductively in your ear.

An almost accessible gem on Goo is the clever and startlingly strong "Kool Thing", wherein Kim Gordon posts a mid-song question to Public Enemy's Chuck D: "What are you gonna do for us girls? What about male white corporate oppression?" Underground artist Raymond Pettibond's cover art adds to this call for liberation from oppression and mediocrity with a rather understated black/white picture and accompanying short verse, which reads, "I stole my sister's boyfriend. . .within a week we killed my parents and hit the road." Indeed, this band is as pissed off as the next guy, yet they're not trying to talk your head off about injustice this, injustice that. The Youth are here to send a chainsaw hurricane and mystic oscillations straight to your brain, and that, I think, is representation enough of their beliefs.

Anyone who discounts this band as a mere exercise in noise is a pure bred fool. You have to ask yourself: If Sonic Youth didn't exist, would we have to invent them? The answer: Probably not. But that's what makes them so quintessentially cool. They've constructed an almost entirely original approach to rock music, which at the present time most western ears haven't been accustomed to. Don't be surprised if the wrath of metal soon disintegrates and thousands of twelve year old kids across the country stay up late playing along to old Youth albums. The 'Fuck Led Zeppelin' attitude gave rise to Youth, and eventually the 'Fuck Sonic Youth' attitude will lead rock elsewhere. In the meantime, go load dad's shotgun and ask your sister's fiance' for a kiss. Or better yet, let Goo slobber all over you a few hours. It's the sickest fun you'll ever have, and no one has to die.

Morgan Huff is a sophomore with Goo in his kitchen. The editors apologize for the misprint of his article last week.

The Bauhouse exhibition: censored and censured?

By J. Tarin Towers

The Baltimore Arts' United House, or BAUhouse, recently opened an exhibit of local art that had been banned and censored. Censorship action which the press focuses on is usually of nationwide scope, as in the case of the Mapplethorpe photos. However, it is much more prevalent on the local scene; more, in fact, than most of us are aware of.

The actions taken against the various artworks varied from place to place. Usually censorship takes the form of the removal of a work from the display site it was supposed to occupy. This is most blatant when the work is removed without the notification, much less consent, of the artist or artists.

An example of this is Jose Villarrubia's "Icarus" This 12'x 9' watercolor/colored pencil drawing is a beautiful representation of the Greek myth. It is a very carefully and completely rendered male nude.

It was one of many works selected to be displayed in a public building in the Washington area. However, it was the only one that was removed from the exhibit. Villarrubia was notified after the drawing was removed, and the explanation was that a male nude was not appropriate for the main lobby of a public building.

A painting by Bebe Williams was also removed from display, but on even more insubstantial grounds. The painting was entitled "Inner-City Romance". It was determined to have racial overtones; the "black" figures in the painting were supposedly the "bad guys". In actuality it was a representation of two inner-city children experiencing "puppy love" by playing together and going on carnival rides. Not only innocuous, but pro-equality, Williams' work was a victim of interpretation.

A more extreme case of censorship involved Alice Sims. Her "Water Babies" series was a collection of photographs and paintings of Sims' own baby daughter and a neighbor. Both subjects were female and photographed nude. The photographs depicted the subjects in an innocent, non-exploitative way. Sims also used flowers, water, and a blue filter to make the subjects appear to be submerged.

Not only were the artworks banned, they were confiscated and used as evidence in a criminal trial. Sims was brought up on charges of child pornography. All her photographic material was labeled "paraphernalia" and also confiscated. Sims' children were taken away as wards of the court.

Censorship is affecting all of us, in ways we aren't even aware of. It affects the contents of music, television, film, literature, and theater. The first Constitutional Amendment guarantees everyone the right to his own opinion (freedom of speech. This same amendment, however, gives us the right to create works of art that others may not like (freedom of expression).

The exhibit at the BAUhouse will host a panel discussion at 8:00 p.m. on September 22.

J. Tarin Towers believes the only justified censorship would involve the New Kids.

Security report

The Washington College Library was victimized by a thief last week. Sometime between Wednesday evening September 12, 1990 and Friday afternoon, two compact disc players were stolen from the upstairs listening room. The thief had to violate Security locking devices in order to remove the items and therefore, may have made some noise in the process. If anyone saw any unusual activities that may relate to this incident, please contact Campus Security at extension 310. All information will be held confidential at caller's request.

Several bicycles have been stolen from campus this semester. The thefts have occurred at various locations around campus and all bicycles stolen were left unsecured at the time of theft. Please keep your bicycles locked in a secure area when unattended.

We are offering bicycle registration in conjunction with the Chestertown Police Department. Bicycle owners are encouraged to take advantage of this service. When registering your bicycle, all pertinent information is recorded and kept on file in the Chestertown Police Department. A sticker with an identification number is issued to be placed on the frame. This enables law enforcement officers to easily identify a stolen bicycle and return it to the rightful owner. The registration fee is three dollars and the bicycle may be registered at the Security Office located in Spanish House or the Chestertown Police Department at the corner of Cross Street and Maple Avenue.

partment of Education.

A meeting was held on Wednesday night in William Smith to introduce the game, decide on days and time of practices and also to decide on dues.

Approximately fifty people showed interest in the club by showing up at the meeting. Dues for the club were decided on and will be $60.00. This fee includes a uniform- a rugby shirt, shorts, and socks that may be kept upon completion of the season. Cleats, however, must be bought separately. The dues will also be used for social funding throughout the year.

Additional funding may be received from the Student Government Association. This is planned to be brought up and voted upon during the next S.G.A. meeting.

Practices are scheduled to begin on October first and anyone interested that did not attend the meeting on Wednesday night, should contact Seth before then or at practice. "We are looking for people to play," he says. "It is a lot of fun and really relaxed unlike the structure of varsity sports. The main reason to play is for the camaraderie because there is more in rugby than in any other sport."

for unforeseen projects have been taken out of the budget the S.G.A is left with about $43,000.00 to spend on both social activities and for club funding. The proposed budget was adopted unanimously by the Senators.

"This being one of the bigger budgets in recent years, I am quite hopeful that this administration will be able to utilize the funds in such a way to make this quite a memorable and positive year for us all," says Gimelson.

Because the S.G.A has $20,000.00 to spend for clubs this year, Gimelson urges Club Presidents or Treasurers to attend the funding meetings in addition to sending in the proposal of expenditures. Gimelson "strongly encourages all interested club representatives to show up to give us a better understanding of what they want the money for. Submitting a proposal is just not enough." Club funding meetings will begin Monday. Anyone interested or needing more information about when their club is scheduled to meet with the committee should contact Brian Gimelson at ext. 456.

Finally, Gimelson added that he is especially pleased with "the concern that the Senate appears to have for the school and for the participation and interest roles that the Freshman class appears to be taking in Student Government."

with a much-mangled ad and an article on date rape. Last we knew, date rape was not an art or an entertainment, except perhaps in sick people's minds. The issue should be covered, yes, but not in this section. And credit should be given where credit is due: the article was placed under Matt Giller's byline, when it was in fact written by Kate Absher for last year's Elm.

Finally, "The Lit House Bully" is becoming insulting.

We do not mean this to be a personal attack, as the staffers of the Elm are people we know and have worked with. As the only regular campus newspaper, it provides a very important forum for the student body and is one of the few things that unites us. It goes out via subscriptions to our parents. It presents an image of Washington College to the outside world. With regret, we must say that the image being presented is a negative and incorrect one, and that we do not want to be associated with or published in a newspaper like the Elm has been this year.

Best of luck in improving the quality in further issues: you have a vitally important job to fulfill on this campus, and we sincerely hope you address our concerns.

Constance Larrabee Arts Center Vandalized

By: Susie Mazzullo

The Constance Larrabee Arts Center was vandalized this weekend by unknown persons, as was the Fergueson Building and Minta Martin. According to security, two windows were broken after rocks had been thrown through them. One window was broken on the west side in the lobby and the other broken window is located in the main studio.

The windows were broken late Friday night or sometime early Saturday morning. They were discovered broken by security at 1:15 am.

A window in the Fergueson building was also broken at about the same time. It is believed that both incidents are related and that the same people are responsible. Both the Arts Center window and the Fergueson window cases are still under investigation.

Security encourages anyone with any information at all about either incident to contact them. "Being that it was a weekend night and that there were parties on campus, it is very possible that someone saw something. We need them to come forward," says Security Director, Jerry Roderick.

The last report of vandalism to happen this weekend was concerning the front door of Minta Martin. At approximately 11:00 pm on Monday evening, unknown persons kicked in the panels of the front door. This incident is also still under investigation.

Study Skills, not just for AP students

By: Susie Mazzullo

The study skills program run by Christine Pabon is more than a place for those students to go who have found themselves in serious academic trouble.

According to Christine Pabon, she helps those students who are in academic trouble, such as those on academic probation, but she says that she also sees those students who are currently getting better than average grades but would like to improve them. The study skills program is open to every segment of the college community and all students are encouraged to seek the assistance of the program.

Ms. Pabon claims that there are many ways in which she helps the students but three specific areas are of the most importance. First, she shows those students that come to her because they are having trouble in one or more of their classes how to develop methods of reading and studying that will increase their understanding of the material that needs to be learned. She helps them to reinforce long term learning. This type of learning will help students to remember the information long after mid-terms and finals are over.

Second, Ms. Pabon teaches students to organize their time efficiently so that stress is greatly reduces and so that the student may balance their academic responsibilities with college social activities.

One way she does this is by giving each student that comes to her for help their own scheduling sheet. On this sheet are the days of the week and the times of the day listed in half hour intervals. Ms. Pabon will then take the student's class schedule and any other outside responsibilities and fill them in in their appropriate time slots. Using this method, the students can see at a glance when they have free time to put in the extra study hours that they need. Some students even find out that they are involved in so many activities that they don't have enough time in the week for all they are supposed to do. This schedule helps students to visualize their weeks and see at a glance why they are falling behind and where they need to change their lives around.

Ms. Pabon claims that the procedure of using a scheduling sheet is especially helpful for seniors who have to balance a regular class load as well the responsibility of completing a thesis or studying for comprehensive examinations.

The third area that Ms. Pabon helps students to master is in exam taking. She gives them ideas on how to study and prepare for exams so that they will do so effectively and without a great deal of stress.

Tutorial services are also available outside of the program. If a student needs tutoring in a specific area outside of reinforcing study skills, Ms. Pabon can refer him or her to a student peer tutor.

The meetings are held one on one between Christine Pabon and the student involved. Students may sign up in the Student Affairs Office for an appointment that will fit into their schedule. There are twelve hours a week available for this service. Appointments are taken in half hour segments.

Ms. Pabon says that the biggest problem with the service is that the students don't seek assistance until it's too late. "Many students wait until after mid terms or close to the end of the semester to ask for help. Bringing up grades would be much more successful if students would ask for help at the beginning," she says.

All in all, Ms. Pabon's goals are to help students to revise their thinking. "I have a lot to say that people don't want to hear but that they know is true." An example of this she said involves working on those subjects that are harder or that you may not like first, instead of procrastinating and waiting until your full attention may not be on the subject at hand.

SGA allocates Funds

By: Susie Mazzullo

The Student Government held what was probably one of their longest meetings of the year on Monday night. The meeting was to allocate funds to the various clubs on campus that requested funding.

A Club Funding Committee had met previous to the meeting to look over and discuss the requests. They then recommend funding for each club. Although the committee recommends a specific amount to be allocated per club, this amount is not always the final amount that is given. Dorm Senators and the SGA officers may vote to raise or lower the amount.

The meeting began with a vote being taken to approve the minutes from last week. Once that was complete, they started with the business of the night.

The first order of business was a presentation by a member of the Garnett Elementary School. The school along with the community is planning to build a community playground.

The elementary school sent a representative to the SGA meeting because they need many volunteers to help in the construction of the playground. Approximately 300 students per day are needed. It was suggested that a committee be formed to get students signed up.

An issue that has been of interest to almost every facet of the college community was also discussed on Monday night. It was revealed that Clint Bear will be at the next SGA meeting to discuss the cable issue. The cable decisions are now in the hands of the Student Government, such as whether to rent or to buy, how to charge students, and a number of others. It was again suggested that a committee be Vandalism and you...

This weekend, while the KA's were defending the honor of Middle Hall against a small Lambda charge, some other people were expressing themselves by throwing a few rocks through the windows of our lovely new Art Center.

Throwing a rock through someone's window, it the mature act of a middle school delinquent. Something, no Washington College student would ever consider doing.

Hopefully, whatever emotions the culprits were trying to release left them, and they melted into the night, leaving behind three broken windows, one in Ferguson, and two in the Art Center.

Now, shattering, or at least, breaking, glass makes some sort of noise. A loud noise that a strolling student or students might have heard. Since the vandalism was discovered at 1:15, it is doubtful that the entire campus was fast asleep in their own little beds.

People have suggested that someone came from off campus and did the dirty deed. That maybe so, but it won't excuse any witnesses from not coming forward. Witnesses do not have to give their names, a phone call to the Deans, an unsigned note to Security, or an anonymous letter to the Editor of the Elm, anything would be enough. Whoever did it should be punished. After all, we do pay $ 16,000 a year to attend this college, and use facilities such as the Arts Center. And do we really want our tuition dollars to be used to replace broken windows?

Campus vandalism is certainly nothing new, but considering the target this time was a brand new building, anyone with any information should help find the parties responsible. Most of the Campus is familiar with the building the Arts Center replaced, and would agree on the point that what we have now is a large improvement over what the old Art House.

It would be wonderful if Washington College gained a reputation as a school with a strong honor code, and a student body that didn't let vandals go unpunished.

The Jed Cronin show

To the Editor,

After attending the so-called SGA event in the Coffee House last Friday, I left Hodson to find a group of fifty or so onlookers enjoying the "Jed Cronin show." This show involved none other than one of our most talented lacrosse player, Jed Cronin, standing in the firelane and shouting obscenities at the KA house. Phrases such as "KA sucks the back of my balls," "They're nothing but a bunch of fags," and "Lambda number one," went on for a total of at least a half hour without intervention by security or by the fraternity itself. I was even surprised to see our illustrious student body president sitting (away from the crowd) on a bench, cigar in hand and making no attempt to intervene in the situation. After the shouting match, Mr. Cronin and two other gentlemen (and I use that term VERY loosely) decided to storm Middle Hall in an attempt to remove the KA banner as well as to start some type of fight. I would not know this had it not been for Mr. Cronin's announcement that he could "kick all of their f– king asses by himself." Bold but stupid Mr. Cronin.

Fun is fun, but this is yet another example of the mindless exploits that certain fraternities (we all know who they are) consider to be normal behavior. I never thought much about the different things that Stu Neiman talked about, figuring that he was just out for votes anyway. Now I understand and apologize to Mr. Neiman. But why does he insist on lending his support to the Lambdas when this is the type of activity that they conceive as normal. Is he being hypocritical, looking for votes, or is he simply too trustworthy? And what about the Lambdas? Don't they have enough trouble without having this idiot screw things up even worse for them, or do they simply condone it as being necessary to be a part of their "Male Bonding."

I would not be saying any of this if one of the members of Mr. Cronin's crowd had not been a freshmen. One of the two Ratta brothers not only was party to these activities, but received an injury because of it. Even in the hospital emergency room, it is rumored, Mr. Cronin mouthed off to hospital staff. Go Lambda, that will show them. The point here is that the freshmen have been here for only four and a half weeks and already they are becoming a part of a cycle that most of the college would like to see part of our past. How much of a chance is there now? This year Cronin, next year Ratta and so on, and so on.

Some action should be taken on this matter, but I don't know where it will come from. There is no administration here on the weekends to witness these actions. Security may as well have German Shepherds and canes. Student Government's hands are tied, but there is our SGA president talking of growth, maturity, and responsibility. OK, Mr. President, talk to your friends over at Lambda and see what kind of pull you have. You say that you would like to see changes made, DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT! As for Mr. Cronin, I suppose that it would be foolish to hope for him to fail out, as he is a member of the fraternity with the highest cumulative GPA for the 1989-90 academic year, Thank You Mr. Martino and Mr. Hormes.

Perhaps these matters will never be resolved. This incident is only one on a long list of other actions which makes Lambda clearly our worst fraternity (regardless of their GPA.) Theta Chi woke up last year and made the changes they needed in order for them to get back on the right track. It has been slow coming but at least we can say that they are now trying. As for Lambda, I hope that there is someone in their group who can see what needs to be done as well as have the balls to do it. If not, maybe Stu should consider pledging Lambda this spring (that is if he likes maneuvers and tabasco.) If things do not change, then I hope SOMEONE in a position of power has the strength to PUT THEM OUT OF OUR MISERY. I'll settle for the expulsion of that lughead Cronin.

Signed,

A concerned but fearful student

Apology of the week:

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: If you were able to change one thing about Washington College, what would you choose?

More faculty

Justine DeSantis

When I was asked what I would change about Washington College the first thing that came to mind was the need for more teachers and more classes. As a liberal arts school, we're supposed to offer a wide variety of courses. As it is, people are having a hard time getting into the classes they need for distribution, never mind the thought of taking a class because of interest in the topic.

These days, people in 300 and 400 level classes for popular majors sit in a room in Bill Smith surrounded by thirty four other people. This is not what you expect from a school with a thirteen to one ratio, but it is now necessary. Students must take classes to graduate. The situation is frustrating to both students and faculty. Students find themselves in lecture classes that ideally should be seminars. This usually means that class participation is low and the only perspective given is that of the person standing at the front of the room. Professors now have less individual contact with their students and more work to do at home. There are more papers and tests to correct so professors are slower in returning them. Students are annoyed at not receiving their grades quickly. The circle continues.

As a junior English major this year, I am presently taking three English courses and one science. Having not gotten into Biology at registration (for the past two years) I tried again this semester and just barely made it in. I know that many of my friends will be taking Baby Bio as seniors, and not because they chose to put it off. Of my other three classes, only one of them was one that I had intended to take when I walked into registration. The other two were a last resort so that I could get sixteen credits. I happen to like English so it does not bother me, but taking three of your four courses in one subject is not very broadening.

While the courses that I'm taking are over booked, there are many that seem to get very little support. The threat of the art major becoming an art program is a case in point. I also know many people that want to become teachers. These people can not major in education because that major is not available. Going through the Ed Block severely dictates what other courses a student can take. They can only enroll in certain classes even within their major. If we had the staff to run education as a major, this situation would not occur.

If I could change anything about Washington College it would be to add more teachers to our staff and subsequently, more courses to our curriculum.

Justine DeSantis is a junior majoring in English.

Give the college a national reputation

Kristen Kujowski

If I could give the school one wish, it would be something that all members of the WC community could benefit from, present and future. I would like the recognition of the school's prestige moved from the regional to the national level. This could benefit all members of Washington College by opening new doors because people would recognize Wc as not only the tenth oldest college in the nation, but also as one of the finest traditional liberal arts schools in America.

A feasible way this could be achieved is to increase the budget of the admissions office. These additional funds would increase the admissions staff as well as their mobility. If the college were to do more recruiting outside of their traditional areas, it could attract a more nationally geographic diverse student body.

Increased diversity would enable WC to become a national melting pot of ideas and perspectives. Students from all over the country could generate thoughts and ideas representative of a liberal arts college. This mind force could not be contained on the Eastern Shore. It would eventually spread to all corners of America.

I would not want anyone to believe that I am not proud of WC, but I do believe it is time for our school to receive the credit that it deserves.

OUTLOOK

Is the S.G.A President just another student?

Stuart Neiman

For many of us, it is an unfortunate reality that we must be faced with personal discord before we may truly come to know who and what we are. As many know, this summer I faced the subject of mortality first hand and have awakened to the value of life. Sound good? Well it did to me at first. Last week though I was confronted with a situation that forced me to address the fine line separating the person from the student and consequently the student from the President of the SGA. A faculty member who is both my advisor and professor, confronted me with my four absences in his class. This confrontation went far beyond his class procedure regarding attendance. It moved into the subject of myself (as president of the SGA) in relation to being a member of the class. A comment made such as: "you come in on Monday, make a few articulate statements and aren't around the next class," merely states the objective facts of the situation. Comments dealing with the nature of my responsibility to the class as a "class member" strike a deeper chord.

It is not the function of this article to address the attendance issue, but rather the issue of responsibility. It makes no difference that the reasons for these absences were justifiable, valid and/or excusable excuses. That's just it though; they are nothing more than excuses regardless of their nature. Realizing this, my stance on maturity and taking responsibility for ones actions has been to some extent hypocritical. Though I maintain full responsibility for each and every one of my decisions, I have been remiss in my responsibility to those who are affected by these decisions. In the case of this particular class (an intro course), I have not recognized how the freshmen and sophomores of the class are affected by me, not in terms of what I give (ie: class discussion), but rather by my part in their forming of decisions based on the class atmosphere. As the professor clearly indicated, if I were quiet and contributed little, then I would be less missed and less important to the structure of the class. As an active participant though, I accept a responsibility much like that which I have been given in the form of the SGA Presidency.

The professor then posed the question of whether or not the president should have special privileges with regard to class attendance and participation? I would like to have answered yes, but reality dictates that the President of Student Government must be a student first. For in reality the SGA President is nothing more than a student awarded by other students with the privilege of representative power. You may say (critically of this) the words sound great but where is the accountability. Fortunately this professor provided me with only two paths for making amends with himself and the class: withdraw immediately or not miss another class. I use the word paths because these were not presented to me as options, but rather as his opinion of what was right.

Perhaps the worst aspect of this incident came in the comment (by the professor) "you owe me this apology because that (pointing to the classroom) is what I do." What one of us has ever considered the personal, purely subjective view of the professor towards attendance in their respective class. Surely it is neither a sign of respect, nor a sign of interest to miss class on any type of regular basis regardless of the reason. I have had as much reason as anybody to miss classes. Between my schedule, my past health problems and various responsibilities to the whole of the school, I have taken advantage of the excludability of my absences, but so what. If I miss something am I not still responsible for it at a later date in conjunction with my other responsibilities at that later date. Thus we may see the viscous circle that comes from this attitude, and I am as guilty if not more guilty (because of my position) than anyone else.

I have come to know that one thing which is very true about this position is that every move you make and every thing that you say will be judged first for its political value, and then for its true intent. There are those who will read this politically and say "he is just trying to get brownie points." The fact is that I don't need brownie points. There are those who will say that I am trying to kiss up to the professor in question. I have told you though that I was provided only with two paths of apology, so there is no kissing up. There is only the path that I have chosen: to attend every class without excuse regardless of the importance of that excuse. Having completed this (one day at a time) I will hopefully make amends, and begin to realize the other side of responsibility in the Presidency of the SGA. Learn with me or ignore it, that is your prerogative. Realize though that the greatest excuse in the world cannot mask the nature of responsibility, to yourself and to those who your actions (or lack of action) affects.

Gainesville: a college nightmare

By Wendy Bridges

"I'd buy a lot of mace," said Washington College freshman Nicole Bachinsky after hearing that five students were murdered at the University of Florida in Gainesville, Florida.

On August 26, the mutilated bodies of seventeen year old Christina Powell and eighteen year old Sonja Larson were found in Tolbert Hall on the Gainesville campus. During the next two days, more bodies were discovered on the campus.

In the same hall, the body of eighteen year old Christa Hayt was found. While at an apartment complex on the campus both Tracy Paules, 23, and Manuel Taboado, 23, were found stabbed to death.

After the incidents, the University of Florida reported to USA Today that half of its 35,000 students had fled back to their homes. Students here at Washington College sympathize with their peers' actions.

Junior and English major, Janviere Thuman, stated if the murders were to happen here, she would, "probably live at home and commute."

Likewise, freshman Alexandra Nader remarked, "I would be very scared; I would not walk around alone."

Students who remained at the University seemed to agree because by September 3, groups of students could be seen carrying pillows and blankets across campus in order to go to a central location to sleep.

Lt. Sadie Darnell, police spokeswoman for the Gainesville police said of the school, "Tensions are high. We've had officers respond to a call, and they've been met at doors with guns."

University of Florida's campus security installed a hotline for the school's 19,000 remaining students, and campus security also provides on and off campus escorts to students who don't feel safe but still need to be at the school.

While campus security handled the campus, the police searched for a suspect. The police admitted to the Associated Press, "We cannot say the killing is over. We don't know. We don't have any one in custody for the murders."

But on September 1, Edward Lewis Humphrey, age 18, had been arrested and jailed in Brevard County, Florida for assaulting his 79 year old grandmother.

Edward Lewis Humphrey had been a part-time student at the University of Florida who had lived briefly at the apartment complex where Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboado were found, and also lived at Tolbert Hall where the three other girls were discovered.

After the blonde, baby faced young man confessed to having knowledge of the first two murders, his bond was raised to $1 million.

Edward Lewis Humphrey is one of eight leading suspects in the case, and could possibly be the murderer who nation wide papers say, "shreds and pockets his victims' flesh."

"I would be scared out of my mind!" exclaimed Drama major Abrah Wilberg who is glad to walk across the W.C. campus and not the campus of the University of Florida.

Clarence Pope, a student at the University of West Florida, commented, "If it can happen to someone there, it can happen to someone here."

Lt. Sadie Darnell explained that this type of fear arises from the fact that, "You've got five victims who are all students."

If a number of students were murdered here at Washington College what would their peers do? Erika Fitzhugh, freshman and Psychology major theorized, "I don't know what I'd do. You'd have to be in that situation where your life is at risk in order to decide. But, then again, I couldn't leave my friends here to face that problem alone."

Pre-law major Katina Duklewski confessed that she would, "Transfer anywhere besides the University of Florida."

On the other hand, Mike Tarant, an English major, would base his decision on specific circumstances. He said, "It would depend on who was murdered."

As of last week, campus life at the University of Florida was returning to normal. According to the Associated Press, 70,000 fans crowded Ben Hill Griffin stadium to see the Florida Gators play the Oklahoma State Cowboys at the University of Florida's season opener.

However, police are still pursuing leads in and around the state that may lead to more evidence about the crime.

Wendy Bridges is a freshman planning to major in the Humanities.

In the world: East Germany withdraws from Warsaw Pact

UNITED STATES:

Speaking at a south lawn ceremony, President Bush praised President Frederik de Klerk for his progress in dismantling South Africa's apartheid system. The ceremony was held at the conclusion of the South African head of state's first visit to the White House. In his speech, Bush said he would not alter the conditions set for the lifting of economic sanctions. He also said he believed that the process of dismantling apartheid is irreversible and that this "is the element the European governments have been looking for" to signal the start of reestablishing economic ties with South Africa. Members of the European Community have demanded evidence of true change as a condition for lifting the economic sanctions they have imposed. Bush's speech was seen as that evidence by South African officials who called it a vote of confidence.

The first clear pictures of Venus were received Sunday at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in California from the Magellan spacecraft. After initial problems in which the spacecraft would turn itself off, it now appears Magellan is ready to take on its mission mapping Venus's surface. The spacecraft is able to gather accurate images of the shrouded planet through the use of radar which is able to beam through the clouds and record radar images as sharp as a photograph. The first pictures show that Venus's surface has been carved and twisted by great forces. In the coming months, scientists will continue to piece together the photographs and discover more about the planet's surface and atmospheric conditions.

SOVIET UNION:

The Soviet Union granted President Gorbachev new powers after they failed to reach an agreement on an emergency economic reform program. The powers were granted to aid the transition period to a market economy and would allow Gorbachev to rule virtually by decree. The Supreme Soviet decided to give Gorbachev these powers to avoid having to reach a decision on the reform program until mid-October. The members of the Supreme Soviet are still unable to agree on the pace and scope of economic change in the Soviet Union. Gorbachev is now able to issue decrees for a variety of subjects including property, economic management, price setting and public order. A top economic advisor to Gorbachev said in an interview that he hoped the first decrees will be measures to stabilize the failing economy, which has deteriorated quickly over the last six months. Last week Abel Aganbegyan, a senior economist, described the economic situation in the Soviet Union as "catastrophic".

EAST GERMANY:

East Germany formally renounced its membership in the Warsaw Pact. Rainer Eppelmann, East Germany's disarmament and defense minister, performed one of his last duties when he presented the Soviet Supreme Commander of Warsaw Pact Forces, General Pyotr Lushev with his countries resignation. In five days East Germany will unite with West and the new united Germany will be a member of NATO. Under the Treaty of Unification the East German army will be dissolved. Only about 50,000 troops will remain. The West will receive weaponry and other materials from the East German army, which the West has already labeled obsolete and useless. However, some of the East German tanks, planes, and artillery will be sent to Turkey, which borders Iraq and is also a member of NATO.

"I became a Macintosh convert in business school.

"At our computer lab I'd always find lines of people waiting to use the Macintosh computers, while other computers just sat there. So I had a choice: wait for a Macintosh, or come back at 6 A.M. to grab one before they'd all be taken.

"After business school, I took a job at a large bank and used my Macintosh for producing everything from spreadsheets to a company newsletter.

"Today I use Macintosh to help me run my own management consulting firm. When I give a presentation, I can see in people's faces that they're really impressed. And that makes me feel great.

"Sometimes I take Fridays off, put my Macintosh and skis in the car and head for the mountains. I ski days and work nights. It's perfect.

Love and dating at Washington College

Phil "Slice" Macek

You had better beware, because it could happen to you at any time. You could be walking to class, coming out of the library, or waiting in those two hour lines at the dining hall. You could be working out in the gym or coming out of the mailroom, and all of a sudden you could meet that certain someone and fall instantly in love. Once this happens, as you probably already know, your life will never be the same. Whether your new love ends up breaking your heart or spending the rest of their life with you in eternal happiness, you must admit that your life is forever changed.

Now don't get me wrong, I think the notion of romantic young love is a wonderful thing. Most people know about the feelings involved with new love. You get a powerful urge to be with your new love constantly, and yet, when you must be apart, you spend your time daydreaming, staring out into space, and writing playful little poems:

I was going to write a poem about you/But due to reasons of rhyming,/The poem ended up being about your left elbow. /I'm working on the big toe of your right foot now.

Obviously, poems like these are never going to win the Sophie Kerr prize any time soon, but for these budding young Shakespeares, their value goes way beyond awards and money.

O.K. so once you're past this initial stage of daydreaming and worshiping your new love, you enter the next stage: college dating. Now here is where a major problem comes to light. Here you are with a date on Friday night and all you can say is, "All right, let's check out our options for fun here in Chestertown. We could either go downtown and see a movie, take in a movie downtown, or see what's playing at the theatre downtown. So what's it going to be?" As it becomes painfully obvious, you can exhaust Chestertown's hot spots for dating in about two hours. Clearly, there is a desperate need to venture outside Chestertown so as to find fun things to do. Now I'm not suggesting that you always have to take your new love somewhere exotic and spend tons of money to have fun. This is due to the fact that college kids do not have tons of money to spend in the first place (why do you think we drink Beast?™) and more importantly, two people can have great fun just doing the little things that bring them closer together. For example, you could teach your "new reason for living" how to play a sport. Golf, for instance, is a rather non-strenuous activity that can bring two people closer together. There is also tennis, swimming, and jogging leisurely around Chestertown. All very fine activities you can engage in to become better acquainted with your new love (plus they don't cost anything.) Overall, it does not really matter what you do as long as you both enjoy doing it.

I remember receiving mixed information about dating before I got to this campus. A high school teacher said to me once, "When you go to college, there is a very good chance that you will end up marrying the girl you go out with. So be very careful about what school you go to, it will definitely change your life. You could go to one school, meet one girl and spend the rest of your life with her. Or, you could pick a different school, meet a different girl, and marry her." "But Mr. Newman," I replied, "Why can't I just go to one school for a while and then transfer to the other school, meet both girls, and pick which one I like better?" As was expected, Mr. Newman kicked me out of class that day for being such a wise guy.

My brother-in-law gave me some very cautious words of wisdom when it came to dating: "There is nothing more expensive than a woman who says she is free for the evening." While this seems to be very solid advice indeed, I have to disagree with it.

In all cases, the most amusing advice I got was from an older friend who was a college upperclassmen when I had just started freshman year here. "Man, you got to go after naive girls. You know what the definition of 'naive' is, don't you." "No," I replied, "Please tell me." Well he looked me straight in the eye and said, "A naive girl is one who believes that the sound speakers at a drive-in movie only work in the backseat of a car." With that, he gave me a hearty slap on the back and told me to find a good drive-in theatre at any cost. Well, unfortunately, Chestertown or any other place around here, does not have a drive-in movie theatre. And it seems like such a shame to not be able to see if my friend's advice would work.

But in all reality, there can be really no good advice on finding the perfect mate. It basically boils down to chemistry two people feel between one another. If it works, it's really a wonderful thing. If it doesn't work, suck it up and keep looking, something will turn up. Remember, there are lots of fish in New York state prisons and there are plenty of prisoners in the sea, or something like that.

SUGGESTIONS TO THINK ABOUT.

The hot, humid, hazy days of summer are finally slipping away like a cloud in the night. The cool fresh, invigorating days of fall are fast approaching. With the ushering in of a new season simultaneously comes the beginning of another challenging and exciting year at Washington College. So along with the ensuing incoming year, the following are some innovative ideas that should serve to activate the gray matter in the so called cerebral cortex.

(1) Totally ignore any recommendations and suggestions by the New Trout on the Block. This attitude will afford you the opportunity to personally meet highly influential people at Washington College.

(2) PARK ANYWHERE YOU WANT. After all it is a free country isn't it? Nobody can tell you what to do. Besides, this might save you the inconvenience of finding a parking spot by having K and L find one for you.

(3) PARTY HEARTY. GO WITH THE FLOW. (Especially where beer is concerned.) Remember you are always in control. Disregard rumors of date rape, alcohol poisoning and the 25,000 traffic fatalities related to alcoholic consumption each year. After all, it can't happen to you.

(4) KEEP YOUR DOOR PROPPED OPEN AT NIGHT. This provides you with an opportunity to meet somebody new and far out.

(5) DRINK ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES IN AS MANY OPEN PUBLIC PLACES AS YOU CAN. This not only gives you an opportunity to be creative in the way you try to conceal your drink, but it also helps develop a sense of humor with the Security Officers when they see you go through the motions.

(6) TRY TO DEVELOP AN INNOVATIVE STRATEGY TO CATCH THE INFAMOUS "NOBODY." He is personally responsible for most of the destruction on campus. The Security Department really appreciates your willingness in the past to help apprehend Nobody. It seems when vandalism and destruction have occurred, many people gave testimony to the fact that nobody did it.

(7) CONTINUE TO LET NOBODY GET AWAY WITH ANY HAVOC HE CAN DO. After all, this affords you the opportunity of community involvement. Everybody else will get the blame for the destruction.

(8) KEEP AVOIDING THE LIBRARY ON FRIDAY AND SATURDAY NIGHTS. After all, the library isn't the only place to expand your mind.

(9) STRIVE TO PLACE SOCIAL ACTIVITIES BEFORE ACADEMICS. However, remember the dictionary if the only place where success comes before work.

(10) TRY TO AVOID THAT MYTHICAL RESPONSIBLE BEHAVIOR WRITTEN ABOUT IN A PREVIOUS ISSUE OF THE ELM. After all, who wants to be in the minority, it takes too much courage to stand alone.

(11) WALK AS SLOWLY AS POSSIBLE WHEN USING THE CROSSWALK. After all, pedestrians have the right of way. (Stopping in the middle of the road and chatting is particularly recommended.) This provides the drivers of automobiles opportunities to react in many diverse and creative ways.

(12) TRY CONTROLLING YOUR FRUSTRATION QUOTIENT. Use the innovative approach of Middle Hall. THROW your T.V. out the third floor window. (Or maybe even a sofa or chair.) This definitely will provide some interesting topics for conversation and it is certain to be a big hit.

In the final analysis, the choice is up to you. With every choice made there is however a consequence. Ask yourself, "Is the choice being made really worth the consequences that may ensue?"

The dangers of not having "faces"

"Wait a minute, who is that? And that person over there, I know that I have never seen him before. Who the hell are these people and what are they doing at Washington College? Is this visiting day for high school seniors? Whoa, these must be the new freshmen. Damn, there are so many of them that I know I'll never be able to tell them apart. i feel as confused as the transvestite bank robber who didn't know where to put the pantyhose."

These words have been heard quite a few times since the beginning of the semester. But you know, it's really a shame that this kind of problem of not knowing your fellow classmates has to occur at all; and I blame it all on that despicable little hellion who decided not to give out "Faces of Washington College" this year. Affectionately known as the "Bible" of Washington College, this book bears the mug shots of all the faculty, administration, and most importantly, the students. The book's presence around campus is instrumental in assuring a successful social life at this wonderful school. For example, your roommate could come back from class one day and say, "Dude, I saw this totally bitchin' looking babe in history class today. You have got to see her." Now instead of having to wait to see this girl in person, you can simply whip out your handy dandy "Bible" and show your roommate a picture of this girl. Then, when you see this girl around campus you can use a good cheesy pick-up line on her. "Hi there. I saw your picture in 'Faces' and I realized that you were in my history class, So, you wanna go out tonight? After all, I got needs and you got needs— so why should we both be needy on a night like this?" Now I'm not saying that this kind of line is going to work like magic. In fact, any guy who uses a pick-up line this poor should be castrated, tarred and feathered, dragged downtown by his hair, and publicly stoned.

In all honesty, there is a legitimate need for "Faces" around campus. Of course, these needs differ from person to person and class to class, but each need can seemingly be classified into larger groups. For example, the new freshmen use the book to see their teachers for the first time before taking their class. And let me tell you, you can learn a lot from a picture. I'm sure many classes have been either shunned or looked to with eagerness based on the picture of the teacher. Freshmen also use "Faces" to scout out upperclass fantasies. On the other hand, the upperclassmen skip past the administration and faculty (because they have already seen them too many times in past years) and head straight for the freshman section. Upperclassmen want to check out the new recruits in order to determine what kind of people are going to inherit the school when they leave. As one senior, who shall remain anonymous, so eloquently put it, "They shouldn't call it 'Faces,' they should call it 'Who's New to Screw.'" from the upperclass point of view, this is quite an appropriate title.

Phil "Slice" Macek

Overall, "Faces" allow students to put names and faces together, which subsequently makes it easier for people to meet each other. So, if people meeting each other is compared to a chemical reaction, then "Faces" would be the catalyst that speeds up that reaction. Moreover, if people are able to meet each other quicker when there is a "Faces" book around, then there is greater unity among the students and freshmen will have an easier time adjusting to their surroundings. Therefore, it seems logical to suppose that since there is no "Faces of Washington College" this year there will be greater unrest among the students. It will take people longer to meet other people, which in turn will lead to greater social segregation among the classes. Thus, seniors will be more likely to hang out with other seniors, juniors with other juniors, and so on down the line.

Hence, it seems plausible to suppose that the absence of "Faces" this year will lead to a decline in class integration and interaction, which in turn will lead to the destruction of the entire free world. Because we all know, that Washington College is the center of the universe, and if something catastrophic happens here (like not having "Faces" this year) then the outside world will feel its effects tenfold.

In closing, I hope that this dreadful mistake will not be repeated in the future. I also hope that the students, both freshmen and upperclassmen, have recovered from the initial shock of not having a "Faces" book this year, Hopefully, the social life at this school will not suffer from such a horrific blunder, the perpetrator of which had better confess now or face public humiliation after his apprehension.

The Great Sabha battles evil galactic spirits

The Great Sabha took one under the chin last weekend. Opposing spirits at the last minute swayed the outcome of numerous games in the closing moments of games. These spirits have been discovered. Apparently they are washed-up prophets that circle the galaxy attempting to pick off the Great Sabha's inspiring divinations. These evil-doers channel their hatred for the Great One by spiting him. Well this weekend the Great Sabha is going to throw these spirits the proverbial curveball, by predicting the losers. Another change this week is the placement of the picks - the college losers will be picked first.

COLLEGE

Kansas +42 losers to OKLAHOMA. By the second half, the Jayhawks will put on the Magic Slippers, click their heels three times and say, "I wish I were home, I wish I were home, I wish I were home." Give the points.

Tennessee +2 1/2 losers to AUBURN. Tight all the way; however, nobody beats Auburn at home. Give the points.

Southern Cal -1 losers to OHIO STATE. The heat must be affecting the brain cell activity of the handicappers out in Las Vegas. USC is favored at OSU even when the Trojens are ranked lower. Take the points.

OREGON +3 losers to BYU. Oregon's defense will be sitting ducks to Detmer. If you don't give the points, you're a loser.

Virginia Tech +25 losers to FLORIDA STATE. State's offense is just starting to warm up. The scoreboard is going to looklike a pinball machine.

NFL

PHOENIX +6 1/2 losers to Washington. A touchdown should be enough against Bugel's boys. Give the points.

Green Bay +2 1/2 losers to DETROIT. The Silver-Stretch offense should bounce back this week. The Majic-man, however, won't. Give the points.

BUFFALO -3 losers to Denver. The Broncos may need another last second miracle, but they'll cover. Trust me. Take the points.

MINNESOTA -8 losers to Tampa Bay. Let's keep in mind Sabha critics this is just against the spread. Vinnie vill vin against ve vread. Take the points.

NY Jets pick em losers to NEW ENGLAND. The Pats might be bad but the Jets don't win much up in Foxboro. Pick the home team.

LA RAIDERS -1 losers to Chicago. Two organizations that are trying to gain respect around the league again; however, the Midway Marauders shall gain the respect this week. Take the point.

Cleveland -6 1/2 losers to KANSAS CITY. The Browns are only as good as Kosar is healthy. He ain't. Give the points.

SAN DIEGO -2 losers to Houston. Pardee and Moon have got the run-and-shoot offense working on all cylanders these days. Take the points.

Monday Night

SEATTLE +2 1/2 losers to Cincinnati. Coach Knox should hang up the clipboard - the game, unfortunately, has passed him by. Boomer and the boys will prove it Monday Night.

BEST BETS

Indianapolis +13 losers to PHILADELPHIA. The Colts might have the center take some plays at QB by the end of this one. Wager a couple dozen Plunketts on this one. Give the points.

Dallas +13 1/2 losers to NY GIANTS. Before the end of this game the announcer will say, "If this were a fight, they'd stop it." Simply give the points.

The Great Sabha's results this season:

NFL: 15-13

BEST BETS: 4-0

COLLEGE: 3-7(IF THIS WAS BASEBALL I'D BE IN THE RUNNING FOR THE BATTING TITLE)

REC Sports: KA's win softball, football kicks off

By Deann Pinzcok

The Theta Chi Softball Tournament held last weekend was a great success, even though the weather was threatening on the first day of scheduled games. Several teams, a total of twelve, turned out and participated in the fight for the championship. This was the year that the four time softball team champs, Surf & Turf, were finally dethroned. The four teams that advanced to the semi-finals on Sunday were Oedipus & MoFo's, Surf & Turf, KAs, and Thetas. Oedipus & MoFo's took on Surf & Turf and proceeded to defeat them with a surprise grand slam late in the game which put them ahead three runs and won the semi-final game for them, 6-3. In the other semi-final game, KAs defeated the tournament's hosts, Thetas, 9-6. In the final, championship game, the KAs procurred the championship with their victory over Oedipus & MoFo's. It was an exciting weekend tournament that brought out the competitive softball player in all who participated!

The 1990 football season is off to a great start, and this week the women's league began their season. Four women's teams are entered in this year's league; ZTA's, Alpha Chi's, The Terrrible Ten, and the Alpha Babies(last year's unscored upon champs). In Tuesday's games, the Alpha Babies conquered the Alpha Chi's, 32-0 in an exciting and fun game and the Terrrible Ten slipped past the ZTA's, 7-6. The women are out to have a good time this season and all players have brushed up on their football skills and are ready to claim the championship. Good luck to all the ladies!!

In the men's league last week, Pseudo Budha, The Dawgs, and Kent each had victories over their opponents, Phi Delts, KAs, and the Int'l House, respectively, on Tuesday September 18th. On Thursday, September 20th, The Dawgs conquered the Int'l House, Team Rupert over the Mules, and Pseudo Budha defeated the KAs. It's early in the season so the championship is fair game for any of the teams!

Exciting Events To Come In REC SPORTS- This weekend is Greek Weekend and the traditional Greek Games will be held this Saturday from 11:30 till about 2:30. All sororities and fraternities will compete in these games which include everything from fun activities to structured games, but all are composed of fun times. The sorority and fraternity with the all around best winning record by the end of the games will win the championship for their group. It's alot of fun to watch

Field hockey ties and loses close one

By Eleonor Shriver

As the Shoremen Field Hockey team enters its fifth week of the season not a player will forget the two games of week four.

Last Monday, The Lady Shoremen met Haverford on a cold and unfamiliar field. The Ford's would be their first MAC conference and league game. The contest was scoreless until the Ford's Bonnie Hemenway scored with 6:40 left in the first half.

Keeping up the intensity and going for the big shots, Washington's own Renee Guckhert put one into the goal with 28:30 left in the second half. The two teams remained in a stalemate throughout the rest of the game. Both teams played hard in double overtime, neither one falling to the other.

Defensively, Brigid DeVries kept out fourteen shots. While seniors, Amy Tiehel, Donna White, Erin O'Neil and the rest of the defensive line performed well under pressure.

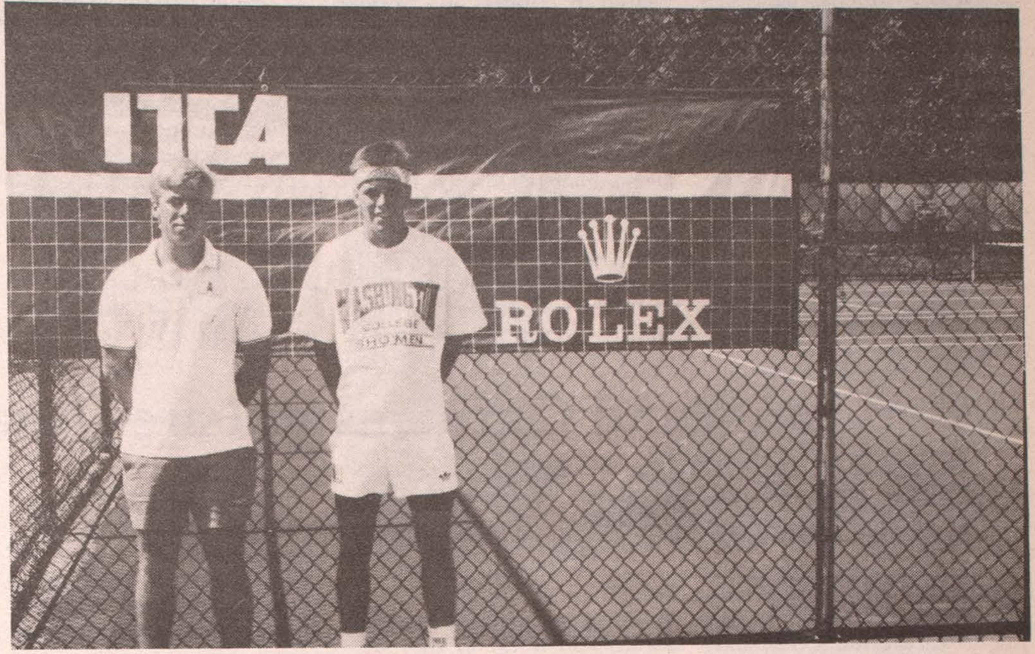
On Saturday, their next opponent, The Elizabethtown Blue Jays, left four days of intense preparation for their second conference and league game.

Saturday brought with it some inclimate weather, but it did not stop the Shoremen from playing a great game of field hockey. Washington's own freshman, Caroline Jensen, scored first with 28:20 left in the first half. Then again with 18:04 left in the game, Jensen connected with sophomore, Marie Mohler for a goal.

The Lady Shoremen had control of most the second half all the way down to the last minutes of the game. Time was the unfortunate enemy as the Blue Jays edged the Shoremen 3-2.

On the defensive end, goalie Brigid DeVries and halfbacks Jen Blenckstone and Amy Tiehel controlled the ball and played well.

The field hockey team continues on with their season with four straight games on the road. They will meet Albright on Tuesday and Goucher at 1:00 pm on Saturday. They will return to Kibler Field across the tracks on Tuesday October 9th when they will meet conference foe Johns Hopkins.



Bill Meadows from W&L and Scott Read from W.C. after Read's Rolex singles title two weeks ago.

Read wins record fifth Rolex title

By Matt Giller

Scott Read went down to Lexington, Va. September 15-16 and picked up another trophy. Wasington and Lee hosted the Rolex Southeast Regional Small College Championship only to have their top-ranked player defeated by W.C.'s Read.

Senior racketeer Read won his second Rolex singles title to go along with his third doubles title for a record five Rolex championships. He faced W&L's Bill Meadows in the finals winning in straight sets 6-3, 6-3. The senior from Houston, Texas defeated teammate sophomore Trevor Hurd, 6-4, 6-1 in the semifinals.

Read went through the tournament relatively unscathed by not dropping a set the whole weekend. W&L's Kelly Vandever met Read in the second round and was made quick work of by the Texan 6-1, 6-0. Mike rant and Rave of Catholic bowed out to Read in the round of 16 6-2, 6-2. In the quarterfinals, Read sent Rob McNaughton of W&L to the showers but not before he squashed him 6-1, 6-4.

Hurd, a sophomore transfer from New Mexico Military Institute, saluted Steve Horowitz of Lynchburg right out of the tournament, 6-1, 6-4. George Mestre of Catholic fell victim, 6-2, 6-4, as did Holden "Gladys" Knight of Christopher Newport, 6-3, 3-6, 6-2.

Read and Hurd didn't give up a set as they captured the doubles title with a 6-2, 6-0 defeat of seventh-seeded teammates Andy Bohutinsky and Carlos Nuno. Top-seeded duo Read and Hurd bagelled Ferrum's Cooke and Crandall. They then went on to defeat W&L's Wein and Yates, 6-0, 6-4, and Goucher's Akin and Elkin, 6-1, 7-5.

Read's next Rolex tourney is in Corpus Christi, Tx next month at the first annual Rolex National Small College Championships at the HEB Center.

Charles Simic to speak

Charles Simic, 1990 recipient of the Pulitzer Prize for poetry, will give a reading of his work Wednesday, October 3rd at 8 p.m. in the Norman James Theatre. The reading, given in honor of the inauguration of Charles H. Trout as 24th President of Washington College, is sponsored by the Sophie Kerr Committee, with additional funding provided by the National Endowment for the Arts. Simic will be giving an informal talk on "The European Short Poem" in the Sophie Kerr room of Miller Library Thursday, October 4th at 3 p.m.

Simic, who teaches at the University of New Hampshire, was born in Yugoslavia in 1938. He won the pulitzer Prize for a new collection of poems, The World doesn't end: Prose Poems. Simic had been nominated for a Pulitzer once before, for his Collected Poems: 1953-83. His poems have been translated into 11 languages and have appeared in publications worldwide, including The New Yorker, The Nation, Atlantic Monthly, Esquire and The Paris Review.

Simic is the author of ten volumes of poetry, including Dismantling the Silence, Return to a Place Lit by a Glass of Milk, Charon's Cosmology, What the Grass Says and Classic Ballroom Dances, winner of the 1980 di Castagnola Award and the Harriet Monroe Poetry award. Simic has also recieved the Edgar Allan Poe Award, the P.E.N. translation Prize, a Guggenheim Foundation Fellowship, and awards from the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the National Institute for Arts and Letters.

Simic has published numerous translations of French, Russian and Yugoslav poetry, and is co-editor of Another Republic, an anthology of 17th-century European and South American writers. His appearance at Washington College is one of several programs featuring writers who come from bilingual cultures, and is made possible in part by a special grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead

Since High School, when he first read the script, Clay Eichelberger has always wanted to produce Tom Stoppard's play, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead. Next weekend, Eichelberger, a senior Drama major, will see that dream come to fruition.

The play first attracted him because of its humor and the way that "humor is juxtaposed with existential themes." He says, "existentialism as a philosophy is fairly depressing. I am amazed that [Stoppard] could write such a funny play about it." Eichelberger explains that humor masks the depression of the philosophical message, and he hopes that during the performance the audience will laugh at the comedy, but at the same time, receive the philosophical point subliminally.

Through his study of drama, Eichelberger became aware of the dramaturgical allusions that run through the script. He admires the way Stoppard brings together elements of many other plays, such as Waiting for Godot, Pirandello, and most obviously, Hamlet.

In describing the main characters, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern (played by Carl Pupa and Jeff Daly,) as vehicles for Stoppard's existential message, Eichelberger says, "they are two guys who possess no context for themselves or their lives. They are buffetted about by things they do not understand, and whatever they do, they are locked into the same course."

He explains that several occurences in the play illustrate the main characters' lack of control, but these events are shown to be funny, rather than serious.

For many of the actors in the large cast, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern is their first appearance on the Washington College stage. Eichelberger admits that he was hoping for new actors to attend his auditions. He explains that many good actors graduated this past year and he was anxious to see some talented freshmen at his auditions. He was apparently pleased, and adds, "I expected some good new students, what I got were some great new students."

Eichelberger further compliments his cast by saying, "one of the most pleasant things about this production is that everyone works hard and wants to do well. It shows in their work."

In summing up his preparation for this production, Eichelberger said, "I did a lot of research and I used scenes from it for my directing classes." Unlike some drama majors who direct a small production a year or so before they tackle their senior project, Eichelberger's only practical experience as a director, is his work as Assistant Director of Vinegar Tom, a play produced in his freshman year. He says the experience helped him to look at things from the director's side, but that it would have been nice to do it more recently.

When asked if he felt at a disadvantage, not having directed a production previous to this one, Eichelberger replied, "I think it is good to be thrown in with both feet. I think of the senior project as a test." He added that doing a production before the senior project possibly puts a student at an unfair advantage. He also admitted, "if I had had the chance to do a production before this one, I would have taken it. I am glad I didn't have the chance."

One person who has had the opportunity to practice for his senior project, is Thomas Andrews, Technical Director for Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. Since Camino Real, produced in the fall of 1988, Andrews has acted as Technical Director for all but three plays produced by the drama department and its graduating seniors. His work as Lighting Designer, Set Designer and Technical Director of "Rosencrantz" fulfills Andrews' senior obligation. He explains that he is "not a typical drama major. I do not act." He adds that he will graduate as a drama major based "on my technical qualifications as opposed to directorial qualifications."

Other backstage members of the production include Lisa Woodcock as Assistant Stage-Manager, Deidre Riegel and Jennifer Griffin as Stage Managers, and Tim Madison as Dramaturge.

In closing, he said, "This play is above all, a comedy. It deals with serious things, but it does so in a way that I think is entertaining."

"Rosencrantz" opens next Wednesday night at 8PM. It runs through Friday. Seating is unlimited and reservations are not necessary.

The Fabulous Baker Boys

"Another season...another reason...for makin' whoopee." One cannot help but hum these provocative lyrics sung by Michelle Pfeiffer after viewing the entertaining movie "The Fabulous Baker Boys" written and directed by Steven Kloves.

The movie focuses upon the Baker brothers (both roles portrayed by real life siblings Beau and Jeff Bridges), who are two pianists that have been playing together for fifteen years in the various local dives of their city, such as the Starfire Lounge and the Hoolahau Hideaway. After having their contract terminated from one club and realizing that their meager earnings are just not enough, the pair decide to enliven their performance through the addition of a singer to their act. They hold auditions for potential singers which becomes one of the funnier moments of the movie.

Their final contestant for the job proves to be an unexpected wonder who goes by the dazzling name of Suzi Diamond (played by Michelle Pfieffer): a call girl for an escort service with a voice of pure gold. When she utters the first few notes of "More Than You Know", one is instantly taken aback by the sweet softness and intense sexuality of her voice. She is accepted into the act and tours the local clubs with the brothers, her honeyed voice attracting throngs of listeners and building the reputation of the group.

Soon their schedule involves not only the dilapidated bars but also several extravagant resort hotels. As the film progresses, a love interest develops between Susie (Pfieffer) and the brother Jack (Jeff Bridges). This attraction causes antagonism between the brothers and ultimately destroys their relationship and the group. Susie decides to leave the act because of the friction between the siblings and because of the failed relationship between her and Jack.

It seems ironic that Susie is the one who reaches down and pulls the brothers from their abyss to fame but also sends them down into the same pit. All three really need each other to create the group's survival but, in the end, the conflicts among them are too much and cause the act to fall apart.

Michelle Pfieffer is excellent as Susie Diamond, surging with a sensual electricity that seems to burst onto the screen. She is fantastic as the insecure prostitute, unhappy but only knowing that style of life.

The real protagonist of the film is Jack Baker, portrayed exceptionally by Jeff Bridges, the antithesis of his older counterpart. He is the tragic brother since the life behind the shield begins to crumble around him. He loses Susie, his brother, his friends, and the little dignity and pride he possessed. At the movie's end, he must redeem himself and regain all that he has lost which he does with success.

"The Fabulous Baker Boys" is indeed a superb film. It is rich with fine music and abounds with sensuality, good dialogue, and scattered humor as in the telethon scene and the recurring joke about Frank's hair. Who could forget the most notable and famous scene in which the sultry Susie Diamond slinks across the piano top as she sings "Makin' Whoopee"? What man in his right mind does not envy such a lucky piano?

Jane's Addiction's new habitual ritual

It had been over two years since my last fix but every cell of my body still craved it. Good stuff, the dealer told me as I walked away. Back in the room I carefully unwrapped the goods and prepped myself. I raised my arm and dropped the needle into the black vein of the spinning vinyl and took a 33 1/3 cc. injection of the most divine mind expanding tunes available. I'm speaking of Jane's Addiction and their most recent album, "Ritual de lo Habitual".

I remember buying "Jane's Addiction", the self-titled album, after seeing them open for Love And Rockets. After listening I wondered why Love And Rockets wasn't opening for them. Then came their major label debut, "Nothing's Shocking": an album that the president of Warner Bros. said would warp an entire generation... my sentiments exactly. "Ritual de lo Habitual". the third chapter of Jane's Addiction is guaranteed to leave you confused and have your eyeballs spinning like pinwheels.

"Ritual" kicks in with a slew of tight ditties. "Stop!", the first song and the first single off the album, bites hard at first (I mean it reaches out of the speakers and chomps you), then does a half-gainer and spins down to a lull... then bites you again. For those of you on campus with cable: I've heard that MTV has somehow crammed the video for "Stop!" between a Belinda Carlisle video and a Stridex commercial. This is not how one enjoys Jane's Addiction.

"Ritual de lo Habitual" is a unified crusade into an ethereal state of being. Unbeknownst to the happy folks at MTV, a ritual goes far beyond it's first incantation. Something as sacred as a ceremony cannot be dissected. This album should be played beginning to end.

Oh, you might start to feel something upon hearing a single from a Jane's album but then you are somehow left out when the song is over. After "Stop!" you will hear the bouncy, socially conscious "No One's Leaving", then the amoral "Ain't No Right" and "Obvious". The rising action continues with "Been Caught Stealing"- this song blows doors down and I'm predicting it to be the second single. Not that I ever want it to become a single, it just has the strongest possibilities to stand alone from the album.

Now for the big climax, the most incredible song Jane's Addiction has ever performed. "Three Days", appropriately titled, is a squirming physical conception of flux brought to an infinite exponent. "Three Days" is three songs strung out between instrumentals that all spiral upward to the pinnacle when lead singer Perry Farrell screams, "Erotic Jesus....loves his Marys!" This Scorsesean Last Temptation of censorship is echoed throughout "Ritual".

From the nude sculpture on the album cover (that had to be partially covered by a red satin sheet before Warner would press it), to the parental advisory that blocks even more of the cover art, the mature theme of this work can be seen. Hell, if any kid over eight hasn't heard either of the cuss words on this album or ever seen a nude piece of artwork the poor kid should be let out of his parental shell.

Anyway, the "Ritual" mellows out with the lovely and sentimental "Then She Did..." before the gypsies come out and steal you, take you away and make you slap your own face with "Of Course". The "Ritual" wraps up with an exultation of the band's inspiration... women. "Classic Girl" is a lullaby and a brilliant finish to a brilliant album.

After listening to "Ritual de lo Habitual" you may need a cigarette. You may feel like you let someone you didn't know touch you. You will be completely satisfied. If you need this in your life, if you need a fix- you need Jane's Addiction.

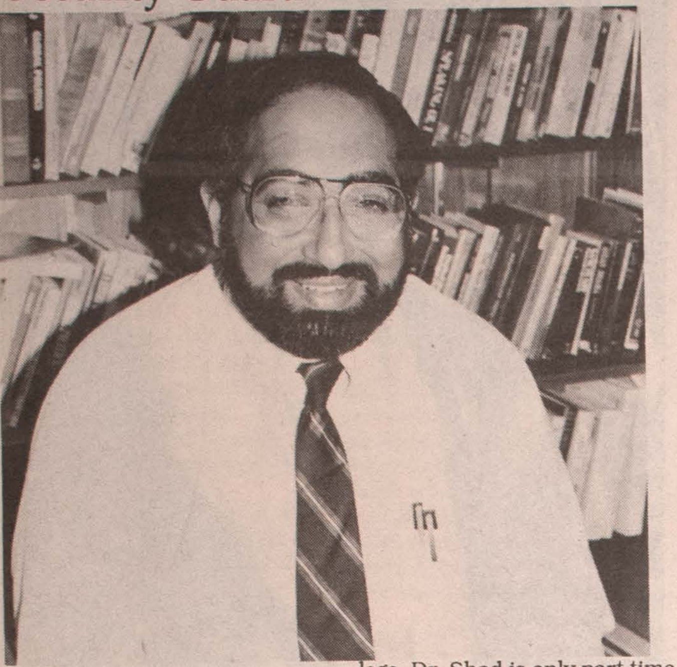
Dr. Shad, former Rolling Stones Security Guard



By: Susie Mazzullo

The Washington College faculty was joined by a number of new professors this year. Among them is Dr. Tahin J. Shad. Not only does Dr. Shad have the credentials to stand up to the standards of Washington College professors but he also has a background that many students who like classic rock and roll would envy.

Dr. Shad is an assistant professor in the study of politics and political science this year. He teaches one of the introductory political science courses offered here at the college. Dr. Shad is only part time this semester but plans to come back to Washington College next semester on a full time basis. Dr. Shad is on a tenure track for a full time position. He is only part time this semester because he currently teaches part time at Wesley College in Dover, Delaware.

Although Dr. Shad has only started his first year here at the college, he has been offerred the position of Director of International Studies. The responsibility of this position includes working in conjunction with Dr. Daniel Premo who is also a professor in the political science area as well as the Department Chair of Political Science and International Studies. Dr. Shad will be in essence, Dr. Premo's assistant.

One of the things that Dr. Shad is currently working on, and that is under consideration by the administration, is the addition of new political science and international studies courses. For example, such courses being considered include a study on the Middle East as well as the Political Economy of Africa.

Dr. Shad, however was not always a professor of political science. Like most of us trying to get through school, Dr. Shad held a number of jobs before he entered into his current career field. One of the most interesting jobs he held was as a security guard for the ever popular rock bands, The Who and The Rolling Stones. Dr. Shad traveled with these bands for approximately a year and a half. Unfortunately at the time he wasn't a great fan of the two bands. "I wasn't into rock and roll at that time. I was more of a raggae fan," he said.

Dr. Shad has lived in many different parts of the world. Among them being Kenya, Africa and London, England. He now resides in Dover, Delaware.

This being Dr. Shad's first year, he hasn't had much time to learn much about the college but has enjoyed his time here so far. "I like the student and the members of the faculty very much. It has been very enjoyable experience," he says.

Security discusses Date Rape

By: Susie Mazzullo

Next Thursday, October 4th, the Security department is holding a panel discussion on date rape. The discussion will be held in the Dunning Hall lecture room at 7:00 pm.

It will consist of an all student panel so that students may have an open discussion with their peers on the subject of date rape and their feelings regarding our campus.

The four student panel members are Samantha Streamer, Deanna Houle, William Brandenburg, and John Kelly.

Representatives from health services, security, student affairs, and the states attorney's office, will be on hand to answer any questions that may arise.

Director of Security, Jerry Roderick, encourages and hopes that everyone will join the discussion. The subject of date rape has become a prime topic of conversation not only on the Washington College campus but all around the nation and it is something that needs to be addressed. "It's unfortunate that that's the kind of world we live in but it is, and we have to do something about it."

Finally, the meeting turned toward the granting of money to the clubs. Brian Gimmelson, SGA Treasurer, then took over the meeting. He stated that twenty seven clubs applied for funding that totaled approximately $17,000. The funds for the various clubs were allocated as follows: Amnesty...$600, Campus Christian Fellowship...$200, Chess Club...$250, Dance...$500, Dumschott Society...$400, French Club...$500, German Club...$500, Historic Preservation Society...$500, International House...$1250, Karate Club...$650, Margaret Horsley Society...$600, Mystic Herald...$300, Newman Club...$200, Phi Sigma Tau...$1000, Psi Chi...$150, Psychology Club...$300, Rugby Club...$1000, Sailing Team...$1400, Society of 12...$300, Spanish Club...$500, Translations...$250, Visual Artists Union...$800, Wac Happennings...$500, and the Young Democrats...$500.

It was made clear during the meeting that the clubs may make other petitions to the SGA for funding during the year and are not just restricted for the money they received here.

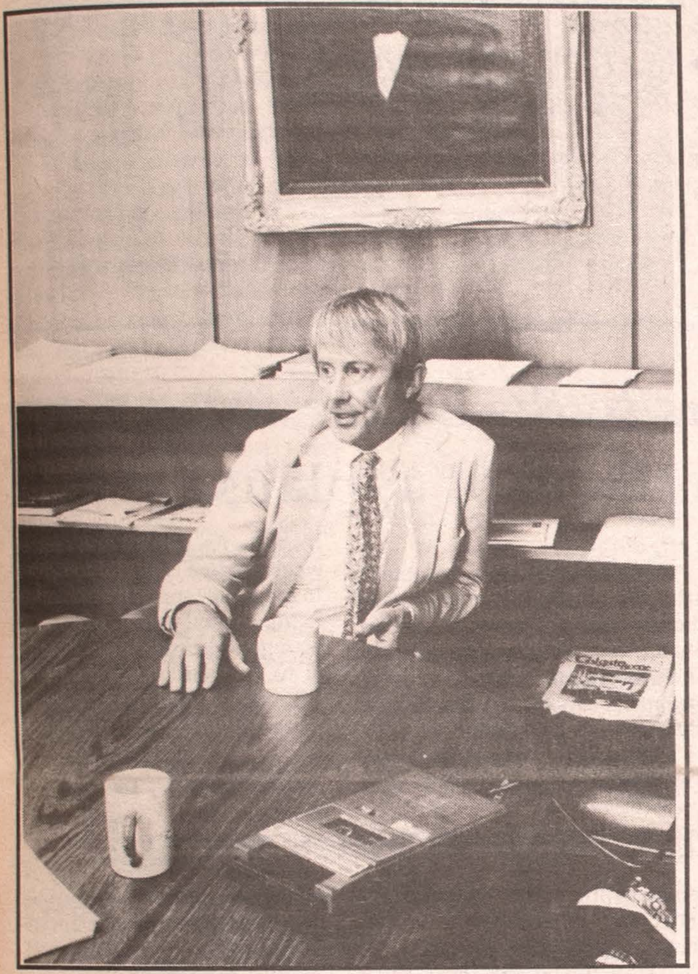
Trout inauguration tomorrow



By Laura Hopper

Charles Hathaway Trout will become Washington College's 24th president in a ceremony on Saturday morning. The inauguration will take place under the elm at 11 A.M. Following the ceremony, the President will address the audience on the role of a liberal arts college in contemporary society.

Trout said he was "moved and touched" by the response news of his inauguration has generated. Delegates from 158 colleges will attend the ceremony as well Governor William Donald Schaefer of Maryland, and United States Senator Paul Sarbanes.

The inauguration will give the College a chance to show off the improvements to the physical plant made during the term of Trout's predecessor, Douglass Cater.

Trout also expressed concern about students attending the inaugural and the other events scheduled throughout the day. He hopes as many students will attend as possible. It is possibly the only time the students will attend an affair of this type, he stressed, and it is for them as well.

Chemistry Professor Frank Creegan will bring greetings from the Washington College faculty and staff to the delegates and audience.

Student Government President Stuart Neiman will bring greetings from the students. According to Neiman, his comments will "address the importance of Charles Trout to the campus and college community."

When asked, on the eve of his inauguration, how he wishes his administration to be remembered by the college community, Trout said he wants to be "remembered as someone who strengthened the sense of community, the sense that those who have touched Washington College and been touched by the College view themselves as an extended family. Someone who preserved the integrity of liberal arts but strengthened them in every conceivable way. For an administration that lifted the vision and aspirations of generations of Washington College students, and put the College in a position to compete for quality faculty and ambitious and interesting students."

Trout came to Washington College from Colgate University where he had been Provost and Dean of the Faculty since 1981. He received his bachelor's degree from Amherst college in 1957, and his doctorate in American history from Columbia University in 1972.

Following the inauguration, there will be a luncheon on the Hodson terrace. At 2:30, President Trout will moderate an American history symposium entitled "The American Century." The Manhattan String Quartet will perform in Tawes theater at 8:00 P.M. and the Black Sheep return to campus for a student-alumni dance on the Library terrace at 10:00P.M.

The William Smith parking lot will be used for delegate parking and therefor closed to students on Saturday. Security asks that any student parked in the lot move their car before Saturday morning, or they will receive a visit from Security asking them to do so.

In case of rain, the inauguration will be held in Cain gymnasium.

SGA deals with cable

By : Kyndra Ponder

Tuesday night's Student Government Association meeting allowed for many important student concerns to be heard and addressed by the SGA as well as the Administration.

The first item on the agenda was to "swear-in" the newly elected Freshman Class Officers. President Lionel Dyson, Vice-President Thomas Solter and Secretary Cindi DeWaters were given the oath of office by SGA Parliamentarian, Gordy Scherer.

After roll call, the major point under New Business was an address by Clint Baer concerning the cable issue. Baer stated that sometime last spring he received a petition from 25 students for Cable Television in the dorms.

The Administration has looked into the idea of having cable installed around campus for both academic and student uses, but the proposition will be very expensive - somewhere between $168,000 and $240,000 to make every room cable-ready. Bear reports that the Administration "won't fund this project directly out of the budget as a priority". That means that the costs - the cheapest prices should be about $40/month - will be passed along to students.

Because of the steep cost of installing the necessary equipment, Baer's office is asking the SGA to determine the overall student opinion about the need of the students for such services and whether there will be enough student interest to justify spending a quarter of a million dollars on cable T.V.

Student reaction to this was mixed. Senior Senator, Susan Spedden said "If I had cable in my room, I'd sit up there and watch T.V. all day and I wouldn't get any studying done." On the other hand, SGA Secretary, Jenny Albers felt that the cable issue is just completely infeasible because of the high costs. Not only would the school have to buy equipment, but a maintenance position would have to be created if cable were installed on campus. As a result, the overall cost to both the school and the students would be paying disproportionately high fees for cable service.

After discussion within the Senate, SGA President Stuart Neiman announced that the first of his polls for the year would deal with the cable television issue. The polls will be distributed next week to all dorm senators and will be very simple to fill out. Student input on this issue is crucial and everyone is encouraged to fill out the survey and return it to your dorm senator as soon as you can. According to Neiman, the polls are being conducted because "We need to narrow our options in terms of what we want down to a list of about three, then what comes back will be official student policy on Cable T.V.".

Baer stated that should students return a favorable response regarding the need for cable on campus, then the time frame to see this implemented would be fairly lengthy, but that it could conceivably be in place next fall. Then he added that he does not believe that it will be easy to pass this through both the student body and the administration.

After Baer's comments, the SGA continued with its business for the evening. SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson reported that an application for $1500 from CRACK Magazine had been received. Because the students involved in the magazine have planned to change the format this year and to distribute it nationally, the costs will be very high - about $12,000. CRACK's editors and the students involved are going to many different offices on campus asking for monetary assistance.

Neiman suggested, because the magazine had such high ambitions for the year, and that since the magazine could lend positive national recognition to the school, that the SGA lend full support to CRACK. He suggested "an investment" of $1750 for the magazine - $250 over what they had asked for from the SGA. The suggestion was voted on and approved by the Senate.

SGA Vice President, Kevin Kelly reported that a Student Academic board meeting was held on Sunday. Only a few subjects - such as the Grade Point Average changes for Junior Year Abroad students, the possible addition of a Physical Education major and making the seminar requirements of the departments more uniform in

There are some events that end up happening once in a lifetime. No, not royal weddings, because there have been two in the past ten years, and there are still marriable princes out there. And since we students have been alive man's walked on the moon more than once, and we've sent a space probe to Mars.

Well, this week's topic should be becoming blatantly apparent. Yes, everyone on campus this weekend should attend the inauguration of President Trout. After all, it's our campus and our college that all these distinguished visitor are coming to, they'll be taking our parking places, and causing a longer than usual line at the WCDS. But aside from the rather minor inconviences this event is sure to cause, the "New Trout on the Block" is our president, and gee, wouldn't it be nice if we all, everyone who is able, turned out to watch him on his big day.

Now, being intelligent and witty people, we've come up with many new and unusual names for our new President--The big fish, New Trout on the Block, Troutsky, etc. But now it's time to put our money where our mouth is and turn out, as nearly en masse as possible to show him that we care. He is, after all, light years away from Douglass Cater, a fine man who we will all remember for the many improvements to the Campus made during his tenure as president.

Whether you approve of the man and his policies or not, now is the time to show some Collegiate solidarity. 11 is not too early to get out of bed, and hey, if its a sunny day, you could even get a tan. But seriously, this is most likely the only chance we students will get to see something like this. Besides, we'll all be listening with anxious ears when Stu Neiman, our esteemed Student Government Association president stands up to offer greetings from the Student Body.

It should make for an interesting day...

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Let's give Stu a round of applause

To the Editor:

Many students will recall the letter I wrote about last year in which I expressed my disappointment over the conduct and manner in which Stuart Neiman behaved as S.G.A. President. I am writing this letter because I would like to say that that "little boy with a big head" seems to be growing up a lot.

You see, for many people, a little bit of power can be a very "heady" thing. So in many ways, Stu's little power trip was normal and understandable. Perhaps I (and many other students) should have been more patient.

After all, he seems to be getting the hang of this "leadership thing." As evidenced by last week's article, Stu is beginning to recognize that a huge part of being a good leader is serving as a good example. When one is in a position of authority, actions, words and even relationships are public domain. A

Humble response to pompous president

To the Editor,

After having read last week's article by our most illustrious mentor of a president. I was fairly disgruntled. Your pretentious lecturing has bored and annoyed your loyal citizens just about enough. You are neither Ayn Rand nor Jack Kerouac and your philosophical streams of consciousness should remain your own. Constructive criticism is effective; condescending arrogance is not.

Death is a terrible thing. Most adults our age have come in contact with death and its consequences and no-one would argue for the constructive properties thereof. I too have had friends die in drug and alcohol related accidents but that does not propel me to devote my life to the perpetual condemnation of alcoholic enjoyment. I respect your decision to lecture during the summer months, but regret to inform you that the summer is over. I am sorry that death has been so close to you recently and understand

The student is just another president

To the Editor,

As I finished Stu Neiman's article "Is the SGA President just another student?" I began to feel very small. All I could think about was the fact that Stu was the president and I wasn't. I began wondering about what other amazing moral dilemmas Stu must face every day and how petty and dull my existence really was. And the most amazing thing about it was that the president actually admitted he was wrong. But then I woke up and, as Stu urged me to do, I saw the true intent of Stu's letter which was the overglorification his position as SGA president.

Stu's article gave us, "the whole school," a glimpse into the workings of the PRESIDENTS mind by investigating the his absentee record. As we join Stu in a step by step analysis of the impact of his absenteeism on the class, the teacher, the student body, and the world in general, we are continually reminded that he is in fact president of the SGA. My point of contention with Stu is that he has misinterpreted his temporary position as president.

Stu seems to be under the false assumption that his position is extra-unique because he has "responsibilities to the whole of the school." However, every person in this school has some type of role which has a responsibility attached to it. I work in a restaurant and as a server of food, I am in a fashion responsible for the whole clientele of the restaurant. 'Joe' lacrosse member is a member a team which at times can be

Student behavior questioned

To the Editor:

In response to this past week's letter to the editor about the stupidity of a few drunk students from the Lambda fraternity, I want to raise some serious questions regarding the immaturity of students who can't hold their liquor, and make a few comments. People at the beginning of this year were extremely concerned about the administration's making Washington College a dry campus. From what I've seen so far this year, this isn't a bad idea. I, for one, do enjoy an occasional drink, but I do not go around abusing the privilege (though illegal, since I am under the age of 21). I do live on campus, and have heard numerous people shouting from out in front of Kent House at 2:00 in the morning before a major test the next day. I missed the Jed Cronin incident unfortunately, but I have had some strange things happen to me this year which really makes me wonder about the so-called "maturity" of students on this campus. Issue: Should smoking be allowed in the Dining Hall?

Smoking is bad for everybody

Julie Greene

Smoking in the cafeteria is not just an annoying habit, it is an unhealthy one for all exposed. There is of course the obvious argument that smoking in general is bad for a person's health and logically should not even be done. Then there is the fact that being around someone smoking is also unhealthy.

But, in the cafeteria there is a non-smoking section so there should not be a problem, right? Wrong. It would be one thing if smokers stayed in the smoking section, but the cafeteria does not even enforce that, so smokers wander freely - not that they should be incarcerated. Frequently I will be trying to enjoy my meal in the non-smoking section when suddenly a haze settles down and I feel a burning sensation in my nostrils. I turn to find a smoker sitting behind me, but holding the cigarette behind her back so as not to offend those she is sitting with at the table. Well, fine she's not offending them, she's offending me. A polite request to diminish the problem results in a huff and a look that says "it's a free world."

I really wish it does not come down to policing the cafeteria non-smoking section for offenders, or totally wiping out smoking in the cafeteria. But, there are some logical reasons supporting these opinions. First, smoke is very mobile and can move beyond any silly boundaries of smoking and non-smoking sections. Second, this mobile monster can travel around the various foods laying out so that they are already contaminated (by the smoke) before we even put it on our plates. Third, and this is extreme, smoking affects expectant mothers, which included one of our dining hall supervisors last year.

One other well known fact is that smoking causes cancer, as well as other health defects. But not everybody knows that people can also get cancer from inhaling second-hand smoke. A few years back one of my friends' mother contracted the smoker's cancer and she has never smoked. It certainly made me think twice about all the smokers around me, not just in school, but other places more public. Think of the smell of a person's sweater after being around only one smoker and for no more than an hour. It stinks, and I am not just talking about the smell.

But, to get back to the current issue, how should the smoking problem in the cafeteria be solved. Again, I would not recommend totally banishing smoking from the cafeteria, at least not immediately. More gradual steps should be taken. Dining services could start with making students more aware of the fact that there are in fact sections designated for smokers and for non-smokers. When you are hungry and in a hurry it is hard to see a little sign that says "no smoking." Granted there are those of us who are aware and ignore the signs. People should be more courteous to those around them. Smokers are probably upset about the possibility of not being able to smoke in the cafeteria. Try to see from the other person's perspective, I don't want to be eating a healthy salad while coughing on someone's cigarette smoke. Nonsmokers should try to see the smoker's point of view. What about freedom and pursuit of happiness? Well, if killing yourself slowly appeals to you, go for it! But don't take everyone else with you.

If a greater awareness and a few warnings do not accomplish much, then perhaps dining services should maker a bolder statement. Maybe turning one of the smoking sections into a non-smoking section. I have not taken a personal poll of the campus, but the general opinion is that nonsmokers are in the majority so this move would make sense. Given a period of adjustment if things still don't work out, maybe the cafeteria will ban all smoking. If you look at that way putting out an occasional cigarette when sitting in the non-smoking section or just sitting in the smoking section doesn't look all that bad.

No, not really, it affects so many people around you and there are so many other places you can smoke. Smoking is especially disturbing when you are eating and also for people with allergies.

The choice is yours

Suzie Mazzullo

Should smoking be allowed in the dining hall? If it were up to me, my answer would be a definite no. However, I do realize that my opinion isn't the same as everyone else's and that I can't always have what I want.

How many people do you know that smoke? Don't bother to count not because if we took the time I would never get a chance to finish this essay. Whether you choose to smoke or not is of no concern to me but when I begin to tell you of some of the unavoidable consequences of this maybe you will think about what you're doing next time you pick up a cigarette.

Maybe at this time in your life the effects aren't so obvious to you but later in life when you are having trouble breathing, and the doctor tells you that the pain in your chest is lung cancer, memories of this warning will come back to you.

You are probobly saying that this will never happen to you and I'm sure my parents thought the same thing too. Have you ever watched someone close to you die of cancer and watch the spirit of life drain from their eyes? For months I watched my mother go from home to the hospital repeatedly, all the while shrinking before my very eyes. There was nothing I could do except hold her hand and try to give her the hope that we both knew was a lie. A year later, I went through the same thing with my father. The last words that my mother spoke to me before she died were, "Please don't ever smoke." I don't know about you but that convinced me.

Maybe these long term affects are too much to handle right now. So, if your health doesn't concern you, maybe the subject of money will. Just once you should take the time to calculate how much money you spend on cigarettes in just one month.

As I have said before the decision to smoke is entirely up to you but not I hope you see that the choice is as easy as choosing between life and death. I hope you make the right decision!

Trout to moderate symposium "The American Century"

By Suzie Mazzullo

President Trout will moderate a history symposium at 2:30pm in the Tawes Theatre of the Gibson Fine Arts Center on Saturday afternoon. A symposium is when those who are knowledgeable in a particular field get together to discuss and debate about a particular issue. The Symposium to be held on Saturday is titled "The American Century" and in keeping with the definition, will host participants who are leading scholars in their fields.

Historians that will take part include, William E. Leuchtenburg, the William P. Kenan Professor of History at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill; William H. Chafe, the Alice Mary Baldwin Professor of History at Duke University; Regina Morantz Sanchez, a professor of history at the University of California at Los Angeles; W. Robert Fallaw, Chair of the History Department here at Washington College; and Jonathan Sarris who is from the Office of the Governor of the State of Maryland. W. Robert Fallaw and Jonathan Sarris will be the respondents.

Dr. Leuchtenburg is a leading historian of this century and is also one of the most respected. As well as being a member of the faculty at the University of North Carolina, he has authored and co-authored a number of books and has also served as a historical consultant on a number of projects. One such project of extreme magnitude was his assistance on the recent PBS series for television, "The Civil War."

Dr. Leuchtenburg has taught at a number of prestigious universities and colleges. Among these are New York University, Smith College, Harvard University, Columbia University and finally the University of North Carolina where he is currently on the staff.

His work as an author of historical books has won him many awards as well as added to his reputation as a respected historian. His book, Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal was the winner of the Francis Parkman Prize and the Bancroft Prize in 1964. Other examples of his work include, The Perils of Prosperity, New Deal and Global War, and The Great Age of Change. He is also co-author, editor, and contributor to over twenty volumes.

Because of his outstanding work in the study of history, Dr. Leuchtenburg, has been awarded Fellowships at the Center for Advanced Study in Behavioral Sciences, the National Endowment for the Humanities, The Mellon Foundation, The Guggenheim Foundation, Queen's College of Oxford University, and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Dr. William Henry Chafe will also serve as a member of the symposium. Dr. Chafe is leading in the study of the history of American women and in the study of the history of the American south. At Duke University, he has held the positions of Co-Director of the Center for the Study of Civil Rights and Race Relations, Director of the Duke-UNC women's Studies Research Center, and the position of Senior Research Associate at the Center for Documentary Studies.

Dr. Chafe has also authored many books that have won him a number of awards. Among these works are The American Woman: Her Changing Social, Political, and Economic Roles 1920-1970, Women and Equality: Changing Patterns in American Culture, and Civilities and Civil Rights: Greensboro, North Carolina and the Black Struggle for Freedom. This last work won the Robert F. Kennedy Book Award in 1981. His latest award for his work was the 1989-90 John Simon Guggenheim Fellowship.

The woman member of the symposium is Regina Morantz-Sanchez. Her special area of interest is in the study of the history of American women as well as in the history of women and medical practice in the 19th and 20th centuries.

She is the author of a number of books and magazine articles including "Women in the Medical Profession: Why were There So Few?" in American History magazine, "Making Women Modern: Middle Class Women and Health Reform in 19th Century America" in the Journal of Social History, and "Professionalism, Feminism, and Gender Roles: A Comparative Study of Nineteenth-Century Medical Therapeutics" in the Journal of American History.

Our own professor of history here at Washington College, Dr Robert Fallaw, will also be participating in the symposium. Dr. Fallaw earned his master's degree and also his Ph.D. at Princeton University. While he was there he won the Rollins Fellowship in American History.

He served on the faculty of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill for ten years before coming to Washington College in 1970. His current position is the Chair of the Department of History and is researching British-American Intellectual Relation after the American Revolution, 1783-1820.

Dr. Fallaw has had a number of publications. Recent ones include "The Old Dominion Under Fire: The Chesapeake Invasions, 1779-1781" in Chesapeake Bay in the American Revolution, and "Mahlon Dickerson, Jacksonian Democrat" in The Governors of New Jersey.

The last member of the symposium is a recent magna cum laude graduate of Washington College. Jonathan Dean Sarris graduated in 1989 and was awarded the Arthur A. Knapp Memorial Prize in History. This award is awarded to the graduating history major who has displayed unusual interest, enthusiasm, and ability in the field of history. Currently, Mr. Sarris is the Programs Assistant for Education in the Office of Governor William Donald Schaefer.

All are welcome and students are encouraged to attend the symposium.

Inauguration brings distinguished visitors

By Suzie Mazzulo

Approximately 158 delegates from that many universities and colleges will be attending the Inauguration of President Charles H. Trout this weekend.

The delegates are scheduled to arrive on Saturday morning between 9:00 and 10:30am. Registration for the delegates will be held on the first floor of the Decker Science Center and members of the college staff will be on duty to assist them. Two rooms in the building are being reserved for the delegates to check their personal belongings and then to robe before the inauguration ceremonies. Ermon Foster, the College Marshall, and Lucille Sansing and Jack Hamilton, the Assistant Marshals, will be on hand to assist and give additional instructions.

Following the ceremony, there will be a luncheon on the College Plaza in front of the Gibson Fine Arts Center, or in the Hodson Hall in case of rain.

A number of members of the Washington College faculty and staff will be on hand to represent their various alma maters. Included in this are Colin Dickson, Associate Professor of French; Paul Bishop, Director of the Computing Center; Barbara Heck, Director of Corporate and Foundation Relations; Kathleen Mills, Associate Professor of Music; James D. Holmes, Associate Director of Admissions; Clint Baer, Director of Planning; Elizabeth Baer, Provost; Rosemary H. Ford, Assistant Director of Biology; Edward Maxcy, Associate Dean of Students; Nathan Smith, Professor of History; Richard L. Gillin, Professor of English; Kevin Coveney, Vice President for Admissions and Enrollment Management; Sherry Magill, Vice President and Deputy to the President; Nancy R. Tatum, Ernest A. Howard Professor of English; Thomas J. Cousineau, Associate Professor of English; Beverly Wolff Young, Visiting Assistant Professor of English; and Garry E. Clarke, Chair of the Music Department.

Other delegates that plan to participate in this weekend's activities include: Adelphi University President, Peter Diamandopoulos; American University Director of Alumni Relations, Janet L. Chitwood; Bard College Dean, Stuart Levine; Capitol College President, G. William Troxler; Catonsville Community College President, Frederick J. Walsh; Chesapeake College Executive Vice President, Stuart M. Bounds; Colgate University President, Neil R. Grabois and their Dean, M. Lee Pelton; the College of Notre Dame of Maryland President, Kathleen Feeley; Dickinson College Assistant Director of Development, Melissa N. Combes; Gettysburg College Trustee, Margaret Blanchard Curtis; Hood College Vice President for Development and College Relations, Bruce E. Bigelow; Illinois Wesleyan University President, Minor Myers, Jr.; Lafayette College Dean of Academic Services, Alan W. Construction workers cause weekend flood

By: Laura Hopper

Some Washington College students received an unpleasant shock this weekend when they found themselves without water. The incident occurred outside of Worcester on Saturday afternoon when a construction worker driving a bulldozer struck a buried water main. Water pressure dropped, leaving the students in the Cullen dorms without showers, toilets, drinking fountains, washing machines and sinks for nearly five hours.

The initial reaction of the students was shock, followed by anger. Junior economics major Julie Greene said, "this reminds me of my experiences in Leningrad, except there I could take a shower."

The college responded quickly, and, with the help of local authorities, was able to repair the leak and restore water to the affected dormitories within a few hours. Sandra McCelland, RA for the second floor of Worcester, had nothing but praise for the way the college handled a difficult situation.

One of the construction workers at the scene told a student the plan of the area supplied by the College showed the pipe buried deeper than it was in actuality. This is the third time during the construction of the Kent-Hodson-Cullen access road that an incident of this nature has occurred. Twice earlier this semester construction workers cut through college phone and computer network lines.

Junior Michelle Beattie summed up the situation as "just another part in the unique Washington College experience."

The guilty bulldozer rests atop the broken pipe. The pipe was repaired by the end of the day, to the joy of the affected students.

SGA Secretary Jenny Albers reminded all senators that they are required to post all minutes in the dorms so that all students can see them.

Off-Campus senator, Cynthia Fields-Bélanger asked about the new phone system, stating that it can be very trying for off campus students, or anyone calling an on-campus extension after the switchboard closes at 4:30 in the afternoon because not everyone knows the extension number that they are trying to reach. Gordy Scherer will head a committee to look into improving the current system.

The mere suggestion that the SGA is anything but "just another student" is appalling. Since when does the SGA president posses divine power? Might I remind you that past presidents have overcome your apparent dilemma without the assistance of cigars and a jacket and tie. As a matter of fact a few were quite successful with the assistance of the substances you so readily condemn.

Finally a note for those of you left bewildered by the almighty's admission of mortality. Can it be true...Stu Neiman is a mortal being. Mount Olympus must have been a bit too cramped to allow room for a certain elated part of his anatomy. Do not become frazzled, women, I am referring to his head.

Calm down Stu, be twenty years old for once in your life; it can be extremely enjoyable.

Quartet comes to campus

The inauguration celebration for President Trout will include evening entertainment for the visiting delegates and guests as well as Washington College faculty and students.

The main event of the evening is the performance by the Manhattan String Quartet. The quartet is celebrating its 21st season and will be performing on Saturday evening at 8:00pm in the Tawes Theatre of the Gibson Fine Arts Center.

Planned selections for the concert include some from Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Dimitri Shostakovich, and Ludwig van Beethoven.

The gifted performers of this quartet include Eric Lewis and Roy Lewis who play the violin, John Dexter on the viola, and Judith Glyde on the cello.

All are encouraged to attend this event.

Yosemite at 100, can the park survive?

By DON VETTER

Yosemite National Park enters its second century next month, but the celebration is colored with an overriding question: In the next 100 years, can the Sierra Nevada treasure be saved from its own popularity?

About 3.4 million visitors visit the grand expanse every year, which puts enormous pressure on Abraham Lincoln's mandate to "conserve the scenery and the natural and historical objects and the wildlife therein, and to provide for (their) enjoyment ... for all future generations."

Most of the dispute concerns the 7-square-mile Yosemite Valley, a temple of natural wonder with few rivals, offering everything from the delicacy of a mountain meadow to the grand view of El Capitan, a granite monolith that rises more than 3,000 feet above the valley floor.

But each summer evening, the valley becomes one of the nation's most densely packed cities, with 12,000 overnight guests bringing cars and campfires and the need for shelter, sewer systems, drinking water, police protection and food.

But the "marvelous wonderland" of John Muir – the Sierra Club founder who lobbied for the park's protection – is still there, in the gentle rainbow mists of Nevada Falls, an early morning walk through a meadow or an evening swim in the Merced River.

Marion Knight, camping with her husband and father-in-law at North Pines in Yosemite Valley, says, "Once you've been to Yosemite, you know that it has to be protected for future generations. There is something about Yosemite that is good for the soul. It's important that we have this and preserve this."

But the park is not wearing well. Many high country hikers find trails have become foot-deep grooves of sand. Several times a year, air quality in the valley falls below state health standards.

The park experience of yesteryear is further eroded because of the cut in the National Park Service budget.

Park Ranger Cherry Payne is coordinating Yosemite's centennial plans for a low-key affair. There is no need to attract more visitors to the valley.

"There is this perception, right or wrong, that Yosemite is very crowded and busy," Payne says. "But it is very easy to get away, to find a quiet place ... when everything clicks together and there is the phenomenal harmony between me and the world around me. I find those moments in Yosemite."

In 1980, the National Park Service completed a general management plan for Yosemite with the help of more than 5,000 public comments.

The plan, the park service's third attempt, took five years. The proposals would cost a little more than $145 million. Yosemite's annual budget is $13.8 million.

"Ten years have passed, and very few of the large-ticket items have been done yet," says Don Fox, a park service planner and landscape architect. "The things that are identified to make this more of a park-like experience are really a long way off. De-emphasizing the automobile and looking at satellite parking lots for day users – next to none of that has happened.

"Basically, all we have done is say that we don't know how to solve the problem. I guess that's a step in the right direction."

The Sierra Club and organizations such as The Wilderness Society say many of the problems have been at least aggravated by the park's major concessionaire, The Yosemite Park and Curry Co.

Once a mom-and-pop hotel operation that began in 1899, the company teetered near bankruptcy in the late 1960s. After the company changed hands twice, the entertainment conglomerate Music Corporation of America bought the concession in 1973.

John Poimiroo, vice president of communications for Yosemite Park and Curry Co., says the corporation is a victim of a "smear campaign."

"We see ourselves as the hotel division of the park," Poimiroo says. "We are in a partnership relationship with the park service. A lot of people have criticized that relationship because they feel that it is inappropriate to be a private company in a public arena."

The company cites the observations of former Sierra Club Chairman and environmentalist David Brower, who wrote in the Los Angeles Times that Yosemite is better managed today than it was 20 years ago.

MCA has operated an award-winning recycling program since 1975. It runs the valley's shuttle bus service and has removed several buildings.

What probably irks critics most is the franchise fees MCA pays to the park service for its monopoly on the hotel and food services – three-quarters of 1 percent of gross receipts. Last year, MCA paid $635,772 in fees while reaping more than $78 million in profits, the park service says.

MCA is "dragging its feet over relocating employee housing, and it continues to detract from the natural experience with too many commercial ventures," says Stephen Whitney, director of the national parks program for The Wilderness Society.

"For MCA, Yosemite is a cash cow; they are making megabucks in just one national park," says Barbara Boyle, the Sierra Club's Northern California-Nevada representative. "There is no reason why the money shouldn't be going back to the park."

responsible for generating the excitement of the whole school. 'Dan' the maintenance man, is responsible for keeping a certain aspect of the whole campus life running efficiently. In Stu's article he so bravely admits to being extra guilty of missing classes because he is the president. However this is a clear misinterpretation of his duties. Is 'Dan' extra guilty for breaking a light bulb because of his responsibility to fix things? By over-playing his responsibilities as president, he is indirectly down-playing our as students. Are we any less guilty of cutting class because we aren't presidents?

Furthermore, while some roles are more visible than others, the person defines the role, the role does not define the person. Stu stated that "the President of Student Government must be a student first." But that is about as ridiculous as saying a waiter must be a man first. Stu, whether he wants to admit it or not, is a student. He holds a position, just as I hold a position, or a lacrosse player or maintenance man does. The importance of any position depends on the situation. The fact that 'Dan' is the maintenance man, when one wants their light bulb fixed, is just as important as the fact that Stu Neiman is president, when one wants SGA funding.

In the world: Germany reunifies

United States

In a 96 to 3 vote, the Senate approved a resolution supporting President Bush's deployment of United States military forces to the Persian Gulf. The Senators left open, however, the question of their continued backing if the President sends U.S. troops into battle without provocation.

The United States is expected to call on other major industrialized democracies to ready their strategic oil reserves for use to slow the rise in oil prices. The US plan will be proposed at a meeting of the Paris-based International Energy Agency. The plan is expected to meet opposition from West Germany and Japan. This meeting is widely viewed as one of the most important gatherings since the twenty-one-nation organization was conceived in 1973 to shield Western economies from oil price shocks.

For unknown reasons, death rates from asthma among American children and young adults have been increasing steeply since the late 1970s, according to a recently published study in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Soviet Union

Moscow has urged the United States to join the Soviet Union in resolving the Persian Gulf under a United Nations' umbrella. Soviet military chief, General Mikhail A. Moiseyev fears a military conflict in the Gulf would ally Iran and Iraq and escalate into a world war. He believes that together the United States and the Soviet Union would possess the necessary "political means" to bring about a peaceful settlement.

General Moiseyev is on a week long visit to Washington D.C. in order to address a number of issues facing the Soviet military. He has used a portion of his visit to provide the United States Embassy with technical information regarding Soviet-made weapons used by the Iraqi Army.

Germany

October 3, 1990 "At the stroke of midnight, a massive German flag-now the only German flag-rose where the Berlin Wall stood only months ago." In a moment no one dared imagine a year ago, East Germany ceased to exist. The quest for German unity stood fulfilled. The unification of the two countries was celebrated throughout the now united Germany. The simple uniting of the Germanies, however, will not solve all of the problems in the East, economic, political, and otherwise. Unification will cause its own battery of complications. The road ahead of Germany is not an easy one, but she is on her way!

With the unification of Germany, allied control of Berlin ended; control of the city returned to the Germans. The three allies, the United States, Great Britain, and France, met one last time to sign the document relinquishing their control of the once divided city. The Soviet Union, keeping in line with its tradition since its walkout, did not attend the ceremony. They did, however, acknowledge the withdrawal.

Great Britain

Great Britain and Iran have resumed full diplomatic relations, severed by Teheran eighteen months ago over the Salman Rushdie affair. The decision brings the Iranian government closer to the West and kindles new hopes for release of Western hostages in Lebanon. Both Great Britain and Iran announced that the embassies would reopen in their respective capitals within a month.

Japan

The Prime Minister of Japan, Toshiki Kaifu unveiled draft legislation this week that could allow Japan to send noncombat military personnel to the Persian Gulf. Prime Minister Kaifu stressed that Japan would never re-emerge as a military power. Prime Minister Kaifu simply wishes, through his legislation, to enable Japan to cooperate with the United Nations to contribute to peace in the Persian Gulf and around the world, a practice previously foreign to the nation.

The flu season cometh

By SHERRY JACOBSON

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

WASHINGTON – What killed an estimated 57,000 Americans last year, sent as many as 50 million home sick and could have been prevented with one little shot?

If you answered "the flu," then you probably remember what happened last winter.

Public health officials, who certainly have not forgotten last year's pandemic of A-Shanghai flu, launched their annual flu vaccination campaign this week on a cautionary note.

"Every flu season is different," said Susan Good, nurse epidemiologist who coordinates the flu surveillance program for the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta.

"We can't promise it won't be as bad as last year," she said. "We can only hope that people who are at high risk for flu complications will get vaccinated."

Those needing special protection are adults and children with chronic heart and lung diseases, people over 65, those with AIDS or other immune system disorders and medical workers who come into contact with all these groups.

Flu is of greatest threat to these people because their already-weakened immune systems make it easier for life-threatening pneumonia to develop.

Since 1979, influenza and pneumonia have been ranked as the sixth leading cause of death in the United States, behind heart disease, cancer, stroke, accidents and chronic pulmonary diseases. In a normal year, about 20,000 people die from flu-related illnesses, most of them elderly, according to the disease center.

A flu vaccine is up to 75 percent effective in preventing complications and death in older people. A survey of Medicare beneficiaries, however, found that only 43 percent had received flu vaccinations two years ago. Federal officials hope to vaccinate at least 60 percent of the elderly in 1990.

"The ideal time to get vaccinated is before influenza enters the community, so you can build up antibodies," Good said. Flu cases generally begin appearing in late November and peak in January and February before subsiding in early spring.

Health officials say they can't be certain what kind of flu

See FLU, pg 16.

Warding off the flu

Public health officials are urging flu vaccinations for millions of Americans with a higher-than-normal risk of getting the disease. Among those groups:

- People over 65.
- People of any age with any chronic disease, especially asthma, emphysema, diabetes, kidney disease, AIDS or anemia.
- Anyone taking drugs to suppress their immune system, such as organ transplant recipients.
- Residents of nursing homes.
- Health care workers, especially those in hospitals and nursing homes.

The Washington College graduate program

By David Searles

Many Washington College students may not realize it, but Washington College has a graduate program. The program offers a master of arts in three areas - English, History-Social Studies, and Psychology, as well as some graduate education courses.

There are 98 students in the graduate program for Fall 1990. There are 15 students in English, 19 in History-Social Studies, and 45 in Psychology. There are an additional 19 students enrolled in the graduate program.

In each area, there usually are two courses offered each semester and one course during the summer session. All courses are three credits each. A total of 30 credits are required for graduation. Transfer students are excepted. Most classes are offered in the evenings, and are two and a half to three hours in length.

The goal of the program, as stated in the graduate catalog, is that "the Graduate Program is designed to meet the needs of persons in the community who wish to pursue their formal education in selected areas beyond the baccalaureate degree." Not all students are from the area though. An example of this is that one student in History-Social Studies came from Wisconsin, and another from Garrett County, MD (western end of the state).

The director of the Graduate Studies Program is Dr. George R. Shivers. Professors participating in the program this semester include Cousineau and Tatum in English, Fallow and Striner in History-Social Studies, and Browning, Spilich, and Tubman in Psychology.

A survey was conducted to find out more about the graduate students and their interests. Questions included where they are from, if they are first year or continuing students, if they had any interest in campus activities, and whether they believed they should be represented in the SGA and on the Graduate Academic Council. The results were, from about 30 graduate students surveyed, included the fact that about one-third were interested in campus activities and over two-thirds felt they should be represented in the SGA and on the Graduate Academic Council.

At the present time, according to Dr. Shivers, there are no plans for any changes in the Graduate Studies Program.

The state of the college in the year 2090

Phil "Slice" Macek

There I was in Dr. Scout's "Organizational Behavior" class trying to stay awake. However interesting the lecture on effective communication channels within organizations seemed, I soon closed my eyes and took a little trip to dream land. In my dream I was delivered one hundred years into the future and was deposited on the campus of Washington College in the year 2090. You will scarcely believe the changes this school will go through in the upcoming century.

First off, Stu Neiman is now the president of the school. After graduation, Stu had no decisive career plans, so he tried his hand at various odd jobs. He went down to Florida to try his luck at alligator wrestling, but that venture turned out unsuccessfully. Next, Stu joined a biker gang called "The Virile Vikings Who Don't Wear Condoms" and spent his days raping and pillaging small towns in Arizona and New Mexico. Finally, Stu cleaned himself up and began working for a technological research firm in Chicago. It was in the midst of Stu's failed attempt to market his new invention, waterproof tea bags, that Stu got the call from Washington College. Apparently, Doug Cater, was back in town vying for a return to his presidency. He was running on the platform that his Master Plan was still incomplete and that he deserved a chance to see his visions through to fruition. However, Stu got the nod when it was discovered that Doug's Master Plan called for the construction of the "Douglass Cater Memorial Gambling Casino" in the basement of Minta Martin. Stu, recalling his days of power when he served as president of the S.G.A., immediately declared Chestertown a separate nation state that would be ruled as a dictatorship. Stu quickly set up military forces and subsequently invaded and conquered Pennsylvania the next day.

However, there are further changes that need to be discussed. Initially, Spike is the head of the all-new, kicking ass and taking names Security Department that calls itself, "The Gestapo of Washington College." Spike took the helm after serving a two year stint as head of the F.B.I. In those two years, almost singlehandedly, Spike put a stop to all drug use in this country, hunted down every criminal that has ever appeared on "America's Most Wanted," dated and married Kim Bassinger, won a Wimbledon title (beating Boris Becker in a tough five set match,) made a hit rap record with L.L. Cool J called, "Yo' Mama's Thighs Slap When She Walks," put an end to world hunger, won the Tour De France, and was voted Time's man of the year in 2088.

The new (to us) Academic Resource center is still not open, although President Stu has declared that the ribbon cutting ceremony announcing the building's official opening should occur within the next five years. Tuition is now $18 billion per year, but Washington College still ranks as a "best buy" in the New York Times assessment of college costs.

Furthermore, every year since their win one hundred years ago in 1990, the Lambdas have successfully defended their title as winners of the loving cup. The one hundred year winning streak is believed to be some kind of national record.

All Dining Hall food is now freeze dried and served in powdered form. Last night's meal was a powdered chicken gorilla sandwich covered with powdered barbecue sauce. Even the drinks are powdered, as is the traditional "make your own sundae" bar. In spite of all this, the Dining Hall is still award winning and getting better.

The statue of George Washington has been moved into President Stu's own brainchild, "The Washington College Garden of Greatness." This plot of land, adjacent to Bunting Hall, now serves as home to the statues of Washington College's truly elite figure heads who have helped shape the character of the school in the past. There are, besides George, statues of Clint Baer, Doug Cater, Libby Cater, Ed DeWaters, and Jim Sobczak. Rumors have it that the statue of Stu Neiman is almost complete, but more bronze will be needed to finish the Havana cigar that will be placed in Stu's left hand.

Despite all the changes that Washington College will go through in the next century, it is essentially the same place we have grown to love. The Elm still dominates the campus landscape, there is still no lighting for night time walkers' security, Coffee House parties are still lame, people still go home for the weekends, and "caps' is still the favorite drinking game around campus. However, one should know that Newt's drafts are now $2.00 each on Wednesdays, the Sophie Kerr prize has lost its prestige because no winners have become famous and is now only worth $1.38 per year, Kent House has been deemed an architect's nightmare and is now being torn down, and there is still no possibility for getting cable T.V.

It was at this point that I awoke from my dream. Dr. Scout was now talking about successful methods of motivating employees and for some strange reason I found myself getting sleepy again. Hell, with all the sleeping I do maybe I'll dream about getting an "A" in this class.

Amy on student apathy

Amy Tiehel

Washington College offers its students many unique opportunities. With an outstanding academic reputation, extremely competitive athletic teams, and an extensive array of extracurricular activities the college combines the best of many worlds. Movies, lectures. plays, concerts, and the Sophie Kerr committee offer educational as well as cultural entertainment. However, instead of taking full advantage of these excellent opportunities, many Washington College students choose to sit in their rooms and criticize the lack of "things to do around here." It is my feeling that we, the students of Washington College, are suffering from what I like to call lack of "school spirit." I am not just talking about athletic "rah-rah" school spirit. I am talking about the apathetic attitude many students have towards Washington College in general.

First we must ask ourselves, why are we here? Some people came because it was their first choice and they knew Washington College was an excellent place to get an education. Others came because it was the only place they got into, or their parents pressured them into coming. Other reasons may include: convenience of location, the classes that are offered here, the chance to play athletics or some of these combined. Whatever the reason, we are here, so why not make the most of it? Sure, there may be a lot of policies here that we do not all agree with. However, I feel that we have an excellent school.

Academically speaking, Washington College has an extremely respected reputation. Those people who choose to go to class will find why this is true. Having eight to fifteen papers to write in a semester may be a drag, but that is why we are here. just think, when you have finished you may have learned something.

When it comes to athletics, Washington College can boast some truly fine teams. But how could anyone know that? They never go to the games. Our tennis, basketball, and lacrosse teams are ranked in the top three in the nation for Division III, but I don't think that we'll be setting any fan attendance records.

The cultural diversions here are endless. Our drama department puts on excellent plays. Every weekend the Film Series offers a different movie in Norman James theatre. The literary house's Monday Series brings various speakers to campus, as does the Sophie Kerr Committee. The International House occasionally provides open forum discussions for students to learn and discuss what is going on in the world around us. Renowned musicians play in Tawes Theatre, brought to us by the concert series. Many of these are offered throughout the week. In one week there may be something offered every night. Unfortunately, when these are available only on Friday nights many people easily find other sources of entertainment.

I am aware that perhaps this is too cynical an attitude, because there are plenty of people here on campus who are involved in more ways than one. There are changes taking place that will make Washington College better than it already is. Many of these changes were initiated by students themselves. However, there are always those who will criticize. I have found that the students who criticize the most are the ones who spend the most amount of time doing nothing but watching the tube.

If we are to make the most of our college years, we must take advantage of what we have right here in front of us. There may be other schools that seem so much better, but you can bet that the students who attend them have just as many complaints. So, instead of sitting around criticizing, we should get involved with our school and enjoy it while we are still here. We may actually start to like being here! Washington College is an excellent school in more ways than one and it's up to us, the students, to make it even better.

course of about twenty minutes this past weekend, a guy showed his groin to a friend of mine and myself (of course, this raises some serious questions about his sexual preferences since I am male) and made some disgusting suggestions. Then this "man" threw a full can of Budweiser Beer at us. Luckily he missed, because the only target he had was our heads. While riding behind Bill Smith Hall looking for security, yet another beer can whizzed by my head launched by a different person. Well, needless to say, I filed some complaints with security afterwards. However, this still raises questions. Do Washington College students know when enough is enough?

Everyone wonders why countries in Europe do not have liquor laws as strict as those of the United States. Sure, some laws exist abroad, but these laws aren't really necessary nor are they strictly enforced. People in Europe tend to drink more responsibly than do people in the U.S.. United States citizens, in particular college students, can't drink without getting drunk. The point of drinking to college students is to get completely wasted. Yeah, I lived in Kent my freshman year, but we didn't have a table thrown through the lounge window in the first week of

The Goddess, a challange to conventional religions

By DEIRDRE DONAHUE

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

Look out, patriarchal religions. There's a new kid on the spirituality block.

The Goddess.

She appears in a multitude of manifestations — ripe, womanly manifestations with fat bellies and heavy breasts. The kind that bring to mind babies. And birth. And cycles.

Both men and women are flocking to goddess images, drawn by their gentle messages of healing the planet and holistic harmony for all.

Call it the latest ripple in the new age pond. Or a hybrid between feminism and nature worship. Or women in traditional religions trying to give a female aspect to that Michelangelo stereotype of a big bearded white guy in the sky.

For San Francisco bookstore owner Linda Lywandowsky, "It's an attunement with what's natural, with what's inside you...We're all the goddess."

That's why you can't just go out and buy the official catechism for goddess worship. A major feature of goddess veneration is the very absence of dogma, clergy or structure.

"It's a big jigsaw," says Merlin Stone, author of When God Was a Woman.

Published in 1976, her book was among the first to offer historical alternatives to the patriarchy. Stone believes this is a global movement with "hundreds of thousands of followers" in Europe and Latin America as well.

Stone says the term "goddess worship" offers a virtual smorgasbord of spiritual interests ranging from American Indian beliefs to African female deities to Wicca rituals. The Old English word for witch, Wicca refers to the pre-Christian traditions of "the craft," as practiced by good witches and wizards.

One of the earliest — and most popular — goddesses is Gaia from Greek mythology. She was the goddess of the earth who mated with her son Uranus to produce the Titans.

Just a moment: Gaia?

Why are modern women — armed with their careers, microwaves and cellular phones — hobnobbing with a deity who pre-dates Aphrodite and Zeus?

"There's a real desire to imbue one's personal life with meaning," observes Bantam Books executive editor Leslie Meredith, who has worked on a number of Gaia-related books. She notes that many prefer the term "goddess revering to goddess worship." Idolatry is not the point. "People are re-creating their own traditions (relating) to the Earth, to each other, to the community."

Stone emphasizes this idea of community, particularly for women. They will gather to mark the significance of someone's menopause or divorce or milestone in the life cycle. A Wicca group might "gather in a grove of trees to mark the winter solstice." Or Jewish women might share a mikvah (a purifying bath) before a wedding.

Mainstream feminists sometimes focused "on equal wages," Stone says, ignoring women's "nurturing, the compassion."

That kind of dualist thinking — mind or body, good or bad, scientist or artist, masculine or feminine but never a mixture — is a major problem with our culture, says writer/performer Donna Wilshire.

By contrast, the goddess offers a model of "inclusiveness," — light and dark — rather than exclusiveness. Just as a pregnant woman contains another human being, the goddess embodies "the theme of wholeness."

Many believers draw on the work of respected UCLA archaeolgist Marija

Gimbutas. She theorizes that in Europe between 6500 and 3500 B.C., a gentle, peace-loving society of sexual equality flourished that worshiped a "Goddess incarnating the creative principle as Source and Giver of All," according to her book The Goddesses and Gods of Old Europe.

This theory has provoked controversy. Anthropology professor Bernard Wailes of the University of Pennsylvania says he admires Gimbutas' scholarship but finds that her interpretation of an idyllic world "goes beyond the bounds of archaeology."

"A lot of people intuitively feel a connection with the Earth," agrees Starhawk, a lecturer and author of The Spiral Dance.

Well-known among Wicca groups, Starhawk describes a recent weekend gathering "to celebrate the turning of the seasons." Her group built an altar on the beach. Then, after meditating on "what we were grateful for," the group danced, chanted and sang.

Not all gatherings are so carefree: Starhawk's group has protested at nuclear sites. "Our religion has to do with reverence for the Earth and other human beings and this system that we are dependent on."

There are scientists who share this idea that the Earth itself is a self-regulating ecosystem. Called the Gaia Hypothesis, this theory postulates that the planet is a "living being and that human beings are part of a larger whole," says Mark Muesse,assistant professor of religious studies at Rhodes College, Memphis.

Looking at the goddess movement from the more typical spiritual viewpoint, Muesse sees it as "a revolt against the the dominant spiritual traditions ofthe west," particularly Christianity.

Some feminist Christians push for changes ranging from the ordination ofwomen and the use of generic, non-sexual terms for God and humanity to overhauling the very theology. For some, "the idea of God itself is irredeemably masculine."

Unless you really enjoy reading manuals, get a Macintosh.

Tim Moses
Computer Science
Vanderbilt University

"Macintosh practically eliminates the need to keep manuals next to my computer, because — regardless of which program I'm using — I can open, close, save, and print files in exactly the same way. And you can't say that about any other computer.

"Today lots of other computers are attempting to look and work like a Macintosh, but it's just not possible. They're too fundamentally different to begin with. This may sound a little strange, but comparing a Macintosh to other computers is like comparing apples to oranges. You can squash the orange into shape and paint it to look like an apple, but underneath the makeup, it's still an orange.

"It's funny — I work at the Vanderbilt computer store and I've seen lots of people switch from other computers to Macintosh, but I've never seen anybody with a Macintosh switch to another computer."

Hockey hits the road, returns with "W"s

By Matt Giller

Last week the Shorewomen transformed themselves into road warriors by snatching two victories from opposing home teams Goucher and tough Albright and upped their record to 4-2-1.

The Shorewomen faced off last Saturday against a feisty Goucher squad. However, sophomore attack Marie Mohler powered the WAC attack with four goals as she single-handedly knocked the enthusiasm out of the opposing players and the rowdy home partisan crowd. Freshman attack Renee Guckert netted two and All-MAC junior Jen Blenckstone tallied one from her defensive position to round out the second half scoring that saw six goals from the Maroon and White. WAC's sophomore goalie Brigid DeVries steered away both shots that came her way for an impressive shutout. The Shorewomen gouged Goucher 7-0.

Albright, however, proved to be a more difficult test for the Women of the Shore. The Shorewomen's bread and butter, stingy defense, was once again the deciding factor. Devries, Blenckstone, White and Co. didn't allow a goal through the first half of action. In the second half, however, Albright opened up the scoring. The Shorewomen offense found some unlikely heroes from the youth movement. Freshman attack Caroline Jensen tied the score and defenseman Peggy Bowman, also a freshman, scored the game-winning goal. DeVries made 11 saves on 12 shots to help seal yet another "W" on the road.

On the road again: The Shorewomen complete the Willie Nelson part of their schedule this Saturday at Lebanon Valley. The Maroon and White return to their home across the tracks Tuesday October 9th where they face off against their arch rivals, the Lady Jays of Johns Hopkins at 4:00.

Read, Diaz win at Swarthmore

By Fred Wyman

Scott Read and Alberto Diaz won their respective singles championships at the 10th Annual Swarthmore College Fall Invitational Tennis Tournament, September 22-23 at Swarthmoore, PA.

Read captured his second single's title in two weeks while Diaz won his first championship as a Sho'men. Read upset top seeded Mike Rubner of George Washington University, 6-4, 6-4, in the finals of first singles flight. While Diaz rallied to defeat Jim Polin also of G.W., 6-7, 6-0, 6-4, to win in the number two singles flight.

Read, who captured the Southeast Regional Small College Championship the week before, played flawless tennis in besting the 40th ranked player in Division I. Rubner was also the tourney's defending champion.

Read's victory extended his unbeaten streak to 9 for the fall season, seeded 4th, the W.C. All-American whipped Swarthmore's Tom Cantine 6-2, 6-4, in the first round. He then went on to defeat Bloomsburg's Mike Peterson6-3, 2-6, 6-2, in the quarterfinals.Diaz, who was a semifinalist at the Southeast Regional Small College Championships breezed past Millersville's Jason Todt in his opening round match, 6-2, 6-2. Then the Sophomore top spinner upended two seeds to reach the championship match of the number two singles flight.

Diaz tripped Charles West, the second seed and ranked 35th in last year's Junior College Rankings, from G.W. in the quarterfinals and avenged last year's dual match loss to Swarthmore's Mark Levine by stopping Levine, 7-5, 6-4. Levine was the flight's number three seed; Diaz was unseeded and ran ran his fall singles record to 7-1.

Emilio Bogado, Jim Lim, Trevor Hurd and Carlos Nuno registered first round victories before bowing in the quarterfinals. Senior captain Lim thumped Justin Wister of Millersville, 6-2, 6-3. Hurd stopped Temple's Ellison Cruz, 6-0, 3-6, 6-3. Bogado ousted American University's Paul Daigle, 6-2, 6-4, and Nuno knocked off Matt Schwartz also of A.U., 7-5, 7-6. Read gained the finals by ripping G.W.'s Matt Spieger 6-3, 6-0 in the semifinals.

Bo knows football, The Sabha knows...

Sabha critics can laugh now. The Great one will bounce back as all the great ones do. Suffice it to say last weekend, Saturday especially, the Great Sabha lost to the opposing circling spirits. Once again these green-eyed, covetous, jaundiced, once-prophetic-turnlowly evil demons, whose only raison d'etre is to spite the Great One, succeeded. Have faith that the Sabha will outwit his antagonists. It is no longer Sabha's vision that is at stake; it is now good vs. evil, white hat vs. black hat, virtue vs. impurity, the flower of the flock vs. the thorn in the flesh, good cop vs. bad cop, Obi Wan Kenobi vs. Darth Vader.

NFL

Tampa Bay -3 over DALLAS. This is when the Cowboys start playing for the stretch run - playing for that No. 1 pick in the draft. Give the points.

Kansas City -6 over INDIANAPOLIS. If the NIgerian Nightmare doesn't gain over 100 yards I'll eat my dhoti. Give the points.

N.Y. Jets +6 over MIAMI. I bet against the Jets last week and paid for it - won't make the same mistake two weeks in a row. Strangely enough the Jets beat the Dolphins more frequently in Miami than the Dolphins do. Take the points.

ATLANTA -2 over New Orleans. Although its early in the season, this game could mean the season for one of these two teams. Give the points.

San Diego -1 1/2 over PITTSBURGH. All the lightning bolts need is a safety to beat this high school team. Give the points.

HOUSTON +5 1/2 over San Francisco. The Great Sabha doesn't say the dwellers of the House of Pain will win, just cover. Take the points.

Detroit +7 over MINNESOTA. A touchdown is too much to give in the black-and-blue division. Take the points.

LA RAMS -4 1/2 over Cincinnati. Boomer will make more passes at the Ram cheerleaders than he will complete them to his receivers. Give the points.

LA Raiders +3 over BUFFALO. Once the Bills get that horseshoe out of their butt, we'll see the real Bills. Take the points.

MONDAY NIGHT

DENVER -9 over Cleveland. Browns owner Modell should sell his team for a second round draft pick. Give the points.

BEST BETS

Seattle -2 1/2 over NEW ENGLAND. The Pats have as much of a chance of winning as Victor Kiam has at a getting a kiss from Kissing Morganna. Give the points.

CHICAGO -4 over Green Bay. The Majic ain't back; but the Midway Marauders are. Bet the sacred Vedas texts on it. Give the points.

COLLEGE

MARYLAND pick over Georgia Tech. This is the game Krivak says to his alumni doubters, "in your face." Pick the Terps.

PENN STATE -17 over Temple. The Owls won't celebrate the end of the strike with a win this Saturday. Give the points.

Florida State +5 1/2 over MIAMI. Probably the biggest game of the weekend and the Great Sabha sees it clearly. Take the points.

AIR FORCE -11 over Navy. The Midshipmen should be able to put some points on the board. Unfortunately when they look up at the scoreboard at the end of the game the other team will have put more on - again. Give the points.

OHIO STATE pick over Illinois. You bet the proverbial sacred cow that the Buckeyes won't lose two in a row at home. Take OSU.

The Grat Sabha's results this season:

NFL: 22-18

BEST BETS: 5-1

COLLEGE: 3-12(THAT IS ACTUALLY A GOOD NUMBER - ITS MY AUNT'S BIRTHDAY)

The Great Sabha has taken the liberty to predict the outcome of this year's Major League Baseball Playoffs.

National League: Pttsburgh in 7 games over Cininnati. Boo Hoo Lou.

American League:: Oakland in 5 games over Boston. Sorry Beantown Boys.

World Series: Oakland in 4 games over Pittsburgh.Ain't no family this year.

Soccer hits hard times as they reach midseason

By Matt Giller

As the Shoremen soccer team reaches the halfway house, they try to get off their five game shneid and regroup for the trip back to the clubhouse.

Last Tuesday, the Shoremen hosted the Salisbury State Sea Gulls. Although the WAC outshot the Gulls in the first half 3-1, neither team was able to slice through the stingy defenses and net one. However, the Gulls tested Shoremen goaltender, Jim Myers, who made four saves in the second half. Unfortunately for the home booters the Gulls were able to score three times. Myers totaled five saves for the game.

Last Saturday the Shoremen laced up for another battle on the friendly(?) confines of Kibler Field against Swarthmore. The Swarthmore game started just as the Salisbury State game started; both teams went into halftime in a scoreless tie. Both squads were deadlocked until 7:20 remaining in the contest when Swarthmore capitalized on a Shoremen defensive mix-up. Swarthmore was able to keep the Shoremen scoring at bay for the rest of the second half and hold onto victory 1-0.

The Shoremen loss was the first in the southeast section of the MAC. The Shoremen's record now runs at 2-7-1. They travel to Albright Saturday and return home Tuesday October 9th to play conference foe Ursinus.

Women's tennis at Mount St Mary's Invitational

The weekend of September 21 marked the second showing of the Washington College women's tennis team this fall. The Sho'women traveled to Emmitsburg, Md to participate in Mount St. Mary's Tennis Invitational.

A predominantly Division I tournament, ten schools competed, including the powerful West Virginia University, Old Dominion University, and the 9th ranked Division III Mary Washington College.

Washington College, which placed 5th in NCAA East Region in 1990, boast the number one Division III player, Tracey Peel, and hoped to hold their own against this high level play.

The two singles flights were represented by Peel, and freshman Pam Hendrickson, who is ranked 9th in Middle States; and sophomore Jennifer Sloan. Veteran doubles team, juniors Miriam Dittmann and Rachel Rice completed Washington College's entry and played in the number two doubles flight.

First round singles draws were tough and disappointing for all the women. Jen Sloan bowed to Seton Hills Mary Patton, 6-0, 6-1; Pam Hendrickson drew Howard University's Anjanette McIlwain. Pam played well in the first set, losing only by a break, 6-4, but then succumbed to McIlwain's game, 6-1 in the second set. Peel, though placing 6th in last year's tournament nonetheless was pitted against third seeded Carrie King from West Virginia. Peel lost the first set, 6-4, but came back strong to win the second, 7-5. Two hard sets took their toll on Tracey, and King took the final set, 6-3.

The three singles players were thrown into the consolation bracket. Sloan and Henderson sustained loses again to tough opponents- Sloan to Emily Baker of George Mason, and Hendrickson to Kathy Mazza of West Virginia.

Peel advanced through the consolation bracket defeating Katherine Adams of University of Delaware, 6-3, 6-1, and then defeating Delaware's number one player, Tara Finnegan of Chestertown, 6-2, 6-3. Peel, suffering from muscle strain, was defeated in the semi-finals of the consolation tournament by Jeni Wilson of George Mason, 4-6, 6-1, 6-2.

SPORTS

From the REC Sports desk

By Deann Pinczok

This past Saturday was an exciting one in Rec Sports with the annual Greek Games being played by the campus' fraternities and sororities. Greek Games consist of a series of competitions ranging from everything from leap frog to frisbee football and wheelbarrel races to soccer. The games begin with a series of small, fun competitions. These competitions include chariot races, tug-of-war, three-legged races, leap frog, etc.. After these competitions are played, a series of tournament games are played in which a sorority joins with a fraternity to form a team. These games include soccer, volleyball, and frisbee football. This year, the Theta's captured the fraternity championship and the AOPi's clinched the sorority championship by gaining a mere three points on the Alpha Chi's. These two greek champs now have claimed their titles for the past two years, 1989 and 1990. Congratulations!

There has been some exciting events happening in Rec Sports Football this past week in both men's and women's leagues. In the women's league, for the first time in Alpha Babies history they were scored upon by the Terrible Ten. The final score was 33-8; although the Babes wrecked their reputation by letting themselves be scored upon, they only allowed it to happen once, and only once. The Alpha Babies are still in first place in the women's league since no team has yet to defeat them. Well, the season is not over, so good luck to all the women, amd may the best group of women win!

In the men's league there has been a twist of events, which in truth, it cannot be said that they were not expected. Tuesday's games were very exciting, especially in the game, Team Mule vs. KA's. In the final seconds of the game, the KA's scored to tie the game.The big game that everyone had been waiting for, Pseudo Budha vs. Team Rupert, was also played on Tuesday and Team Rupert fell to Budha, 19-13. In the beginning of the season Greg Rupert took a great risk as he broke his bond with the winning team he had been a part of, Pseudo Budha, and formed his own team, Team Rupert. Unfortunately for Rupert, his tactics may have blown up in his face. At this time, Rupert might be kicking himself since his team now stands in third place. Pseudo Budha is still in first, as predicted, and the Dawgs now are placed second - looks like Steve Heuttner may not be such a weak link after all!! There's still alot of games to be played in the men's league and there's room for many changes. Is it possible for the Dorchester Dawgs to clinch first place from Pseudo Budha? Only time will tell!!

This weekend is Alumni Weekend and there will be many exciting events occurring, including the 5K Alumni Run. The run begins at 8:30 on Saturday morning and there will be a great show of runners since 65 runners have signed up to take part in this run!!

And finally,Aerobics with Lex Fry, Monday, October 8th in The Dance Studio!! BE THERE!!!!!!!!!!!

Candid: The Great Sabha

In the Elm's 60 glorious years it has never been graced with such a celebrity. The Great Sabha is unarguably the most brilliant mind of our time. Although he has hit on hard times of late, the Great One has given his time to the Elm for a candid, behind-the-scenes look at and within one of the most complex men of our time, who has shrouded his profound thoughts and mysterious past to the public. Here, we will uncover the mysteries in a first time interview granted by the Sabha.

The interview was conducted by Elm sports editor, Matt Giller, in Sabha's tent just outside of Kennedyville. Excerpts from the interview:

MG: First I would like to say for the whole Washington College community that it is a pleasure and an honor for us to have you here(the Great Sabha remains seated on the dirt floor, legs crossed. He places his hands together, smiles, and bows slightly from the waist). How old are you Great Sabha?

GS: I will be 213 years old next August. I'm a Leo.

MG: So you just had a birthday. What do you do to celebrate your birthday?

GS: Well, this year a couple of my drinking um,er, intellectual comrades sent over a porn... er... slides of their trip to the Mecca.

MG: You look in marvelous shape for your age, what are your secrets?

GS: Lots of se... er... meditation. I ride my bicycle alot as well. And will to live.

MG: Ah, so its a mind fixation on life as opposed to the dreading of death?

GS: No. Dr. Will Tolive. Outstanding doctor... he's kept me alive the last hundred or so years.

MG: I'm sure all the women would like to know if your married.

GS: Not by western standards.

MG: Could you expand on that?

GS: No.

MG: Well are you an eligible bachelor?

GS: Unequivicably yes.

MG: Do you have any children?

GS: 313...All girls. Oy.

MG: What are your turn ons?

GS: A good foot message, good se...er... conversation, watching farm animals...run, and a sand storm under a full moon.

MG: How about your turn offs?

GS: None.

MG: Have you met our President Trout and his lovely wife yet?

GS: No, I have not met them yet. However, his great grandfather owes me alot of money from a pok..um...scratch dat.

MG: I know you are a great sports fan; what is your favorite sport, and why?

GS: Baseball obviously. Its more intellectually stimulating than say lacrosse.

MG: Great Sabha, you realize there is a large contingent of lacrosse players and fans at Washington College, which has a great history here. You don't wish to offend anyone.

GS: Absolutely not. I do not wish to offend. But the sport that you call lacrosse, my grandfather invented designed for the well, how should I say, slow-witted.

MG: Great Sabha, I thought the American Indian invented the game.

GS: The game more or less migrated from the natives of the Euphrates River to the American Indian via the Bering Strait. It was invented for warfare purposes. The lax player was a warrior in the 15th and 16th century. The warrior, however, was not educated. He was given the chance but never showed up for class. Anyway, early in their lives these warriors were trained to cradle and throw. They learned these skills instead of reading, writing, and simple arithmetic. Times have changed, somewhat, however. The warriors would use these sticks that were very similar to the ones used today. Contrary to today, they didn't use the net for throwing. Instead they ran up to their enemy and grabbed their head with their net and returned them to their camp as hostages. I had several cousins who made the All Tigres-Euphrates Team in the 16th century, incidentally.

MG: Great Sabha, how long do you wish to live here?

GS: Until I knock some g... until I get another spiritual calling. By the way is that thing on?

A letter from George

by Jennifer Del Nero

No presidential inauguration at Washington College would be complete without the inclusion of two of the greatest influences on the institution: George Washington himself and the college's founding father, William Smith.

Shortly after the establishment of the college in May 1782, Washington sent a letter to Smith from Newburgh, New York. It is a single sentence excerpt of this particular letter that provided Garry Clarke, chairman of the Music Department, with the material necessary to compose a piece entitled "A Letter from George Washington," scheduled to debut during tomorrow's proceedings.

This occasional piece of Clarke will be performed by the College Community Chorus during the inauguration of President Trout. Alumni are also returning to join the unaccompanied choral group, which boasts nearly 40 members from both the town and the college.

Clarke's representation of the correspondence from Washington to Smith is, as he explains, "straightforward. It's a declamatory text; I decided not to write a complicated musical setting."

Noting that ceremonies of this nature and magnitude tend to become long-winded, Clarke says that the composition will be brief: "I thought it might be helpful to have something short on the program."

In addition to composing choral pieces, Clarke had orchestrated instrumental works. Included in his repertoire of originals is the opera Westchester Limited, performed on campus in '73.

Currently, Clarke is con-

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Faculty Art exhibit creates contrast

by Chris Rummel

The Art department at Washington College has been sponsoring a faculty exhibition in the lobby of Tawes theater. The exhibit, which is open Thursday through Sunday from 1 P.M. to 5 P.M., features works by Mr. Tex Andrews and Ms. Susan Tessem. The exhibition demonstrates the ability and disciplines of these two very talented artists. The extremes in range and stylistic approach that are demonstrated in the artworks of Mr. Andrews and Ms. Tessem allow for an incentive of appreciation for the arts. In their contrasting approaches, these individuals seem to complement each others abilities. This display of art contains two very separate approaches to an understanding of perspectives.

The artwork of Mr. Andrews contains a series of black and white sketches taken from a discipline of color. In such works as Self portrait As Marsyas , L'Insolation et le Saturnisme and Title Withdrawn, Mr. Andrews applies a very shaded and simple color scheme. As a basic element to his work, the use of shadowed circles and geometric shapes occur simultaneously. The influences of Jasper Johns on his drawing style is an important aspect to his visual appearance. The complexity of his artwork appears to be founded in the simple and rational. The appearance is far above the surface. To understand his work, one must decide to first rationalize the structure and then ultimately internalize the discipline.

Gere and Garcia make "Internal Affairs"

by Chris Goldenberg

"Trust me... I'm a cop."

These words uttered by Richard Gere in the taut thriller "Internal Affairs" can be viewed as paradoxical when looking at a theme of the movie itself: the juxtaposition of the image of the moral and upright policeman with the dishonest and corrupt officer.

The movie revolves around the lives of two policemen in Los Angeles: Dennis Peck, portrayed by Richard Gere (Pretty Woman), and Raymond Avilla, played by Andy Garcia (the Untouchables). Raymond belongs to the Internal Affairs Department (IAD) of the police force which claims the duty of inspecting the performances of other officers and any incidents in which they have broken the law. Raymond and his partner Sgt. Wallace (Nancy Travis) explore a police brutality charge of a fellow policeman named Vance Stretch who suffers alcoholic and drug abuse problems.

Raymond and Wallace, during their examination and questioning of Stretch, reveal a cover-up with which Dennis Peck (Gere) is affiliated. Without exposing details and ironic twists of the plot, Dennis is discovered to be involved in several unlawful acts.

Richard Gere is marvellous as the clever and sadistic Dennis Peck, manhandling and manipulating other people's lives and surpassing the boundaries of the law to further his own selfish needs.

Gere's character seems larger than life on the screen: an ingenious master in the art of deception who abuses his occupation and rank as a police officer to advance his own very much illegal goals. He is sly and cunning in every task that he undertakes, always scheming, always plotting every meticulous detail, and yet there are hints of a psychotic side waiting to burst by observing his actions and his language (such as "Trust me... I'm a cop.").

Andy Garcia does a fine job as the IAD officer Raymond Avilla, obsessed with Peck and with solving the clues to the crimes that lead to him. He follows Peck, always a few steps away from finally seizing him in the criminal act. Raymond even begins to think like Dennis, attempting to assume reasoning and thoughts he employs in his illegal activities.

The movie itself is a psychological drama with much action, centering on the mind games exchanged between Dennis and Raymond. Both become obsessed with each other and with their "cat and mouse" games, especially when Dennis manipulates Raymond's social life in several interesting ways ("I pushed the right buttons, Raymond," says Dennis).

Raymond and Dennis are like good and evil, the opposing sides of positive and negative. But they also mirror each other interestingly at times. They're opposite sides of a coin and yet they're similar, like a double-sided coin. The climactic final struggle between the two is definitely full of suspense and is one of the best scenes in the film.

The film is littered with many sexual connotations, however, and even appear sexist at times since the role of women in the movie is small and they are often portrayed as the manhandled victims of Dennis. The movie still sizzles with clever dialogue between Dennis and Raymond and even contains scattered humor. "Internal Affairs" is playing at Tawes theater Friday, Sunday, and Monday nights at 7:30 p.m. It is definitely a must-see movie, even if you just go to see the elevator scene which is the most notable one in the entire film.

Anna Husarska to speak

Anna Husarska, Foreign News Editor of the Gazeta Wyborcza will speak on "Post-Communist Politics in Poland" on Wednesday, October 10, at 7:30 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library. The talk is sponsored by the Goldstein Program in Public Affairs.

As a journalist, Ms. Husarska has gained an extraordinary broad perspective from her work for newspapers, journals, publishing houses and television in Poland, Western Europe, the United States and Latin America. Since 1989 she has served as Foreign News Editor of Poland's main liberal newspaper, Gazeta Wyborcza, a direct offshoot of the Solidarity Movement. She has also served since 1980 as foreign correspondent for the Buenos Aires Herald and has held editorial posts at the New Leader in New York, the Polonia and Puls publishing house in Paris.

Her free lance contributions have appeared, since 1981, in such publications as Le Monde, The Spectator, Index on Censorship, The New York Times, The New Leader, Vuelta, The Washington Post, Rodina, Puls, La Cronica, The New Republic, Liberation, and The Guardian.

Her position at Gazeta Wyborcza has placed her in the very heart of the new politics that have been emerging in Poland since the Mazowiecky government was established, a politics that finds the Solidarity in a state of tension and division. Lech Walesa's candidacy for the presidency has brought those fissures to the surface. Ms. Husarska is eminently well positioned to clarify for an American audience the complexities of the current political situation in Poland.

Ms. Husarska has worked extensively as a literary and public affairs translator. Works by Hanna Krall, Kazimierz Brandys, George Orwell, Janusz Glowacki, Joseph Brodsky, Teresa Toranska, and Timothy Ash are among the many she has translated from Polish to Spanish, Spanish to French, English to Polish, etc. Her latest translations are Timothy Ash's "Inside the Magic Lantern" (studies in the recent East European revolutions) and selections of texts by Abraham Lincoln (translated into Polish). She has served as a translator for Le Monde, CBS News, UNESCO, L'Express, and a number of publishing houses. In the mid-1980s she took part in two humanitarian missions conducted by "Medicins du Monde," one in El Salvador, the other on the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua.

Educated at the University of Warsaw (degree in econometrics) and at the Ecole Superieure d'Interpretes et de Traducteurs in Paris, where she was qualified as a translator in Spanish, French, and Russian, Ms. Husarska earned additional degrees in Latin American Studies and holds dual French and Polish citizenship.

Jazz, dolls and spareribs

by Peter Newlin

"We're planning an extravaganza" explains Gwen Swinson in joyfully assertive voice. Swinson, a solidly built black woman with broad, attractive features, chairs the Janes United Methodist Church "Jazz Extravaganza" scheduled for Saturday afternoon, October 6, 1990 from 1 to 6 p.m. "Jazz Johnson will be playing all afternoon. We're going to have spareribs and fish fry and hot dogs for the kids. Jeanette Carson is bringing her exhibit of dolls, antiques and collectibles from Washington. It's a family event with something for everyone; you'll be sorry if you miss it!"

Randolph "Jazz" Johnson, recent recipient of the Jazz Man Award, has agreed to donate his time to Janes, his church of some sixty years. "Jazz" is a native of Chestertown, but better known in Baltimore and Wilmington where he and his band, "The Jazz-Netts" play night clubs and various social events. He began his career playing the saxophone in Garnett's band before World War II, when Garnett was Kent County's black high school. "After the War," Jazz says, "I knew I had to have a band! Charlie Graves gave me a start as his so-called House Band in the Uptown Club. This was pretty big stuff since Charlie also had such great performers as Ray Charles, James Brown, Gene Ammonds, Sonny Thompson and Lulu Read." Since then, Jazz Johnson has played from New York to Louisiana. We've played at Washington College five or six times a year."

While Jazz and his band stir the air with sound, Jeanette Carson will display the visual artifacts of black culture: dolls, historic documents, photographs, antique records, books, postcards and magazines. "Anything made by or about or depicting images of black people," she says. Carson, who publishes a magazine called "Black Ethnic Collectibles" has assembled her show from the work of craftsmen, antique dealers and artisans across the country. "It's a large show representing the work of over 50 individuals," says Carson. Before Jazz begins, Carson will give a talk about the artifacts of black culture and their value to collectors. "I've given lots of presentations before; but usually it's the major cities like Philadelphia or Atlanta. This will be fun!"

The Janes have organized this event to celebrate black culture and raise money for restoring their historic downtown Church. They have planned jazz for our ears, artifacts for our eyes, and ethnic food for our palettes: spareribs and fish fry. The spareribs will be prepared by Asbury, whose booth enjoys considerate popularity at Chestertown's Teaparty each year. The fish will be fried outside over open fires, a local tradition. Ribs and Fish dinners will cost $6.00 with sodas and hotdogs also available.

Ralph Deaton, Chairman of the Janes Renovation Committee, says the church has some serious structural problems. "But thanks to the support of Chestertown's preservation community we have gotten $42,000 of matching grants to restore the exterior [through the Maryland Historical Trust and National Trust for Historic Preservation]. The professionals can see how it's important this Church is to the history of black people. Now it's up to all of us local people to come up with the rest of the money!"

Rain or shine, this Ethnic-Jazz-Artifacts-Food Extravaganza will go on. Tickets costing $5.00, with children 12 and under free, are for sale in Chestertown at Amity Bakery, the Sly Horse, Chestertown News Agency, and by calling Ms. Wright (301) 778-3610. Tickets will also be available at the door.

Black Sheep returns

by Bruce Hamilton

Black Sheep, a D.C. based reggae band, will give a concert after the inauguration tomorrow from 10 p.m. until midnight. They have recorded two albums entitled Gathering and Learn From Each Other. Their music filled with spirit and positivism: they'e a band that Drumbeat called "Reggae masters of high energy personified."

The show promises to be a good one, as anyone who attended their performance last March at Washington College would know. Between the saxophone solos and the guitar riffs there's not much reason to stand still.

Black Sheep seemed to enjoy playing at Washington College as much as the audience seemed to enjoy listening. Let's celebrate a great inauguration with a great reggae band.

Tessem uses a plethora of color and organics. Her work revolves around cubism. It centers around the perspective of the individual viewer. The combination of landscape and geometrical portals provides the observer with a fantasy like impression. In several of her works such as Garden Token, September Fold and Brick Works, Ms. Tessem uses the mixtures of several late nineteenth century and early twentieth century styles to the abstract of cubism. She tends to include several images of landscape being overlooked by a window or door. However, the viewer is usually aware of the dimensionality of the piece due to the folds and geometric bounds that are used. Although she retains the fantastical aspects of control and discipline, Ms. Tessem arranges for the landscape of still life to exist.

The exhibit is a very limited approach to giving a full appreciation to the talents of the artists. However, in order to achieve a recognition of the arts a showing of talent such as this entices the atmosphere for growth and respect within our college community. This particular exhibit was a chance for student and colleagues alike to have a chance to see what their peers are doing. The exhibition of faculty work contains a variety of benefits for the college to promote itself and its benefactors. The exhibit will be on display until Monday, October 8 in the lobby of Tawes theater, and is continued on the second floor.

year. Based on surveillance in the Southern Hemisphere, which has just undergone its flu season, this year's vaccine will protect against three major viruses: A-Shanghai, A-Taiwan and B-Yamagata.

Flu strains, which are named after the city where they were identified, change enough each year to require a new vaccine.

"There is a slight enough antigenic change in the Shanghai strain that an individual can get the same strain another year," Good said. "But from what we've seen of it (the new strain), it's not going to be as severe" as last year.

Nationwide flu surveillance began Monday. Already, there have been reports from doctors nationwide of patients with flu symptoms. However, laboratory tests indicated the patients suffered from other respiratory viruses, not the flu, Good said.

but he is, after all, only human and I can't help but believe that he is trying to do a good job.

If I were in Stu's position, I would try to do exactly what he seems to be doing - accept justified criticisms and use them to learn. I would only hope that the students would understand, support each other and work together to make my job a little easier. That is where Stu is unlucky. But CD players and drunken brawls aside - let's try to understand that our S.G.A. President isn't perfect and let's help hem do the kind of job we deserve! You've gotta admit that being chief WAC-on-Campus can't be the easiest job around, but trying to fight off a band of pious students can't make his job any easier or him any more effective!

have ripped out some electrical wiring, but Kent was much quieter than it is this year. Why can't American students, especially Washington College students, drink responsibly? Everyone uses the excuse "well, I was drunk." I'm sorry, but that doesn't fly here, nor will it after (or if) you graduate. You still are held accountable for what you do no matter what condition you're in.

The entire idea of becoming a drunk on the weekends frightens me. I've heard the horror stories behind the drinking at W.C., and I have had family and friends die from excessive drinking. Some people say we're lucky that the drinking laws of the nation are not fully enforced here at Washington College. For example, freshman can walk in to C-Town Liquors and, depending on who's at the counter, buy liquor. At most colleges and universities across the nation, you can have your license revoked if you try to buy liquor when you are under the age of 21. What we have to do is think about what we're doing to ourselves and our college. In the Elm a few weeks ago, someone said that if we continue to abuse the privilege we have now, it will be revoked. Perhaps that's exactly what we need now, but then again, there are a few people on this campus, like myself, that do drink responsibly and don't go around getting blasted and throw things at people and buildings or trying to take on an entire fraternity by themselves. This is really getting out of hand.

I want something to be done about this. The S.G.A., the Greek Council, and the entire student body needs to talk about the abuse of alcohol on this campus. So many people are killed in drunk-driving crashes each year, and so many students become alcoholics before their senior year. Let's get together and discuss some alternatives to correct these gross problems. However, I do want to salute the Student Government Association and the Panhellenic Council for taking the initiative by having the shuttle service to and from the waterfront gathering Saturday night. This shows that students do care enough to not allow people to drive drunk, and this is an excellent start. But more needs to be done.

Another Worried Student.

Any position can be done well if the individual understands the function of their position. Stu's job is to represent the student body in the best way he can. To do that well, he must know something about the people he represents. And the most important thing about the students is that they are highly critical. They are critical of themselves, their peers and anyone else they can find fault in. And if Stu goes to class or doesn't go to class, it doesn't matter because some will like Stu and some won't. The point is that Stu's letter probably alienated many people because he overplayed his role.

I personally respect Stu and believe he has some good things to say. As a result it pains me to watch him separate himself from the student body by placing himself on a plane above the rest of us. If Stu feels the need to express himself, why not tell us about what he plans to do as SGA president? If all he worries about is going to class, chances are we'd rather not hear about it. And if he is using such a subject to over glorify his position, we certainly don't want to hear it. Because as it has been shown throughout history, true leaders rule with people, not above the people.

Garnett School asks for help from W.C.

By: Susie Mazzullo

The Garnett Elementary School here in Chestertown is asking for Washington College's help in building a playground for the community that will be called, "The Garnett School's Community Playground."

The school's previous playground equipment was voted unsafe for the children to use. A committee was then formed by the Parent Teacher Association (PTA) to look into various forms of playground equipment that are available and that could be obtained for a new playground for the children. Upon investigation, the committee discovered that the Robert Leathers Associates had built, in their opinion, "the most creative and appealing play structures." It was then decided to pursue this to its fullest extent. It was also decided to make this a community project so that all of the children of Chestertown may enjoy the park, regardless of whether they attend Garnett Elementary or not.

The project is on an entirely volunteer basis. It was planned by volunteers, various businesses around the community are donating their equipment and services, and a totally volunteer staff will be building the playground during a four day period. Those involved describe it as "an old fashioned barn raising."

Faculty members from the Garnett School as well as volunteers and some of the children who will eventually play on the future playground were outside the dining hall on Wednesday evening to ask for help. A sign up sheet was available for those students interested in helping with the project. They will be in front of the dining hall at dinner time again on October 24th asking for students' help.

Construction will begin on November 1st and will continue through November 4th. Shifts are from 8:00 am to noon, 12:30 to 5:00pm, and finally from 5:30 to 9:00pm. Meals will be served during each shift and anyone working is welcome to eat free. It is not necessary to sign up for an entire shift. If it is only possible to help for an hour then that too would be greatly appreciated. The school is in need of as many volunteers as it can get. Unskilled as well as skilled workers are needed.

It was stressed that the school especially needs the help of Washington College students on October 31 to help move and organize materials to the construction site. It is then that strong young bodies are especially needed.

The students of Garrett Elementary ask the W.C. students for help in building their playground

Not only the students of Washington College are signing up to help. President and also Mrs. Trout will be there as well as some members of the faculty members and some members of the maintenance staff. Susan Comfort, of the Garnett Elementary School Staff, was very excited about the response that she has gotten from the college so far. "Washington College will be there in a big way," she said. "We are all very excited about all of the enthusiastic support that we have received from the college."

All of the college varsity teams as well.as the fraternities and sororities have been contacted by the Garnett School. According to Ms. Comfort, the response from these organizations has been very pleasing.

Included in the playground scheme is a baseball diamond, a haunted castle, a pirate ship, a rocket tunnel, a pavilion, a jumping bridge, a fire pole, swings, a walking trail, as well as a number of other exciting places for the children to play. The play structure is entirely made of wood.

The Garnett School faculty and the children of Chestertown are hoping that Washington College students will continue to support the project and that a great number of them will show up on the specified construction days.

"From Chestertown with Pride"

By: Susie Mazzullo

Since Iraq, under the leadership of Saddam Hussein, invaded and took hold of Kuwait, the Persian Gulf conflict has affected all of us in one way or another. Gas prices have skyrocketed in the past few months, news briefs have interrupted a number of television shows, yellow ribbons have appeared on a number of cars and trees and most importantly, loved ones have been called to serve their country and sent to wait it out in the desert.

Nora Graham of Chestertown knows first hand what it is like to have a loved one in the Persian Gulf. Her husband is stationed there. She also knows the importance of showing support to all of the service men and women and is currently working on a project that will do just that.

"From Chestertown with Pride" is the name of the community service project that was adopted by Chestertown's Council and Mayor Elmer Horsey.

The project, that will send care packages to service men and women stationed in the Gulf, was recommended by a Special Projects Committee and adopted at the October 8th council meeting. Nora Graham who was instrumental in launching the project, was named its chairperson.

As a start, Ms. Graham, presented the Mayor and each council member with yellow ribbons as these have come to be a symbol of support for those serving with project Desert Shield. Anyone who donates to the project will receive on of these ribbons so that they can display their support. Those who just wish to show their support for the project by displaying a ribbon may buy one for ten cents at the Chestertown Town Hall. Yellow bows are also being sold for fifty cents.

The committee is currently working on putting together a list of those service men and women currently stationed in the Persian Gulf that are from the Chestertown and Kent County areas. They are asking citizens to donate items that have been especially requested by the service men and women. Among these items include: crossword puzzle books, sewing kits, needlepoint projects, paperback novels, magazines, instant coffee and tea, walkmen, toiletries such as toothpaste and shaving cream, powdered drink mixes, socks, t-shirts, and packaged food. Alcoholic beverages, firearms, any literature containing political or religious references, and any type of pornography are prohibited. Chocolate is also discouraged as it tends to melt during shipping. Cash donations will also be accepted to help pay for the cost of shipping and yellow ribbons. Checks should be made out to the Town of Chestertown/ Pride Project.

According to Nora Graham, the packages will start to go out as soon as enough donations have been received. "I anticipate that will be in about two weeks," she said. Packages will then continue to be prepared and sent as long as donations continue to come in.

The goal of the project is to see that each service man and woman from the area receive a package for the holiday. The packages are intended

President Trout tour '90

By: Julie Schram

In keeping with the duties of a new college President, Dr. Charles Trout and his wife, Katherine have been engaged in the Presidential tour since mid-September.

This "showing" has taken them to Boston, New York, Chicago and Baltimore, while Philadelphia, Washington, and Richmond will complete the itinerary through next month.

At each reception alumni, parents, guidance counselors from key feeder schools, as well as friends of the college are given the opportunity to meet the 24th president of Washington College, as well as to strengthen and or establish alumni networks in the various areas. Trout referred to the events as "friend raisers" more than fund raisers.

Just as he himself appeared genuinely enthusiastic about the tour, Trout described the sense of energy and pride of alumni he has spoken with, to be "inspiring" as well as reinforcing from the point of view of an educator.

The remaining reception will be held at the Union League Club in Philadelphia on October 24, the Cosmos Club in Washington on November 7 and Richmond's Commonwealth Club on November 14.

Raise your voice and state your case

When Stuart Neiman spoke at convocation, he called into question the reason students come to the College. Are we students here to get an education or to have a good time?

In his inaugural address, President Trout spoke on the role of a small liberal arts college. We are not, he told us, a place apart, an ivory tower.

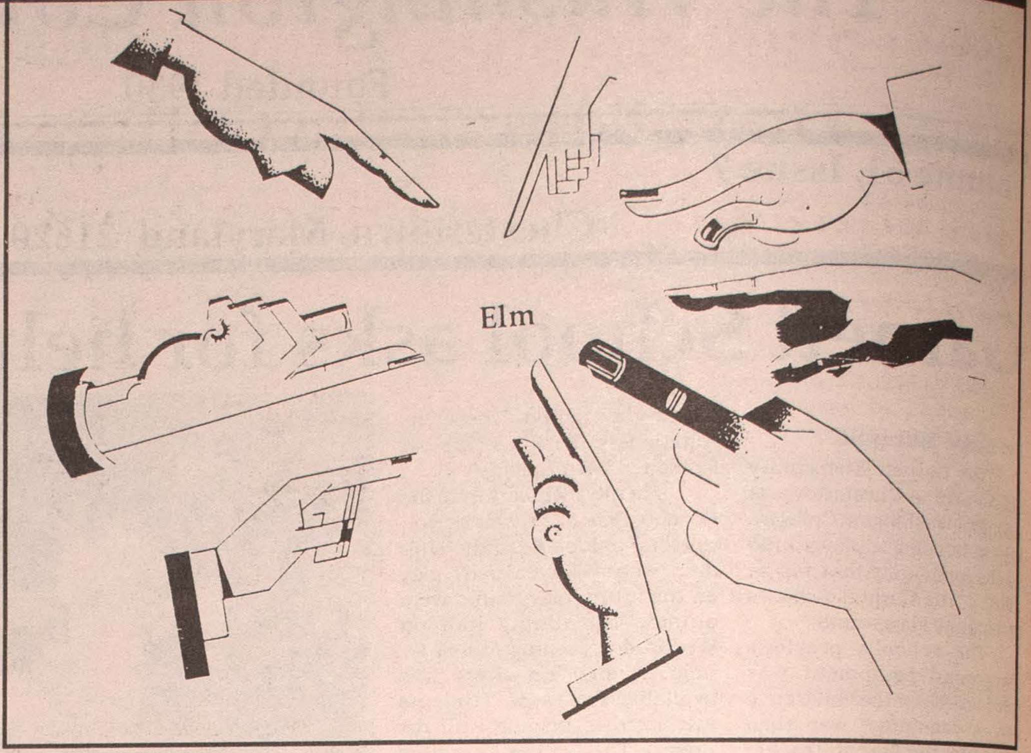
There have always been complaints about student behavior and the College's response. But all too often the comment that follows is "something should be done, but I won't be the one to do it."

This leaves the campus in a difficult situation. Who should be the one to change attitudes and actions on this campus? Should Stuart Neiman be our policeman? Why is he the only one with the courage to say that changes need to be made? Should the Elm be placed in a position where we, the newspaper, become the policemen of the campus? In fact, why don't the students themselves decide to change things, "Stand up and be counted."

The College allows us the freedom of adults—shouldn't we return the favor by acting like adults? If you, the student, truly feel something is wrong or unjust—raise your voice, because chances are someone feels the same. Don't hide behind the Elm, state your own case.

The only way that conditions on campus will change is if individual or groups of students stand up and make their case heard. Sitting around and complaining about things or expecting someone else to act is a sure way that nothing will ever be done.

The new policy of the Elm is that anonymous letters will no longer be printed. For an individual to critize an organization or individual is one thing, to expect the newspaper to protect them and, in fact, take the blame for their criticism is another. Part of being a responisble student is standing up and being recognized. If a writer's personal security is an issue that will be raised, then the matter is serious enough to be dealt with by the deans, or by the President.



Letters to the Editor

Cable isn't an important student concern

To the Editor:

Never has a more puerile, anti-educational, student-debasing suggestion stained the pages of a Washington College publication than in Kyndra Ponder's front page Elm article entitled, "SGA deals with cable." The proposal itself is not Miss Ponder's as a reporter, she merely records the "important student concerns" expressed at a recent meeting of the Student Government Association. She notes that last year a group of twenty-five students petitioned the Administration for the "right" to have cable T.V. equipment installed in each and every dorm room on campus. She further states that this proposition and its fallout, (a quarter million dollar price tag, afflicting all students equally, regardless of whether or not they wish to pay for such a "service,") are still being seriously considered by the SGA, and apparently by the Administration as well.

Let us review the possible benefits of installing cable on our campus. Well, instead of "thirteen channels of shit on the T.V. to choose from," (regrets to Roger Waters) each student would then have the option of thirty. Thirty excuses not to get out of bed. Thirty excuses for mind and body to grow soft from disuse. Thirty excuses to avoid the education for which we are all here. And only $250,000. What a deal.

Be assured, this letter is anything but the effluvia of yet another annoyingly strident anti-T.V. purist. I am the first to recognize that the BBC produces programs of substance with some regularity, and that the recent Civil War documentary may be an indication that American T.V. is heading, albeit at the pace of cold jell-o, in the same direction. However, these programs are to be found on

Playground requests student help

Dear Washington College Students:

The Chestertown community needs your help. Garnett School's Community Playground will be constructed October 31 - November 4. The project has been planned by volunteers, financed by contributions, and will be built entirely by volunteer labor. Though we would welcome your help anytime during construction, we especially need student volunteers on October 31 from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. to help us move and organize materials. No special skills are required. Free meals will be served to all volunteers. Workers are also needed to serve food and care for children.

Next Wednesday, October 24, kids from the community and playground committee members will be outside the dining room at dinner time to recruit volunteers. Please sign up. Organizations or clubs who can recruit volunteers in numbers would be must helpful to us.

Garnett School is less than a five-minute walk down College Avenue from the campus. Whatever time you can give, even an hour or two, will be most appreciated. Don't miss out on the fun of an old fashioned barn-raising.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters must be signed. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: Should Washington College have a football team? Do you think the College is missing something by not having a team?

If you want a new sport start a club

Frank Crivelli

Should Washington College have a football team? Before this question can accurately be answered, one must first ask: Is it logistically feasible to have a football team at Washington College? First a few facts. There are 407 full time male students at Washington College, in which over 50% participate in college athletics on both an inter-collegiate, and intramural level. Football is a sport that takes enormous financial support in order to compete successfully on the Division III level. A football program would also require roughly forty athletes to field a solidly built team. Does Washington College's Athletic budget have the funding for a football program? Yes, I believe it does. However, the reallocation of funding that would be necessary to support this team would leave the presently established athletic programs underfinanced. Is the manpower present at this institution to establish a strong team? Undoubtedly, but once again, many of these men are committed to other prosperous athletic programs that need them in order to continue their outstanding success. Surely there is money somewhere in the school's budget that can be appropriated for a football program. But why put it into a new athletic team? We are a small Division III school with the most successful athletic program in proportion to our size in the entire country. Either properly fund the existing athletic teams in a manner in which they truly deserve, or put the money where it most importantly can be used, our education.

However, on the other side of the coin, students should have the option to actively form independent club athletic teams that are not associated with the Washington College Athletic Department. Although W.C. does offer a wide range of athletic teams, some students may opt to participate in a sport not offered by our school or the National Collegiate Athletic Association. The students who spend the long hours trying to organize such clubs should be commended by the college and the Athletic Department, not condemned. They are creating another opportunity for students to become athletically involved, and experience another facet of "the college experience" that otherwise would never have been available to them. It obviously takes a large amount of organization and funding to get club Athletic teams off the ground. They need the faculty and the administrators to work with them, not adamantly against them. Why take the opportunity away from the students, the life blood of this institution. Remember you are here for us, we are not here for you.

I think not having a football takes a lot away from the college. At a lot of schools football is a big tradition. I think a football team would create a lot of school spirit, especially in the fall, it is an exciting way for students to get together, like at the lacrosse games in the spring.

The real issue is the athletic department

Seth Engel

The issue expressed in this weeks Elm should be broadened to ask, "What is the role of althletics in Washington College society?" and more specifically "What is the role of the athletic director and the athletic department in Washington College society?" The answers to these questions runs counter to the attitudes and policies practiced today.

I believe that the role of athletics in college society should benefit the largest number of people possible. Eliteism is fine in such varsity sports as basketball and lacrosse- it is standard issue for only the best to compete at those levels- because society as a whole understands and agrees with this principle. However, it is only fair that there should be resources (human and equipment) available to any group of students who show enough interest in any particular sport, be it rugby or Woman's soccer. As it stands now, club sports are refused every single benefit that comes with our sports facilities and department. This means that not only are we unable to use Washington College fields, we can't even use such basic resources as the athletic trainer, or even a single water cooler. Don't even broach the subject of funds. Not only are club sports refused funding through the school, they are nbot even allowed to seek town donations and outside funding. This Catch-22 virtually eliminated all serious attempts to establish new sports before they even reach the starting blocks.

Doesn't the administration realize that the student athletes who are not capable of varsity participation are sill important, are still part of the body of students for which the whole athletic structure is set up for? Club sports want to represent Washington College because we are proud to attend the school-not because we are trying to bilk the lacrosse team out of funds or equipment.

I think that it is time to review the role of the athletic department- who it is suppossed to be serving- and the role of athletics in general. Sure, we love our varsity sports, but that does not make us second class citizens when it comes to support. The time has come to serve all the students, not just the elite few.

P.S. - The Washington College Rugby Team's first home game will be Sunday, October 28 at Worton Part against the University of Delaware. Contact

OUTLOOK

In the world: Gorbachev wins Nobel Peace Prize

UNITED STATES

The public's confidence in the condition of the country is at it's lowest level in twenty years as a result of the Persian Gulf crisis, the budget impasse and the weakening economy. President Bush's popularity has fallen sharply. In a recent poll taken by the Washington Post and ABC News, 56% of those asked approved of the job that the president is doing. This is 19 points lower than it had been just a month earlier making it the lowest approval rating of his presidency. Bush's popularity, however, remains higher than the average for post-World War II presidents just prior to mid-term elections. The poll showed that only 19% of those questioned believed that the country is headed in the right direction. 79% said the U.S. is "pretty seriously off on the wrong track." This poll marked the most negative result since 1974 at which time the country was in the midst of the Arab oil embargo and Watergate. While some people, like pollster Robert Teeter, believe that when the budget agreement is passed, Bush's approval rating will rise, others see Bush's popularity linked more to growing disapproval for actions taken in the Persian Gulf.

The admission of up to 131,000 refugees into the U.S. over the next 12 months, a slight increase from last year, was authorized by President Bush yesterday. Refugees defined as fleeing religious or ethnic persecution or other human rights violations will have their travel expenses paid for by the U.S. government. With an allocation of 50,000 people, most of the refugees would be from the Soviet Union and Southeast Asia whose allocation is 52,000. The number allocated to Eastern Europe is down 1,500 from last year to 5,000. This probably due to the democratic reforms there. Other allocations include 6,000 for the Middle East and South Asia, 3,100 for Latin America, and 4,900 for Africa.

IRAQ

Diplomatic efforts to bring about a peaceful settlement of the Persian Gulf crisis have come to a halt despite continuous efforts. Both the U.S. and Iraq have said they want to avoid yet other Arab nations that have acted as go-betweens have not been able to end the standoff between the two countries. The U.S. continues to insist that before any negotiations can begin, Iraq must pull out of Kuwait. Iraq insists that Kuwaitis not negotiable unless there is progress on the Arab-Israeli dispute. With the war of words becoming harsher, there is a growing lack of substantive contact and both countries continue to build up military forces and talk of war. Commenting on the possibility of a negotiated settlement, one diplomatic official said: "Even if an opportunity were to arise, it could be lost." He also warned of the risk of "misunderstandings and misreadings" in the diplomatic vacuum. Arab officials, who were optimistic after hearing speeches by President Bush and Francois Mitterrand at the United Nations in which both leaders suggested a more flexible approach to negotiations to avoid a shooting war, are now disappointed by weeks without movement. These officials as well as some European officials believe that now is the time to intensify negotiations before the U.S. completes it's military buildup in the Persian Gulf region.

SOVIET UNION

The 1990 Nobel Peace Prize was awarded to Mikhail Gorbachev for his efforts in ending the Cold War and for allowing the East European satellites to region their political freedom. Gorbachev is the first Communist head of state to win the Prize, which is generally considered the highest honor a statesman can receive from the international community. International response was great as many western countries that were once the ideological enemy of the Soviet Union payed tribute to the new Nobel laureate. Within the Soviet Union reaction was mixed. One the one hand there was pride in Gorbachev's international image as a peacemaker on the other was anger that he has not yet been able to deal effectively with the serious economic and ethnic problems at home. Speaking to journalists at the Kremlin, Gorbachev said he felt at home in the company of other Nobel Prize such as Andrei Sakharov and Lech Walesa, both of whom were denounced by previous Kremlin leaders as "anti-Communist." Gorbachev also said that the $710,000 prize was international recognition of the importance of his perestroika reform movement: "The award is support for our efforts and is very inspiring for me...It coincides with a crucial period in perestroika," he also said he will be traveling to Oslo, Norway for the award presentation ceremony on December 10th. The Nobel Prize Committee wished to honor Gorbachev for his "many and decisive contributions" toward the dramatic changes in East-West relations and for the new openness in Soviet society which he brought about.

A pompous response from a humble president

Stuart Neiman

The SGA Presidency has a great many responsibilities associated with it. Unfortunately, one of them seems to be the need of carefully guarding what you say and do. It is indeed disheartening to know that every one of your statements and actions will be judged according to their political value first, and then according to what you really meant. There have been only two additions of the Elm since I have taken office, which have not attacked something that I have said or done. Indeed, I now look forward to every issue, if for no other reason, to see just what I have done wrong the preceding week. I must thank the various authors who have brought my tyrannical rule into its proper focus. I recognize all that I have in common with Napoleon, Genghis Kahn and Adolph Hitler. While I have no problem with people's opinion and their right to present the facts as they see them, I do have a very serious problem with those who mistake a personal attack for the expression of an opinion.

This article is written in response to three letters to the editor which used opinion and disguised it as fact. The first of these letters addressed my responsibilities as the SGA President. The author (though he/she did not sign their name) made it my responsibility to to act as campus police, suggesting that I was remiss in my duties for not addressing the "fire lane" situation. I thank Mr. Winkleman and Ms. Hodge-Williams for addressing the fact that it was not my responsibility to act. I am also content with the fact that my responsibilities (as stated by Ms. Hodge-Williams) do not extent outside the realm of club and band funding. I am indeed pleased that she knows certainly more than I and that I now need no longer worry about the issues which find their way to my room, mail box or phone on a daily basis. As a last response to Ms. Hodge-Williams, I would hope that you as a "server of food" and "Dan the maintenance man" feel some type of responsibility to your respective positions which goes beyond your immediate job descriptions. Imagine what a dull and slow moving world it would be if everyone acted according only to what is expected of them without concern for issues which may lie outside the realm of what they are immediately responsible for.

As for Mr. Winkleman's letter; he who joyfully acts according to mis-information has already earned my contempt. I assure everyone that my intentions for writing the article were out of a genuine concern for my actions as well as others (but ofcourse I've forgotten that nothing I do is genuine). I never intended to preach or place myself "above." If Mr. Winkleman was reading it from an inferior position then it was certainly not my fault nor my intention. I have respect for his position on the article itself, but the rest of his comments about my form of dress and my involvement with drug rehabilitation went so far beyond incorrect as to border on ridiculous. The mere suggestion that past presidents of the SGA were successful because of their recreational use of drugs is absurd. Was it success when thousands of dollars were stolen right under the nose of one president when some other individual was selling drugs right out of the apartment that I now occupy. Was it success when another President used SGA funds to buy drugs. The stories and rumors go on and on, but was this success? As for my enjoy-network and public television: in other words, "normal" reception will suffice.

I would like to propose a solution to this problem. If there truly are a substantial number of students who feel that Washington College has less to offer than does Nintendo, they should pool their resources and put a giant-screen T.V. in the Coffee House. They will be able to afford a much higher quality set together than alone, and they could then subscribe to cable, the Disney Channel, Bestiality-R-Us, and whatever other sources of entertainment for which they feel the need. This situation would have the added benefit of stimulating business in the Coffee House, thereby providing further student revenue.

Slice's advice for the academically concerned

Phil"Slice"Macek

As we enter the half-way point of the semester it's time to face a grim reality: some of us are sinking rather quickly in the academic quicksand of higher learning. Yes, some students are staring bad grades in the face and are shaking in their boots. Now don't worry, it is far to early to be concerned about having a reserved spot on the Dean's "other list" for the rest of your collegiate career, and besides, I'm here to help. in order to cover your particular situation, I will discuss the consequences of getting bad grades class by class. Hopefully from these insights, you will be able to discover a viable solution to your problem.

First off, for all the freshmen, you are probably the only class that can show very little concern about bad grades. Now I don't mean to sound shallow or callous, but you mugs have a scapegoat onto which you can pass those grades that are a little below par. This scapegoat is called the ole' "freshman adjustment period." Thus, for example, when confronted by irate parents who say, "Danny, (a fictitious name) you had damn better explain these "D's" and "F's" to us immediately."

"Well I'll tell ya," says Danny rather nonchalantly, not even bothering to look up from his entrancing game of Nintendo football, "it takes a while to adjust to college work. Just give me some time and I'll be on the honor roll within a year."

Now what in carnation are Danny's parents going to say to him? Hell, Danny's father probably heard the same speech when he was a college freshman, and he probably paid no attention to it either. Danny knows this, ergo he knows that any threats his Dad makes will not hold any water. Nevertheless, just to be a typical father, Danny's Dad will come up with a typical threat. "From now on the only "D" I wanna see on your report card is the one in your name. If you bring home half-ass grades like these again, I'll hit you so hard that you'll be eating strained food for the rest of your life!" Overall, to avoid such comforting words from your father, you should be worried about your grades somewhat, but not to the point that they interfere with your enjoyment of the college experience.

Sophomores, I can pretty much attribute your bad grades to one thing: laziness. Having mastered freshman year, you are well aware of the demands that teachers tend to make on their students. This being the case, you do just enough to slide by. As of yet, you don't have to worry about your thesis or deciding whether to go to graduate school or head out into the real world where your school is the streets and looking down the barrel of a loaded gun is your teacher. No, your biggest challenge this year is declaring your major in the Spring semester. Now don't get me wrong, this can be a very difficult, traumatic thing. For example, I changed my major from English to History to Biology to International Studies to finally Sociology. I don't know what this means in terms of future career plans, but I really kick ass at Trivial Pursuit.™

Basically, you guys can do the work if you really want to, it's just a matter of digging your books out of that pile of dirty laundry and week-old beer cans and heading off to the library. Yes, you guys have pretty much beaten the system when it comes to grades; you guys are truly "wise fools."

Juniors are on mixed ground when it comes to dealing with bad grades. On the one hand they can display the apathetic behavior that the sophomores do. After all, juniors have no thesis responsibilities yet and they still have another year to put off any career decisions. However, on the other hand, juniors are told that now is the time to start worrying about raising their GPA's so as to one day impress potential employers. However, juniors tend to live only in the present, so they tend not to worry about life after college. Besides many juniors are taxed by that superhuman challenge of trying to fulfill their distribution requirements.

When it comes time to seek out help for deficient performance in the classroom, all students should be weary of teachers who try to make light of their problems. For example, I walked into one teacher's office, (the teacher shall remain nameless but if you really want to know who it is just stop me around campus and I'll be happy to tell you) showed him my grades, and said, "Look Doc. I've gotten an 85, 87, and 91 on your exams. I got an 84 on your paper and an 86 on my oral presentation, and you still gave me a "C" for the class. Now that hardly seems fair." The teacher looked at my grades, reflected on them for a moment, and said in a rather flat tone, "Congratulations Mr. Macek, you have just gotten the highest "C" average in the history of Washington College. Now if you'll excuse me, I have a faculty meeting to go to and I don't want to be late." Well before I left I made a few snide comments about his wife and kids and told him what he could do with his warped grading system. Hopefully, he didn't take it personally. Luckily, not all teachers are like this and they are usually very responsive to your problems; which is good because to graduate from this place one needs all the help one can get.

And finally, for the seniors, grades take on quite a different role in your final year here. Although it is certainly not desirable, it is understandable why some seniors find their GPA plummeting towards the end of their college careers. First off, many seniors are concerned about finding real jobs after they graduate. Thus, they spend time preparing for job interviews instead of studying for that almighty astronomy exam. O.K. they might get a "D" on that one quiz, Which might eventually lead to a "D" in the course, but if they did well at their job interview at least they know that they won't be working in a bagel shop for the rest of their lives. Of course, some seniors find their grades dropping because of too much drinking, but hey this is the last chance they have to make some college memories, and most of them want to go out in a blaze of glory. Plus, almost all seniors are done with distribution requirements and their major requirements (save for that blasted thesis) so they end up taking blow-off classes, so even if they get a bad grade, it's not the end of the world. All in all, seniors concentrate more on what's expected of them once they get out of college than they do on getting a perfect GPA. As one senior put it, "just give me my diploma at the end of the year, along with a graduation party and I'll gladly accept a GPA in the "D" range." I think that pretty much says it all.

In general, freshman and seniors seem to be in the same boat when it comes to grades. Each has a viable scapegoat to accept the brunt of the punishment for bad grades. Sophomores and juniors are too caught up in the fun of college living to worry about grades., they just live from one weekend to the next. So while you're out there scared to death of getting put on academic probation, just remember that in ten years after graduation when you've got a decent job, nobody's going to come up to you and ask while you failed that one astronomy quiz.

My Macintosh is more important to me than my car.
I lent my car to my sister. But nobody's taking my Macintosh.

"I don't know how anybody gets through college today without a Macintosh. Sometimes I have so many assignments that I barely have time for sleep. Yet my Macintosh allows me to get my work done on time – without making sacrifices.

"Working on my dissertation and field studies means collecting an incredible amount of information. So jumping from one program to another with ease is imperative, as is quickly making charts and graphs. By enabling me to do these things, Macintosh probably saves me an hour and a half each day.

"Another great thing about the Macintosh is that it makes you feel technically confident. Remember putting toys together when you were a kid? Who reads the directions? Nobody. You look at the picture of the bike and you know exactly what to do. The Macintosh operates the same way. I actually taught a friend to use one in two minutes.

"What would my life be like without a Macintosh? Scary."

Hockey keeps winning

By Matt Giller

Six years ago when the founding fathers of W.C. field hockey convened, they felt that it would take the new Shorewoman team a while to achieve a winning record, let alone be in the running for an MAC berth.

In 1985 the Women of the Shore battled to a 1-5 record. But back to the future the juggernauts from across the tracks have compiled an amazing 8-2-1 stellar season thus far.

They have spent the last couple of weeks outplaying and outhustling all opponents. They defeated Catholic, Widener and two nationally ranked teams, Johns Hopkins and Lebanon Valley.

They started on their tear through the league by defeating Catholic and Lebanon Valley by identical 1-0 scores. Lebanon Valley had lost to the Shorewomen the year before 2-1 but both teams have improved. Washington outshot Lebanon Valley, 18-16. W.C.'s goalie sensation Brigid DeVries outsaved her counterpart 15-14. Caroline Jensen's lone gaol was enough for the Maroon and White on this occasion.

One goal was all they needed against Catholic as well. This one was recorded by Amy McCleary. DeVries and the rest of the non-God-fearing defense shutout the Catholic girls 1-0. W.C. once again outshot their opponent 20-12. DeVries was perfect between the pipes with 7 saves.

The Shorewomen continued their assault on the rest of the league including MAC foes Hopkins and Widener. They went into the Lady Jays game never experincing the thrill of victory against that "safety school" from across the bay. But this was W.C.'s year to sip from the cup winning 2-1. Hopkins was ranked 16th nationally and second in the South Region before it fell to the mighty Moroons. The first half of the game ended in a scoreless tie. However, Hopkins started off the scoring in the second half with a goal at the 22:29 mark.But the Shorewomen bounced back. They continued to pepper the opposing goalie with shots. Finally freshman Renee Guckert tied the score and senior co-captain Erin O'Neal hit the back of the strings for the game-winning goal with 10 minutes left in regulation.

On Tuesday, the Shorewomen returned from across the tracks to ring the victory bell once again. This time their victim was MAC foe Widener. Widener fell to the WAC by the same score as did Hopkins, 2-1. It appeared the first half was going to end in a scoreless tie until junior Jennifer Blenkstone scored for the WAC with just 3 ticks left on the clock. The scored remained that way until the 19:18 mark of the second half when Peggy Bowman increased the Shorewoman lead to 2-0. However, with 16:37 remaining in the game Widener put one past DeVries spoiling a shut out. DeVries steered away 15 shots as the Shorewomen outshot their opponent 30-5. Widener's goalie, who survived the W.C. offensive onslaught, said, "now I know how General Custer felt during his last stand."

Men's tennis: winning at Rutgers

By Fred Wyman

Washington College showcased some of its future tennis stars at the Rutgers University Fall Invitational Tennis Tournament at New Brunswick, N.J. October 12-13, as the Shore netters captured five of seven singles flights.

Irakli Metrevelli, Trevor Hurd, Alberto Diaz, Emilio Bogado and Andy Bohutinsky won the #1,#2,#3,#5, and #6 singles flights respectively. All the finals pitted W.C. vs. Rutgers as the Shoremen and their Division I hosts knocked off opponents from Goucher College and Millersville University in the early rounds of the flighted round robin tourney.

Metreveli was extremely impressive as he dropped a mere eight games in his three matches. The transfer from the USSR combined "touch and power" in whipping Rutger's Gary Victor 6-0, 6-1, for the #1 singles title. Another transfer Hurd saved 4 match points in a 3rd set tiebreaker to edge Steve DeRose 6-7, 6-3, 7-6 for the #2 singles championship.

Sophomore Alberto Diaz won his second tournament of the fall, but had to rally from one set down to trip David Lipschitz of Rutgers 0-6, 6-3, 6-4. Diaz ran his fall record to 10-1. Having his best outing of the fall campaign freshman, Emilio Bogado ripped Goucher's Fred HIlal 6-2, 6-0, bested Millersville's Eric Scaduto 6-3, 6-0 and nipped Rutger's Bob Coriat in two tiebreakers to take the #5 singles crown. Andy Bohutinsky, showing his freshman year form, captured the #6 singles championship. The scrappy baseliner trailed Rutger's Mark Levinberg 3-6 but was up 4-1 in the second set when Levinburg was forced to retire. Bohutinsky now sports an 8-2 fall record.

Women's tennis completes strong fall season

The weekend of October 12-13 marked another great performance from the W.C. women's tennis team as their top two players, Tracy Peel and Pam Hendrickson walked away with top honors in singles and doubles.

A flighted tournament, the squad was missing its #3 player, Miriam Dittman from its lineup, forcing the 4,5, and 6 players, Rachel Rice, Tina Lennon, and Jennifer Sloan respectively, to move up a position. Despite this problem, Lennon and Sloan both won their first round. Tina Lennon ousted Kimberly Poppiti of SUNY Stonybrook 6-2, 6-1, and Sloan Defeated Veronica Vicenti of Mary Baldwin College 6-1, 6-2. Rice in the unfamiliar #3 slot was not so lucky, falling to Catholic's Laura Maloney in a tough 6-2, 2-6, 6-3 decision. Peel and Hendrickson, both seeded #1 in their respective flights, each received a bye in the first round.

Second round singles continued the next day following a rain delay. Sloan and Lennon's progress were halted by Loyola College's Megan Wilson(6-2, 6-2) and Catholic's Giovanna Capo(6-0, 6-1). Rice, thrown into the consolation side with a first round loss, won her consolation flight via a series of defaults from her opponents, Melody Katz(Glassboro State) and SUNY Stonybrook's Eileen Hoy.

Pam Hendrickson advanced to the semifinals and soudly defeated Shari Schliefman of Glassboro State College(6-0, 6-2). Her finals competitor proved to be Millie Johnson from Loyola. Pam trounced Millie 6-2, 6-0. "The score don't really show what the match was like," Hendrickson commented after the match. "Johnson is a good player," the freshman from Pennsylvania continued, "I had to be focused the entire time. This was good competition.

Tracy Peel's singles matches had similar outcomes. Loyola's Mia Vendlinsky was 1st to fall by the wayside 6-0, 6-4. Peel's final was against a player she had met in the semis in CUA's 1989 tournament, senior Cindy Merrill of Millersville University. Again Merrill met defeat, losing 6-3, 7-5. This marks Peel's second time as #1 flight champion of the Catholic tournament.

The doubles portion of the CUA Tennis Classic, also flighted, had W.C. with only two teams entered. Peel/Hendrickson and Sloan/Lennon were put in the #1 and #2 flights respectively. Sloan and Lennon met defeat early on in a well played 3 set match against Glassboro State's doubles team of Johnson/Katz. "Everytime I see them play together, Jenn and Tina improve their game dramatically. THey shoud be happy with their performance this weekend," Coach Bramble stated.

Tracy Peel and Pam Hendrickson again showed what a top notch pair they are. Given a bye in the 1st round, they met well limbered Vendlinski/Johnson from Loyola. W.C lost the first set, but came back to win the match 2-6, 6-0, 7-5. This outcome pitted them in the finals against Catholic's #1 flight's defending champions Megan "Rant and" Rave and Jennifer Dowd. Last year Peel and graduate Monica Blanco lost in a disappointing 6-3, 6-0 show. Not in 1990 - Peel and Hendrickson never gave Catholic a chance to initiate any winning strategy and overpowered them 6-1, 6-2.

Catholic's Tennis Classic marks the end of the women's fall tennis season. "The fall is so important," coach Holly Bramble reiterated. "The team has a chance to practice their skills and enter some great competition without the pressure that strikes them in the spring with conference matches and ranked teams that count towards their win/loss record."

Vonnegut creates perpetual motion

by Claire Capuzzi

Perhaps the most refreshing thing about Kurt Vonnegut's new novel, Hocus Pocus, is its presence on the New York Times Bestseller List. An important element in Vonnegut's work, from the early short stories to the later novels, like Galapagos and Slaughterhouse Five, is its audience. In other words, his books address the issues that connect us all, that concern our notion of identity, both personal and societal.

Part of Vonnegut's success in the public eye is his willingness to make waves by asking the wrong questions- he has a nasty habit of bringing up subjects that pop culture has nominally dismissed. Subjects that have had all the sensationalism squeezed out of them by movies and television. Subjects like Hiroshima and Auschwitz. Like the Dresden fire bombings, or the threat of nuclear war. Like the decrepit state of the environment. And Vietnam.

Unlike the efforts of the silver screen, Mr. Vonnegut does not restage the battles of history in Hocus Pocus. Instead, he points to their effect. He deals in potential futures, relentlessly, yet gently, asking the question, what next? His narrative voice is older and wiser, but the social criticism seems sharper than before, his humor less goofy, and more ironical.

In the book, Eugene Debs Hartke is a ribbon decorated Vietnam vet who returns to the states, his convictions more than shaken by the horror he witnessed during the war. He accepts a job as a professor of physics at the illustrious Tarkington College in upstate New York, a posh, resort-like school for mentally disabled students from families of comfortable means, - "the ruling class", as Hartke calls them.

Across the lake from the college is a maximum security prison with the same name, harboring most of the more dangerous prisoners from the city of New York. Relishing the switch from military commander to professor, but sometimes discovering the unsettling similarities between the two, Hartke continues to teach until one winter the lake freezes, the prisoners escape and overthrowing the faculty board at Tarkington overtake the college.

Later, when the situation is reversed by the authorities, and the escapees are once again prisoners, Hartke is judged as the cause of the rebellion, and is held in the college library, awaiting trial. It is from there that Hartke writes down his story, ostensibly on tiny scraps of paper he finds in the thousands of volumes of books that make up the library.

True to his own style, Vonnegut tells the story in nonlinear fashion, skipping back and forth between events, leaving it to the reader to assemble the puzzle that is a man's life. The "whole" story is made up of a series of anecdotes- some poignant, some cruel, and usually all funny. On one particularly important scrap of paper, Hartke tells of his discovery of several abandoned perpetual motion machines in the attic of the new College President. Hartke realizes their educational worth as the failed attempts of an inventor to defy the laws of physics and puts them on display in the library- the same library that now serves as his prison cell.

The idea of perpetual motion becomes a motif for the entire novel. Vonnegut tries to impress upon the reader our world is not a perpetual motion machine, as we have a stubborn habit of believing in our own mortality. Nothing could be more ridiculous, insists Vonnegut. Hartke displays the machines under the banner "The Complicated Futility of Ignorance", words that Hartke says, "can surely be applied to this whole ruined planet nowadays."

Professor Hartke blames much of the ruin on the ignorance of the ruling class, who are highly distressed by his own strange penchant for the truth. After all, those most comfortable in their positions are the least reluctant to change their ways. The faculty board at Tarkington College provides Hartke with such an example, when under an attack from the prisoners, they deny the reality of their own situation:

"When I tried to tell the hostages a little about their captors, about their childhoods and mental illnesses, and their not caring if they lived or died, and what prison was like, and so on, Jason Wilder actually closed his eyes and covered his ears. He was being theatrical rather than practical. He didn't cover his ears so well that he couldn't hear me.

"Others shook their heads and indicated in other ways that such information was not only tiresome but offensive. It was as though we were in a thunderstorm, and I had begun lecturing on the circulation of electrical charges in clouds, and the formation of raindrops, and the paths chosen by lightning strokes, and what thunder was, and on and on. All they wanted to know was when the storm would stop, so they could go on about their business.

"What Warden Matsumoto had said about people like them was accurate. They had managed to convert their wealth, which had originally been in the form of factories or stores or other demanding enterprises, into a form of liquid and abstract, negotiable representations of money on paper, that there were few reminders coming from anywhere that they might be responsible for anyone outside their own circle of friends relatives." (pg. 225)

Tired of tiptoeing around reality in the classroom, and driven by personal convictions and a few beers, Hartke attempts to communicate to his students his anger at the maddening idiocy of the Vietnam War. His drunken oratory leaves the students confused and unclear about Hartke's intentions, and Hartke himself realizes that they have been numbed to the impact of his story. Unreality and reality merged into a long time ago in the minds of the students he educates. It is perhaps Vonnegut's most frightening prospect:

"The scenes of unspeakable cruelty and stupidity and waste I described that night were no more horrible than ultrarealistic shows about Vietnam, which had become staples of TV entertainment. When I told the students about the severed human head I saw nestled in the guts of a water buffalo, to them, I'm sure, the head might as well have been made of wax, and the guts those of some big animal which may or may not have belonged to a real water buffalo.

"What difference could it make whether the head was or was not wax, or whether the guts were or were not those of a water buffalo?

No Difference." (pg. 124)

Vonnegut never fails to make humor an important element in his novels. More a philosophy than a reaction, the ability to laugh at oneself, along with everyone else, is a necessity for survival. The character of Jack Patton, Hartke's old army buddy, is armed with one universal response to any pressing question Hartke might ask. Everything makes Jack Patton "want to laugh like hell". From Madame Bovary to the war itself, Patton's answer is the same. Curiously enough, Hartke remembers never having heard Jack laugh.

about this proposal to install cable campus-wide is the insinuation that Washington College students, in all our wisdom, can think of nothing better to do with $250,000. How about hiring enough English professors for students in the best-know program at this "intimate liberal-arts institution" to have seminars rather than cattle calls for upper division courses? How about building an observatory so that science students can learn about the stars by actually looking up at the stars rather than down at a textbook? How about the development of a Classics department that would allow us to gain first-hand access to the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic texts that are the foundation of the Western culture? How about subsidies to bring the cost of professional theatre within the reach of students? How about a library that doesn't have to grovel to the University of Maryland every time a student needs a book outside of standard course listings? How about . . . oh, wait. The lacrosse team already gets everything it wants.

We have seen that increasing tuition is not of itself an intrinsically evil act. The dozens of students that attended President Trout's inauguration and the following reception learned that, partly because of higher tuition revenue, we now have a beautiful new building with marble floors, vaulted ceilings, and a bookstore that can double as a miniature golf course. Cable T.V. is another matter entirely.

As usual, this issue boils down to a question of individual prerogative. Herr Student, I am completely committed to your right to drink yourself into a stupor every night of the week, to toke until your lungs crumble, and indeed, to watch cable television. But I draw the line where your indulgence infringes upon my rights. Don't ask me to shovel you off the street after you've driven drunk. Don't ask me to commit passive suicide by breathing your cigarette smoke. And don't ask me to pay for your cable. I will not be responsible for your stupidity.

Most Sincerely,

ment of ties, cigars and sport coats, these are not representative of a dilemma, but rather they are me, just as they have been long before my arrival at Washington College. Perhaps the most insulting remark made in Mr. Winkleman's letter was his suggestion that my involvement in drug and alcohol rehabilitation is the product of one death this summer. He failed to mention the ninety-nine speeches and presentations that I have given during the past seven years all along the east coast of the U.S. He also failed to mention my life long involvement with drugs as a family member of a recovering addict. Let's face it, he failed to mention a lot. Lastly as for his suggestion to ease up and "be twenty for once on my life." Thanks Mike, I'll consider it.

There is currently much rumor and speculation as to my involvement with a recent "unsigned" letter to the editor. There is also a wide belief that I am the sole author of one letter which is not going to be published. Funny people are so wiling to place blame, without having any concept of the facts. They are willing to deal with the extraneous subjects, without attacking the core of the problem. While I am guilty of knowing who wrote them, and for submitting them on their behalf, I am guilty of nothing else except holding discussions with them. But, if the people who are both convinced and determined to spread this rumor persist in forcing it into my lap, then I will have no alternative other than to submit my observations with my signature. I can't say as though I can blame these individuals for thinking that I am responsible. After all of the horrible things that I have said and done to hurt them, after betraying their friendships, lying to them and having never tried to help them in any constructive way, who can blame them?

I have been controversial since my first speech at Washington College. You see, I have a funny addiction to reality. In every action that I take, every thing that I say I try to help someone, realistically and as honestly as possible. People do not always interpret these actions as such, but if being thought of in this way is the price that I have to pay for doing some good, then so be it!

Vonnegut's pessimism can hardly be called such. Because the novel takes place in the future, readers may be tempted to interpret it less seriously. The situation Vonnegut describes in Hocus Pocus is a fair prediction for the future as any, perhaps more than most. We have a stubborn tendancy to ignore warnings. Vonnegut has provided us with several. And if the world he describes becomes an actuality, it may make him want to laugh like hell. But he won't.

Judge Thomas Sisk on drunk driving and its unavoidable consequences

By: Renee Guckert and Susie Mazzullo

Judge Thomas Sisk was on campus Wednesday night to talk about the unavoidable consequences of drinking and driving. Judge Sisk has been a district court judge for over nine years and in that time has had many such cases come before him.

Judge Sisk recited for those attending, a few statistics that would show just how serious the alcohol problem is. Among the statistics included was the fact that a larger portion of the population abuses alcohol than ever before and that 50% of these people abuse alcohol on a regular basis. Consequently, alcohol related health problems are ranked number one among all health problems in the United States. Judge Sisk also told of the number of those that were killed in only one year. He claimed that 23,000 were killed and that over 500,000 were injured last year alone, in alcohol related accidents.

He also talked about alcohol and crime. He stated that many of the criminal acts performed today are because of alcohol influence. "Alcohol may be the most important factor in violent crimes," said the Judge. He claims that almost 80% of the judiciary system's workload is alcohol related. More than 41,000 cases of this kind were filed in district court last year.

Following the statistics, Judge Sisk described the consequences of those caught driving under the influence or driving while intoxicated. He explained the options a judge has for first offenders.

Those convicted of driving under the influence(DUI), which means those having a blood alcohol level of less than .10, could be sentenced up to sixty days in jail, given eight points which means an automatic suspension of the driver's license, and fined up to $500.

Those convicted of driving while intoxicated(DWI), which means having a blood

Rugby club obtains funding

By: Susie Mazzullo

Washington College's newly formed rugby football club found themselves victorious this past Saturday at their first rugby match of the year. The game versus Catholic University, located in Washington D.C., Was won by the W.C. men by a score of eight to four. Team President Seth Engel commented that their win was a major upset. "We are a team that has only been together for approximately three weeks and for us to beat a school that has had an established rugby team since 1956 is quite an upset."

The game was indeed one of the brighter moments for the rugby team thus far. Since the team was formed that have met a number of resisting factors. One of their major problems was in acquiring club funding and in securing sponsors so that they would have the funds they needed in order to do such things as paying for the use of Worton fields, maintenance of the field, transportation costs, and so that they could obtain the equipment necessary to put together a rugby team, such as a few rugby balls. Each team member was responsible for paying $60 in club dues but most of that money went to purchasing their uniforms.

Donations to the team were offered by a number of Chestertown businesses. The team was told, however, that they were not allowed to accept these donations. The reason why was supplied by the Development office. According to the rules of club funding, a club is required to submit a list of those businesses or perspective donors that they plan to approach for funding. This list is then subject to approval by the Development office.

The rugby team did not do this but instead went ahead and secured funding without submitting the required list. They did this, however, before knowing the about the specified requirements. It was later de cided by the members of the Development office, following a meeting, that the team would be allowed to keep the donors

Comedian, Bill Goettel, will be visiting the campus on November 8 to present his safer sex game show entitled Groinecology. The presentation will begin at 7:00 pm and will be located in the Hynson Lounge.

The game show panel will consist of volunteers from the student body. A number of sex related topics will be discussed including, how to protect yourself against AIDS, how safe the use of condoms really are regarding preventing pregnancy, how you can tell if you are really in love, whether or not drugs can permanently damage sex, what causes impotency, and a number of other equally interesting subjects.

Bill Goettel is a New York State certified nurse and has special training in the field of health and sexuality. His experience in the field is vast. He has previously worked as a counselor and treated students with sex related problems at Syracuse University. Goettel has also taught a health and sexuality credit course there. He has also hosted a weekly half hour sex education radio program and written a sex question and answer column. Goettel's very popular game show program has been presented at a number of colleges, military bases and national conventions in both the United States and Canada and has received rave reviews.

The Garnett School is still looking for students to help in building their new playground. They especially need volunteerson Wednesday October 31st from 8 am until 5 pm to help organize and unload materials. If you wish to help, you may simply show up at the site.

A turkey of an idea

An article in last week's Elm, entitled "From Chestertown with pride" outlined the efforts of a group of residents of Chestertown to aid the American servicemen in Saudi Arabia by sending them books, magazines, hard candy etc. What I am about to propose is something along those lines.

Every year, the Dining Services hosts its annual Thanksgiving Dinner, complete with turkey and all the trimmings. This year, the Dining Services are soliciting student sentiments about that particular feast. Our choices are the traditional Thanksgiving dinner, or a smorgasbord that would include the traditional turkey, mashed potatoes, cranberry sauce, etc, and a few new additions, such as oyster stew.

In the past, students have been given the option of eating their turkey, which a surprisingly large number do, or donating their turkey to an underprivileged family in the area. Why not extend that choice, for this year, to include the option of sending a turkey over to Saudi Arabia? The servicemen (and women) will be separated from their families at Thanksgiving time, and will miss out on the celebrations at home. What a wonderful show of solidarity for a group of men and women who are over there defending American and other international interests as well as the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

The other question is do we really need to eat a full turkey dinner at College, and then a week later, head home for more, pardon the pun, gobbling? It's just a modest proposal to consider in the days leading up to Thanksgiving.

Garnett school still needs your help

Dear Washington College Students:

Many thanks to all of you who have volunteered to work on Garnett School's Community Playground. We still need volunteers from 8 a.m. to noon and 12:30 to 5 p.m. on Wednesday, October 31. If you are able to help then and didn't sign up, please just show up at the construction site - rain or shine.

All your enthusiastic offers of help are most appreciated, and we are looking forward to seeing you at Garnett next Wednesday.

Lankford defends cable rights

This letter comes in response to Roy Kesey's masterpiece in last week's Elm. Thank you, Mein Fuhrer, for your overbearing display of close-mindedness and ignorance. I wish you luck on your lecture on Lithuania, and I cannot wait to attend your next seminar - "Pomposity and Pretentiousness Personified." The letter was wonderfully written, but would have been far more effective had you kept your overbearing ego in check.

Television, though it may be laced with cheap humor and horrid soap operas, it just as much of a release for most of us as reciting dictionaries is for you. Still, my distress in not with the inability to watch Aerosmith videos on MTV, but the fact that we have been given no choice in the matter. Cable television was taken away from the students two years ago with no warning, and there has been minimal effort to return it despite constant complaints from the student body. We are 19, 20, 21 years old, and we are old enough to make up our own minds. If we want to screw up our lives by watching TV for hours on end, we can. It's our choice and we've made it. The longer the administration continues to prevent students from making their own decisions and show them a lack of respect, the more problems will arise.

My other problem with your letter concerns your lecture on the subject of "normal television." I could only hope to attain your superior taste in television viewing one day.

see LANKFORD, pg 12.

Stu, Stu, please get a clue

A fortnight past I wrote a letter in response to what I considered a pompous article by Mr. Stuart Neiman (i.e. Louis XIV). Last week you were subject to a letter by Mr. Neiman which sucessfully circumvented every detail of my letter and created responses to imaginary attacks on his achievements as monarch. I never once questioned his ability to govern or lecture. We are all impressed by your devotion to tour the East Coast supporting a cause in which you firmly believe. Unfortunately Bingo night was the night you were in my town and I was unable to attend. I simply wanted to remind you that summer is over and if you wish to give another lecture condemning drug and alcohol abuse it should be done as Mr. Neiman the student not Mr. Neiman the almighty despotic monarch of Washington College.

Where in my article did I say the former drug czars that ruled this campus were more efficeint or better equiped in handling the office you have so aptly distorted? You have a firm control over the government and I credit you for your

To the Editor:

Does anyone read The Elm before they take it to be printed? Every week, there are a myriad of mistakes printed that could be cleverly avoided if only someone would glance over the paper once or twice before they trundled it off to the printer. Proofreading is not a difficult practice - I first "heard tell" of it in the second grade, at which time I was given a detention for my lack of attentiveness in performing this most basic of tasks. Since then, it has become an integral part of the completion of any writing project that I undertake.

One of my favorite mistakes of the most recent edition comes from Stuart Neiman's letter to the editor. It reads, "There have been only two additions of the Elm..." Come on guys, someone should have caught this one. The mistake is contained in a term that is newspaper jargon! The correct term would have been editions.

I admire those people who dedicate their time and effort to working on our school's paper. I thank them for giving me an entertaining punctuation to my Fridays. The mistakes are especially bothersome to me because, as a tour guide, I actually give this paper to people outside of the Washington College community. I then tell them that W.C. is known for it's exceptional English department, writing lab, Sophie Kerr Prize, etc. When they go home

Issue: Do you believe in the Great Pumpkin, why or why not?

Greatus Pumpkinum est!

Carolin Leibig

Halloween is once again just around the corner and we are faced with that age old question: Does the Great Pumpkin really exist? This mystery has puzzled mankind since the dawn of time and some of the most influential thinkers in history have, well, thought about it. Wasn't it Julius Caesar who said "Dumum pluribum greatus pumkinum est!" He was a firm believer in the Great Pumpkin. As was Ivan the Terrible, Czar of Russia, who, despite being terrible, liked to go sit in the pumpkin patch on Halloween night waiting for the Great Pumpkin to bring presents to all the good girls and boys all over the world. Ivan never received any presents because he was terrible, but that is not really the point here. During the middle ages there were literally thousands of Great Pumpkin sightings and although many skeptics contend that medieval people thought they saw alot of things, new evidence published in Secrets of the Unknown, from Time/Life books, shows conclusively and definitively that there is a chance that it really could have been the Great Pumpkin. In 1776, George Washington suggested making the Great Pumpkin the national symbol, contending that he, too, could fly, but he was out voted and now there is an Eagle on top of the flagpole instead of the Great Pumpkin. So it was not until Napoleonic era that the existence of the Great Pumpkin was officially acknowledged. Napoleon signed Le Decreé du Pumpkin Grand in 1799, thus making pumpkin patch sitting the national pastime in France. There have been very few incidents of the Great Pumpkin actually interacting with people. But the most famous account is that of Mildred Kürbis of Bumpkinshire-on-the-Rather-Plesant-Bank-of-the-River, England. It is said that on the night of October 31, 1867, Mrs. Kürbis had a lovely dinner of Fish and Chips with the Great Pumpkin. Afterward she was quoted as saying: "The Great Pumpkin is very kind and giving, but needs help with it's table manners." Several U.S. Presidents, including Franklin Roosevelt, Eisenhower, and Nixon spent at least one Halloween while in office sitting in the White House Pumpkin Patch. Ronald Reagan went so far as to ask his astrologer to contact the Great Pumpkin for advice on issues of international importance. But apparently the Big Orange One has so far declined to enter politics. So much for the historical significance of the Great Pumpkin. On to a more personal view of this important issue.

I know very few people who don't at least want to believe in the Great Pumpkin. I believe in it. Just like I believe in Santa Claus and the Easter Bunny. I don't believe that there really is one of each, in fact I think there are literally billions of them. Each one, in one form or another (it doesn't have to be Santa Claus or the Easter Bunny in particular) is embodied in all of us. We all have the spirit of giving at sometime, and we give either something material or, more importantly, of ourselves. There you have it, I'm a believer in the Great Pumpkin as a manifestation of the good in all of us...Now that the mushy stuff is over, we can get on with the business of having a Happy Halloween. Trick-or-Treat!!

Do you believe in the Great Pumpkin??

Emily Daignault

As a child I remember sitting in front of our television awaiting the arrival of a sign that a Charlie Brown special was coming on. You know, the commercials, the terrible jingle and 'SPECIAL' spiraling towards you in a rainbow of colors. CBS was yet again airing a seasonal Charlie Brown episode. The most poignant drama of all these masterpieces of animation, was the heart warming saga of The Great Pumpkin. Just in case you didn't witness this colossal event, the plot revolves around Linus, and his belief in the Great Pumpkin, the Halloween entity that each year brings good cheer to small children.

But my purpose is not to recap the show, but to tell you if I believe in the Great Pumpkin. I must say that when I was younger, the faith that Linus had in the reality of the Great Pumpkin, reflected back into my beliefs. At that time I was as ready as Linus to go and sit out in a pumpkin patch in my cotton shirt and polyester pants waiting to see The Great Pumpkin, but as I grew older my views changed. I no longer wear polyester, nor am I as ready to sit in a pumpkin patch waiting for a mythical being. This is not to say that I do not believe in the Great Pumpkin, but rather that I do not believe in freezing my butt off in a pumpkin patch.

I believe in the Great Pumpkin because I believe in the magic of childhood experiences. I do not believe that a childhood should be forgotten, or pushed away just because of the passing of time, and the growing of bones. One should allow himself to let loose the child inside of him at any time. Maybe just for a little while, but enough to be a kid again. Therefore I believe in The Great Pumpkin, Santa Claus, The Easter Bunny, and many other mystical childhood beings, when I let my thoughts go back to my earlier years. Should I really let myself venture down memory lane? Is it right for a nineteen year-old to act like a five year old now and then? Well why not?

The fate of Linus Van Pelt is that of a cold night of waiting to see The Great Pumpkin, whom he never sees. But yet, we see Linus waiting in the same pumpkin patch, on the same network, every year for as long as I can remember. If Linus has the faith to return every year to sit out a cold night waiting, then I can let loose my childhood wishes every now and then. Maybe he and I will see the Great Pumpkin one day. Maybe.

Emily Daignault is a freshmen who hopes to major in English.

OUTLOOK

In the world: Democrats rebel against budget proposal

United States

Democrats rebelled Wednesday against a deficit-reduction plan that had been outlined by House Democratic leaders in a closed-door meeting. House and Senate negotiators are scrambling in an effort to assemble a budget deal that could win congressional endorsement before midnight Wednesday when the government is scheduled to run out of money and suspend nearly all its operations if an agreement has not been reached. The presented deficit proposal plan would increase taxes, cut such benefit programs as Medicare, and supposedly trim the federal deficit by $500 billion over 5 years.

Iraq

Iraq released 14 American men this week, including 6 with medical problems and agreed to free all 330 French Citizens and 33 Britons trapped after Iraq overran Kuwait. The Iraqi government, however, continues to refuse to permit any of the 106 American detainees or the remaining Americans held in Kuwait to depart.

The United States continues to prefer to rely on trade sanctions and diplomacy to pressure Iraqi troops into leaving Kuwait, however, according to a US official, the US-led international alliance could choose the military option at any time without further provocation by Iraq. Although more time is needed to tell how great the chances of a war are, the alliance would not be deterred from using force so long as most of the allies agreed such action was needed.

China

The European Community of Foreign Ministers agreed this week to cease economic sanctions against China imposed after last year's army crackdown on demonstrators for democracy. The move reflects China's improved international standing because of her cooperation with the West in the Persian Gulf Crisis and in efforts to end civil war in Cambodia. Relations with Japan and the US are steadily improving as well.

Germany

The new German government has uncovered 178 spies planted by the Communist regime of what was East Germany before its collapse a year ago, and officials say more arrests will follow. Since reunification on October 3, 1990, arrests average almost one a day. The arrests have shown that East Berlin had penetrated the top echelons of Bonn's three spy networks.

Soviet Union

The new Soviet freedoms have lead to a surge of Islam in the USSR. Mosques are being reopened at the rate of one a day, hundreds of students have enrolled in theological colleges, and millions of copies of the Koran and other Moslem works are being distributed throughout the country. One Mosque, closed over seven decades ago and converted in turn into a warehouse, a children's bookshop, and a teahouse, was reopened for worship this year.

Japan

Protests against Japan erupted this week in Taiwan, Hong Kong, and China, triggered by a clash over the 8 small islands comprising the Senkaku Islands 120 miles Northwest of Taiwan. The United States returned these islands to Japan in the early 1970s at which time it gave its official approval to Japan's claim to the islands which dates to the late 19th century. Both Taiwan and China also lay claim to the islands.

Israel

Israel has closed its borders to Palestinians in a reaction to increasing violence, a practice previously reserved for exceptional occasions such as the annual Jewish holiday of Yom Kippur.

The squabble over coffee continues

By TOM GREENWOOD

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

U.S. coffeedrinkers have been wondering whether coffee is friend or foe since 1972, when doctors, researchers, scientists and granola-fueled health advocates began arguing about supposed health risks attached to coffee drinking.

Research statements about coffee are endless:

"It's unsafe to drink." "No it's not."

"It causes birth defects and heart attacks." "Not necessarily, more research needs to be done."

"It raises serum cholesterol in the blood." "No it doesn't. It's the coffee cream that raises cholesterol." "Oh yeah, well I think it cures cold sores!"

In the last 30 years, coffee has made more comebacks than Sugar Ray Leonard.

The coffee brew-haha started 28 years ago, when a Boston research group warned of a possible link (there's never anything absolute about these reports. They're always "links" or "inklings of a link." Scientifically, this is known as a "linkling") between coffee and an increased risk of heart attacks.

Two years later, the Boston University Framingham Heart Study concluded there was evidence to support the idea that coffee contributes to arterioscleroses.

Since then, the number of contradictory coffee reports have multiplied faster than zebra mussels. In 1990 alone, reports have been issued solemnly stating – among other things – that: Elderly coffee drinkers are more sexually active than noncoffee drinkers. Drinking coffee in the morning really does make you feel better and more alert. Coffee, particularly boiled coffee, increases blood cholesterol levels. Coffee might protect against cancer of the colon and rectum. Coffee might be related to cancer of the bladder. Coffee can magnify the effects of stress. Coffee can increase the risk of heart attack.

Coffee does not increase the risk of heart attack, though decaffeinated coffee may increase the risk of heart attack. This latest statement, from Harvard University, and based on studies of more than 45,000 men, was released last week and made front-page headlines.

What we want to know is, "Can I drink this stuff or not?"

The National Coffee Association in New York would appreciate it if you did, but they have become resigned to the controversy after nearly three decades of attacks.

George Boecklin, the association's president, has taken a pledge of silence until a panel of scientific experts reviews the study.

"We'd rather not go off half-cocked," he said with a sigh.

A more militant approach was taken in 1981 by William Black, board chairman of the Chock Full O' Nuts coffee company, who placed ads in papers questioning the validity of studies linking coffee to cancer of the pancreas. Among his arguments was that animals get pancreatic cancer, but "they don't drink coffee."

That's not quite right, Bill. There are animals that like coffee with their Kibble N Bits. Of course, they are talking about laboratory rats, the junk food junkies of the animal world. Read on.

In 1980, the Food and Drug Administration said pregnant women should avoid caffeine on the basis of an FDA experiment in which pregnant rats were force-fed through a stomach tube the equivalent of 87 cups of strong coffee, and subsequently gave birth to offspring with missing toes.

This theory was discounted when the FDA later said that rats who orally consumed the same amount of coffee at a steady rate suffered no birth defects. Common sense might also suggest that 87 cups of strong, force-fed, stomach-tubed coffee also would produce birth defects in a brontosaurus.

In 1977, a woman wrote to The Detroit News health page asking for advice.

She wondered if her heart palpitations could be traced to her daily (steady now) coffee enema that she retained for 15 minutes.

Indeed, responded the amazed medical columnist, who said caffeine can be absorbed through the bowels and could, in large amounts, cause atrial fibrillations. He also said the woman's cleansing ritual was "nutty" and advised her to discontinue it.

There's more. In June 1983, Norwegian researchers reported a "link" between heavy coffee drinking and increased cholesterol. The study was based on 14,000 people who averaged more than nine cups of strong coffee a day. That's a minimum of at least 72 ounces of coffee, folks. Hardy people, those Norwegians.

The average American drinking more than half-gallon of high-test, freeze-dried, flavor-crystalized "I-like-mine-black-with-four-spoons-of-sugar" Colombian mud probably would end up jitterbugging like James Brown in tight shoes.

Finally, on March 21, 1981, Carina Nilsson Regner died in Limhamm, Sweden, at the age of 109. Before her death, she attributed to her long life to hard work and "lots of coffee."

It was also noted she was also a widow for the final 82 years of her life.

In summation, the question about the safety of drinking coffee is still as clear as a cup of cappuccino. But Americans can rest assured this story is the last, latest and final story "linking" coffee to any real or imagined health risks.

Until tomorrow.

Trying to stretch dollars when you're computer shopping doesn't mean you're willing to make sacrifices.

That's why you should consider the new, affordable Macintosh® Classic® computer.

It has everything you need—including a monitor, keyboard, mouse, 2 megabytes of RAM, and a 40-megabyte hard disk. Just plug everything in and the Macintosh Classic is ready to run, because the system software is already installed.* And, thanks to the Macintosh computer's legendary ease of use, you'll be up and running in no time.

Like every Macintosh, the Classic can run thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. And this is one cheap roommate that doesn't have trouble sharing. The Apple® SuperDrive™—standard equipment with every Macintosh—reads from and writes to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks, which means you can share information with someone who uses a different type of computer.

See the Macintosh Classic for yourself. It'll change your mind about cheap roommates.

The Ghost of Reid Hall, and other Hallowe'en fun

by Laura Hopper

As Hallowe'en approaches, and Jack o'lanterns appear in windows and on porches, Trick or Treaters dust off their costumes, and candy sales skyrocket, thoughts turn naturally to the creatures of the supernatural– vampires, zombies, monsters of every size, shape and kind, and, of course, ghosts.

Into this supernaturally charged atmosphere come many tales of the unknown– as told by such experts as Steven King and Peter Straub. For a real Hallowe'en scare, rent the movie version or Straub's novel, Ghost Story. Invite some friends over, light a few candles, and get ready for a chilling tale of ghosts and revenge. The more adventurous might try holding a seance.

But not to be outdone, the Elm has striven to bring to you the unconfirmed, but supposedly true story of the Ghost of Reid Hall.

Reid Hall is the oldest women's residence hall on campus. First built in 1896, Normal Hall had only two full floors. In 1930, the north end, third floor and attic were added on, and the building was renamed Reid Hall.

The story goes that the women liked to climb up through a hole in the third floor ceiling into the attic to hold parties and drink, and that one night a young woman fell, or jumped, off the top of the building, and died. This poor, unfortunate soul is reportedly the Ghost of Reid Hall.

The Ghost went through her most active stage from the Fall of 1986 to the Spring of 1987. That academic year, Minta Martin was closed for renovation. One resident of the third floor of Reid Hall told the housekeeper that while she was sleeping, someone or something had flipped her over onto her stomach, and pressed her face into the pillow. She woke up feeling the pressure of a hand on the back of her head, yet when she turned around, no one was there.

Another resident felt that the spirit was benevolent. She claimed she would be woken up by someone stroking her hair, yet again, when she looked, there was no one to be found.

The same year, a television set slid off a dresser, not once, but twice. The first time it landed in a basket of laundry one of the occupants had placed in front of the dresser. The second time it landed on the floor. The only damage to the television was a white spot in the center of the screen.

These occurrences all took place at the south end of the third floor, near the entrance to the attic and at roughly the same time, between 5 and 7 in the morning. At one point, a cover was placed over the entrance. A few days later, one of the residents alerted the housekeeper that the cover had been moved. It was resting on the floor of the attic, next to the hole. The housekeeper then had locks placed on the cover and the occurrences stopped.

The following year, however, the spirit was back. residents claimed that their door would lock by itself. The closet door would open and close, and an alarm clock would go off at 4 A.M.. when it had been set for 7, or even when it had been turned off. This was the year the renovation of Reid Hall was begun. Among the improvements to the building were carpeted halls, and lowered ceilings. The entrance to the attic was covered by the false ceiling. The attic is now reputed to be the home of several bats, and the scariest sound heard in the building is not ghostly footsteps, but the eerie wail of the wind, as it blows around the building.

But for those students seeking a little All Hallow's Eve fun, the flesh and blood residents of Somerset House will host the second annual Somerset haunted house on the evening of the 31st from 7:30 to 9:30 P.M. The haunted house is free to students, faculty and children of all ages. There is no admission fee, although donations of blood and organs will not be turned down. When asked how utterly frightening the haunted house would be, RA Brian Gimelson said that it was approved for all ages, and "We dare you to come!"

For the more literary minded, the O'Neal Literary House will be sponsoring their annual Hallowe'en reading, and for all you bloodsuckers, the International House will be showing that vampire classic, Nosferatu, in the International House Lounge (see Arts and Entertainment for more details.)

In all, Hallowe'en at Washington College, is a spooky, fun-filled affair. Enjoy the full flavor of the season, and please, don't drink and drive.

Turtles and mermaids, the hottest trends in Hallowe'en costumes

By DONNA GABLE

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

Out of the sewers and into the streets: The Ninja Turtles are conquering Halloween, trampling Batman and Dick Tracy as the top costume choice.

"Every fifth phone call, someone wants to know about the Ninja Turtles," says Erna Prickett of Costume Associates Inc., Greenville, S.C.

Kids are clamoring for turtle togs that double as playsuits, says Cindy Smith of Collegeville (Pa.) Flag and Manufacturing Company, the official licensee ($20-$30 for fabric; $6-$8 for vinyl; masks are $10-$16).

And little girls love the Little Mermaid, says Bonnie Cat of Costume World Inc., Pompano Beach, Fla. ($40 purchase for kids; $55 rental for adults.

Also coming on strong: Bart Simpson and his blue-haired mama, Marge.

The popularity of such characters reflects a shift "from the ghoulish and gory and toward the whimsical," says Sherry Timbrook of Hallmark.

The gobs-of-gore look is gone with the wind for adults, too: "The Civil War" series on PBS inspired early reservations for Southern belle costumes and Civil War uniforms – primarily rebels – says Kathryn Felgenhauer of Broadway Costumes, Sacramento, Calif.

Storybook characters, harem girls and other masquerade standbys are back in favor, too, says Rosanne Marberg of Costumes on 7th, St. Cloud, Minn.

Costume shop prices: From $25 to $350 for specialty rentals; $10 to $150 to purchase ready-made costumes and 50 cents to $60 for accessories and masks.

Slice spins a fictional Halloween yarn

Phil "Slice" Macek

It was a brisk Halloween night and I was physically and mentally drained as I walked back to campus from the High Street movie theater. You see, I had just spent the last two hours checking out the latest and greatest flick from America's new tough guy—Doug Cater. I highly recommend this action-packed, hundred thrills a minute, totally riveting, overwhelmingly powerful action-drama, appropriately entitled, Rebel Without A Clue. Not to give away the plot or anything, but Doug accidentally stumbles onto a terrorist plot to assassinate the President while vacationing down in Rio. He learns that the plot is to be executed while the President is on his way to Galena, the site of his next summit with Stu Neiman. Hence, Doug sets out to thwart the plot and bring the wrongdoers to justice. Of course, ole' Doug "hide the women and pour the whiskey" Cater gets into a herculean life and death struggle with the plot's mastermind, brilliantly played by Dom Deluise, and his burly henchmen, Gary Coleman and Don Knotts. I'm not going to give away the ending, so if you want to know anymore you're going to have see the movie. It really is unbelievable.

Anyway, as I said, I was so totally drained after seeing this cinematic masterpiece that I planned to spend the rest of this Halloween in a deep slumber. As I walked numbly back to my room I ran into my best friend and roommate Eric.

"Where are you off to?" I inquired listlessly.

"Dude, killer bash tonight down at Jason's place on High Street. Come on along if you want, but don't forget to wear a costume."

"Oh yeah? Well where's your costume?"

"Dude, I'm just gonna put a pair of shorts on my head and go as an a—. Are you gonna show up or what?"

"No, I think I'll pass." Although I did briefly entertain the notion of going to a novelty store and renting a gorilla suit.

I watched Eric until he was out of sight. He was a good friend, but an incurable practical joker. I kept this in mind as I entered the room. I clearly remember Eric's gag from last Halloween that had scared the living hell out of me. He had made a replica of a human finger out of clay that looked amazingly life-like after he got done painting it. Anyway he took this finger, covered it with Dining Hall ketchup, (a good choice, because everyone knows that Dining Hall ketchup, if left undisturbed, will eventually clot like real blood) and put it on the floor in the middle of our room. When I came in and saw somebody's missing digit on my floor I became too shocked to move. That's when Eric came running in with his hand wrapped up in a blood-soaked (or so I thought it was blood) towel. Hysterically, he told me that he had been sharpening his hunting knife when it suddenly slipped and proceeded to slice right through and sever his left index finger right below the first knuckle. When I eventually found out the truth, through Eric's uncontrollable peals of laughter, I vowed never to speak to him again.

I kept this all in mind as I flopped onto my bed, ready for some much needed sleep. However, my eye caught sight of something very strange in my wastebasket-it was a human head stained with rust colored dried blood.

"Very funny Eric" I said out loud. "This beats the finger trick by a mile."

Upon closer inspection, I found that the head looked exactly like Johnny Miles, the hall's R.A. I must admit that I never did like Johnny too much, and thought of seeing his head rolling around in the bottom of a wastebasket had a certain kind of demonic appeal to me.

I put my hand into the basket to further admire Eric's precision in this uncanny representation of Johnny when I—the head was real. The flesh was cold, clammy, and drawn tight. The eyes were glazed and open as far as they possibly could have been, and tendons as well as loose strands of skin hung down from the base of the neck where this bloody butchering had taken place. Johnny's mouth was completely open and little trickles of dried blood hung down from the corners. It seemed clear to me that Johnny was trying to scream like hell before his throat was ripped out.

The room was hot and stuffy but I couldn't keep from shivering. The thought of Eric cutting up Johnny and then hiding his head in my wastebasket left me cold. I guess Eric must have been hiding the evidence until later so he could dispose of it without being seen. I wasn't about to go near the closets. I could just picture Johnny's headless corpse dressed up in my best suit and posed in some dramatic fashion like it was going to be on the cover of GQ™ or Esquire.™

I decided to take matters into my own hands and get rid of the head myself. The thought of having my R.A.'s head in my room chilled my bones. Besides, if I was around when Eric returned, I might become the next exhibit in his twisted, macabre, avant-garde art show.

I picked up the wastebasket like I was picking up a newborn baby. I crossed the room and stepped into the hall with my arms full. The hall was deserted and eerily quiet and I wondered what Eric had done with the other residents. However, this is Washington College, and reason dictates that most of them went home just out of sheer boredom.

I hurried outside and made my way towards the big rusted dumpster behind our dorm. The sharp wind dried the sweat on my skin and in trying to look calm and in control, I stopped myself from breaking into a total sprint.

"Hi there."

I spun around without grace, almost letting Johnny's head loose, kind of like a grotesque bowling ball with the nostrils and mouth serving as fingerholes, and found myself staring into the face of Sally Perkins. I hated Sally like I had hated Johnny, ever since she had ratted on me for cheating on a philosophy quiz during freshman year. But I tried to remain calm and suave, after all, I was holding a guy's head in my hands.

"Hi Sally" I managed weakly.

"What'cha got there? Can I sneak a peek?"

Before I could react, Sally peered into the wastebasket and as I saw Johnny's face reflected in her paralyzed eyes, she opened her mouth for one God-almighty, panic-stricken yell. And as I reached around my side, finding the concealed, blood-stained knife for the second time that day, plunging it savagely into Sally's warm, soft, milky-white flesh, I asked myself the same question I had raised when I killed Johnny, "Why do they always try to scream?"

Sally's body dropped roughly to the ground missing its head and I strolled off to find more people that I hated.

Pumpkin carving and care tips

Knives suitable for hand-to-hand combat in the Peloponnesian War are not the best tools for carving a pumpkin.

"The biggest mistake people make when carving is looking at a pumpkin and thinking this great big piece of God's creation requires a great big knife," says Gordy Falk, one of the nation's foremost experts on jack-o'-lanterns.

Large knives "doom you to carve straight lines," says the 47-year-old Milwaukee resident, who carves between 500 and 800 jack-o'-lanterns each Halloween for his front yard.

Falk believes in using short, skinny cheese or fruit knives; they permit him to make curves and lend character to facial features.

Here are other carving and pumpkin preservation tips from Falk, whose 30-minute video, "How to Carve Great Faces for Halloween," is on sale for $10 to $12 in Woolworth's, Waldenbooks and video stores:

— Cut around the stem at a 45-degree angle so that as the pumpkin sits on the porch, drying in the sun, the top will not cave in.

— A large knife is helpful for leveling a pumpkin bottom so that the face looks out at you, rather than down at the Earth's crust.

— A long-handled metal spoon is the best tool for scooping out seeds.

— Before carving, draw the face with a washable felt-tip marker. To ensure that the features are not too small, make a trial cut in the pumpkin's backside, carving the smallest possible circle. Redraw the features if they have a smaller radius than your circle.

— Don't be afraid to make the features big. Size gives your lantern personality.

— Cut using a sawing motion. This makes it easier to sculpt fluid lines.

— Don't worry about mistakes. They often can be fixed, using toothpicks to reattach pieces that were mistakenly slashed. Toothpicks strategically placed on the inside shell can shore up a wobbly face.

— Perfect symmetry isn't necessary or always desirable in facial features. Skewed eyes, nose and mouth lend personality.

— Cut the smallest features (eyes, eyebrows and nose) first. These require sharp twists and turns. They are hard to execute if you've already done the mouth, which takes away a large chunk of pulp and tends to weaken the face, making the shell delicate to manipulate.

— Heat is the No. 1 enemy of pumpkins. To protect against heat from the candle leave 5 inches from the top of the flame to bottom of the lid. Cut a tiny hole or vent in the lid above the candle flame.

— To preserve a pumpkin against drying from the sun, put petroleum jelly on cut edges. To protect against the formation of mold, swish a tablespoon of bleach around the inside.

Field hockey completes best season

Matt Giller

The Shorewomen from across the tracks completed their finest season of all time this week by making their first appearance in the MAC tournament and finishing with an impressive 10-3-1 record.

Last Thursday, two days after defeating Widener and clinch an MAC berth, W.C. faced off against Swarthmore. Amy McCleary's goal off the feed from Marie Mohler with 10:12 remaining in the first half was all that was needed for the Shorewomen on this occasion.

While Washington College peppered Swarthmore with 28 shots, their relentless defense and overpowering offense prevented the visitors to attempt a single shot.

W.C. then took their show on the road to play Western Maryland and complete their regular season. Mohler opened the scoring for the Shorewomen. However, Western Maryland bounced back and evened up the count 1-1. Unfortunately for the home team they ran into a buzz saw dressed in maroon. The W.C.'s defense held W.M.'s offense in check for the remainder of the game while Caroline Jensen capitalized on a centering pass from Jen Blenckstone for the game-winner. Brigid DeVries needed to make saves in this game steering away 4 shots.

This past Monday, the Shorewomen headed north to Muhlenburg to face off in their first MAC appearance. The Women from the Shore and the Mules dueled to a 1-1 tie through regulation time. However, in the second overtime, which is played to a sudden death, the Mules ended the scoring drought and the game, and unfortunately the brilliant season for the WAC. For seniors Amy Tiehel, Erin O'Neal, and Donna White it was a culmination of brilliant careers that provided dramatic improvements in the quality of the program that can now be considered a national power. The Shorewomen, incidentally, finished #14 in the final national rankings. Congratulations!

Rugby wins 1st game

By Sam Gessner

This past Saturday, the Washington College Rugby Club marched to victory in its inaugural match against Catholic University, winning by the score 8-4.

Against a more experienced Catholic side, the Washington forwards, led by Frank Crivelli and Matt Wickwire, quickly took control and dominated play throughout the game. The back line, led by Eric Bach and team president/ founding father Seth Engel played a solid defensive game keeping the Cathloic backs in check.

Bach contributed all eight of the WAC points scoring two trys, one after a brilliant 60 yard run by flanker Matt Giller.

The Washington B side's debut was less auspicious, losing to a combined team of Catholic and American University A-side players.

The B-side will feast revenge on the Chesapeake Club Saturday, while the A-side attempts to remain undefeated against Delaware sunday at 12:30 at Worton Park.

A refreshed Sabha returns

The Great Sabha is back from his two week hiatus from the Elm's sports staff. The Great One took the red-eye home early this week to meet his deadline. He arrived from Saudi Arabia where he spent a week entertaining the courageous troops by singing to them. Anyway, his prophetic senses have been well rested so get the phone and call Pete Rose's bookies and lay some gentlemen's bets down.

Soccer ends losing streak

By Matt Giller

Last weekend the Shoremen booters had their eight game skid and compiling a 1-1-1 record improving to a 3-11-2 overall record.

On October 13 W.C. traveled down to Greensboro, N.C. to face off against Guilford College. Senior All-Everything Mike Bishop had an assist and a goal to power the Shoremen offense. Freshman Chris Graham had the other goal while sophomore goaltender Kyle Hutchinson made 8 saves, including a crucial penalty shot save in the second half.

Obviously this tie got the ball rolling as they played host to the Widener Golden Bears. The Shoremen apparently toyed with their guests through regulation and almost two overtimes in attempt to make their bus ride home a little longer. With 3:06 remaining in the second overtime, Bishop ended the charade with a rocket that tore a gaping hole in the net at the rear of the goal. Hutchinson aided in sealing their first "W" since September 13 by turning aside all 11 shots he faced(or headed).

Last Saturday the Shoremen were greeted by a frenzied homecoming crowd at Elizabethtown. The Shoremen may have been caught looking ahead of this game, however, to the Haverford showdown. Undaunted by the #1 ranking the "Lizzes" were boasting, the WACkers played tough. However, the maroon marauders fell victim to a few tough calls and were subsequently upended 6-0.

The Shoremen's home schedule is completed, however, they still have rival Johns Hopkins and the Techies of Delaware Valley to play on the road.

Lacrosse cancelled

The fall lacrosse tournament scheduled to be held at Washington College, October 27, has been cancelled due to an illness in the family of W.C. head coach Terry Corcoran.

Teams From Maryland, Duke, Georgetown, Loyola, and Delaware had been scheduled to compete.

"Because the tournament was being held out of the season, and due to the severity of the circumstance, we felt it prudent not to go ahead with the event in Coach Corcoran's abscence," said Washington Athletic Director Geoffrey Miller.

Tennis: Read wins National Title in Texas

By Fred Wyman

Last weekend two of Washington College's finest tennis players, Tracy Peel and Scott Read, competed in the Rolex National Small College Tennis Championships held in Corpus Christi, Texas. These championships is the only collegiate sporting event in the country in which athletes from Division III, Division II, NAIA, and Junior College have the opportunity to vie for a true national championship. The unique three day tournament began with an 8 player singles field for each of the 4 divisions. These divisional champios then met in a "Super Bowl" of small college tennis to ultimately crown a men's and women's National Small College Champion.

The 64 players competing represented 16 states and 16 countries ranging from New Hampshire to Washington state and Antigua to Cyprus. Read earned his ticket to Corpus Christi by winning the Rolex Southeast region while Peel was the Northeast regional champion.

After finishing as last year's NCAA Division III singles runner-up, Read took his first step in realizing his dream of winning the 1991 National Championship by capturing the coveted Rolex-ITCA Division III National title. Read lost in the NCAA championship match to teammate and doubles partner Larry Gewer in May. It was only fitting that Read won his first National Title in his home state of Texas. The pressure of upholding his preseason #1 ranking coupled with playing in front of many friends and relatives nearly cost Read his first match as the slender southpaw struggled to edge Gordon Reid of Gustavus Adolphus, 6-3, 3-6, 6-4. His semifinal match proved to be easier as the W.C. senior ripped Dave Maldawer of UC Santa Cruz, 6-3, 6-0.

The finals pitted Read against old nemesis Gavin O'Connell of Emory University. O'Connell is one of only three Division III players(Santa Cruz's Chad Andrews and Gewer are the other two) to beat the senior Shoreman. The hard-hitting O'Connell stopped Read at his first National Tournament in 1988; however, at last year's NCAA's, Read avenged that defeat by downing O'Connell in the team event.

The first set was tight. Trailing 3-5, O'Connell drew even to force a tiebreaker. Despite being called for a foot-fault at 6-5 and set point, W.C.'s Read rallied to win the next 2 points and the gain the first set. The second set was no contest as Read moved into the "Super Bowl" round by whipping O'Connell 6-2.

On "SUper Sunday" Read fell to NAIA titlest Eric Hochman of the University of West Florida 7-5, 6-4. Read was up 5-3 in the first set and 3-2 in the second set but was unable to close either set. Read had been undefeated for the fall going 12-0 with 2 other singles titles to his credit.

The Division III women's field was by far the strongest in the tournament as 5 of the nation's top 6 players were in the draw. Despite being an NCAA III finalist and having achieved a final national ranking of #2, Tracy Peel was not seeded was not seeded while Adolphus's Amy McCrea(6th in 1990) and Pomona's Shelly Keeler(7th in 1990) were the #1 and 2 seeds respectively. This seeding selection was a mystery to W.C. coach Holly Bramble as well as everyone else at the tournament.

Undaunted, Peel ousted Robin Inaba of UC San Diego in straight sets, 6-2, 6-2, in the first round; however, the two-time All-American had to use all of her stamina and will power in the semifinals to outlast McCrea, 5-7, 6-4, 6-4, to gain the finals.

While Peel had to win a three-hour marathon to advance, Keeler was making short work of her opponents as she did not lose a single game enroute to the finals. In the finals Keeler started the match where she had left off as she blanked Peel 6-0 in the first frame. With the score tied at 5 all in the second, Peel had a chance to break Keeler's serve; however, the Shore netter could not convert the opportunity as Keeler Held and then broke Peel for the game, set, match, and championship.

Men Without Shadows

by Bruce Hamilton

"It's a good play for Halloween," says Jacque Collins, in reference to J.P. Sartre's "Men Without Shadows". Collins is directing the play as part of her senior project and also designed the set. She chose the play last July while she was abroad at Oxford. "I was reflecting back on the year and my own anger at feeling isolated," she says. The play is for her a representation of the infinte array of possibilities in life, the idea that we make our own choices. Not only do we make our own choices, but we are capable also of creating our own isolation.

The play echoes this idea. Set in France in 1944, the main conflict in the play is between members of the French resistance and the torturers of Vichy. Through the dialouge we become aware that the members of the resistance are often their own torturers, or have once been the torturers. Collins says she has taken the play out of it's original setting and made it more surreal, so that the events in the play might be viewed as analogous with events concurrent with todays society.

Written by Sartre in 1946 and first performed in 1948 in the United States, "Men Without Shadows" is a play based on extreme situations. There's a lot of death, blood, gore and torture, according to Collins. It's a play that could be viewed as an "existential self-evaluation". "It's the first set that I designed and has actually been built," says Collins.

There's a web on the floor of the stage which connects both rooms which becomes representative of a web of isolation, yet is also a web of deceit, fear and ignorance. There's a wall on the set in the back of both rooms. None of the characters know what's beyond this wall, and it becomes representative of the uncertainty of life and the future.

There are a couple of new actors in the production that had never before done anything on stage. Collins says that they have "achieved exact characterizations that include parts of themselves." The cast consists of Deidre Riegel, Rob Thompson, Matthew Kineke, Stephanie Hess, Brett Lankford, Martin T. Buinicki, Jonathan Newell, Liam R. Kennedy, Andrew Chandler, and Mike Spry. Lisa Woodcock is the Stage Manager for the play and Jason West is the Technical Director. "Men Without Shadows" will be shown on Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Tawes Theater at 8:00 p.m.

Nosferatu bites in black and white

by Chris Goldenberg

One of the classic films in the horror genre of this century is Nosferatu, (the German word for "vampire") which will be shown in the International House basement next Saturday night in celebration of Halloween. This 1922 production is the first film on the subject of vampires, based on Bram Stoker's foundational novel Dracula. The movie is black and white, of course, and devoid of sound except fro the ominous musical score which accompanies the film. Despite the lack of dialogue, there are captions presented through the movie to provide the viewer with some insight into the characters' conversation.

The Bram Stoker novel is the basis for the film's plot: a mast ship is discovered docked at a port of a small German town with the captain and his crew all dead, each bearing tiny unexplainable punctures in their necks. Thus the terror of Dracula, or Nosferatu, begins as the undead being probes the town for a young vibrant woman to be his unholy bride.

The movie, however, does have several flaws noticeable in this day and age. It is often difficult to follow the plot details or the dialogue of the characters even though there are panels of captions flashed in various intervals of the film. The captions are helpful, but during some moments the viewer must deduce what is happening from the movie's plot.

Some of the scenes in the movie even appear comical, unfortunately, when observed over sixty years later by the average person. One scene involves Nosferatu (portrayed by Max Schreck) entertaining a visitor in his castle. The vampire notices the man has a photograph of his wife in his hands. Nosferatu immediately snatches the picture from his guest and the next frame of the movie reads "Is that your wife? She has a lovely throat."

Another seemingly comical scene occurs after Nosferatu has already entered the small German town. He is seen lurking down the street with a smug leer upon his face, carrying a coffin across the road. I guess that they didn't have U-Hauls back then...

Despite the defects in plot, the bad lighting, and the jerky movements of the actors who seem like that they had induced themselves with too much speed before they began filming, the movie does claim one redeeming quality which personally impressed this critic the most: the special effects and make-up of Nosferatu.

Even when viewed so many years later, the creature is still sinister and continues to retain an aura of fear and of evil incarnate. One can observe the various highlights on the face of Nosferatu: the accentuation of the low brow, the bulging, gleaming eyes, the shadowing an shading of the cheekbones which incredibly produces a menacing effect. Max Schreck actually portrays the best Dracula that this critic has ever witnessed.

Although not all people may be fans of black and white movies or possess no desire to watch another version of the vampire-meets-girl, vampire-gets-girl, vampire-sucks-the-life-from-girl-story, the film must be seen to appreciate the performance and make-up of Max Schreck. One must understand that this movie at that time claimed revolutionary special effects and boasted itself as a piece of fantastic technological movie-making.

One should view this short piece not only as a simple movie of the horror genre but also as a reflection of and a progression of the history of society and the movie industry. Nosferatu will be shown in the International House at 9:00 p.m. on Tuesday, October 30.

Chris Goldenberg is a sophomore majoring in English who claims that he's a vampire as well.

Sex faked in film

by Ann Trebbe

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

James Spader is lying on a couch moaning in ecstasy. Susan Sarandon is doing what could, in some states, get her arrested.

"It starts where most sex scenes end," Sarandon tells Gentlemen's Quarterly magazine of the pair's erotic encounter in "White Palace," opening Friday.

Controversy over censorship may be raging, and the Motion Picture Association of America may be under fire for its ratings system, but movie sex scenes aren't suffering. In fact, after a summer of action-packed flicks – the body count was far higher than the body heat – comes a fall full of torrid trysts on film.

"Henry and June," the first movie given the new NC-17 label, shows fairly explicit lesbian sex. Despite rejection of the film by one Dedham, Mass., theater and the refusal to run its ads by the Sacramento Union and The Birmingham (Ala.) News, this story of novelist Henry Miller and his wife, June, is doing decent box-office business.

"The movies now are a natural reaction to all the stuff that's been strongly violent all summer. I think people would rather see people making making love than tearing each other to bits," says Bruce Williamson, Playboy movie editor and critic.

And, "there's a kind of natural resistance and pressure when the mood of the country is conservative – to defy it. If somebody says you can't do this, you want it. There must be something good about it."

"Sometimes less is more," says "Henry and June" director Philip Kaufman. "But sometimes more is more – that's why it's called more," he laughs.

In "The Hot Spot," which opened in four cities on Friday and nationwide Oct. 26, Don Johnson and Virginia Madsen make love in a pile of woodchips and he and Jennifer Connelly go skinny-dipping.

In "White Palace," Spader knocks everything off a barroom table to get to Sarandon.

And in "Jacob's Ladder," out in early November, Tim Robbins and Elizabeth Pena take a shower together.

"They're probably the most difficult," says Tim Robbins of sex scenes. "It's impossible! And you make it look very comfortable – as if you've been together for years."

On the "Hot Spot" set in Taylor, Texas, cast and crew were once kept waiting while Hopper and Johnson discussed a love scene. Says Madsen: "Finally, I walked over and said, 'When you boys are done being intellectual about lovemaking, can we go play the scene?'"

The age-old argument still exists: How much do you show and how much do you leave to the imagination?

"I think if you do show everything you won't have a good sex scene," says Peter Bogdanovich, director of "Texasville" and "The Last Picture Show." The key to creating the most impact for love or eroticism?

"Implication," he says.

Pulling it off is the challenge.

"Having the fewest number of people around is always helpful," says Paramount producer Frank Mancuso Jr., who worked on "Internal Affairs" with Richard Gere. Still, that generally means the director, a camera operator, a sound person and a stagehand are on the set.

Preparing those involved is crucial. "A lot of times, you can choreograph a lovemaking sequence in the same way you can choreograph a boxing scene. There's a way to do it elegantly," says Mancuso.

For Rachel Ward, the preparation of her scene in "After Dark, My Sweet," was booze.

"I said no frontal nudity. And I made a big fuss about it," she admits. "And then I looked at Jason (Patric), who's pretty cute, and I thought, 'Why not?'" When it came time to film, Ward says, she got "so drunk I can't remember" what happened.

"Tedious. Horrible. And silly." That's how Jami Gertz, who has an affair with Ed O'Neill in the upcoming "Sibling Rivalry," describes romantic scenes. "You have to put body makeup on your armpits and all over your arms. Then you worry about the makeup getting on the sheets and then they've got to get new sheets."

But there are clearly many who have enjoyed shooting these "horrible" scenes.

Mickey Rourke and Carre Otis, an item during filming, never would say whether they actually made love in the very sexy "Wild Orchid." Julia Roberts and Kiefer Sutherland have been inseparable since "Flatliners." And Sean Penn and Robin Wright, who recently filmed "State of Grace," are expecting a baby and may marry soon.

"It probably has as much to do with the lovemaking scene as being on location for six months," says Mancuso.

Exactly, says Bruce Dern. He recently told People magazine he made a deal with his wife: While on location, they would never spend a night apart. "You have too much time on your hands," he says.

"You gotta be naked for a couple days in front of people," says Jeff Goldblum, who thrashes around a room with Emma Thompson in his current movie, "The Tall Guy."

What's it like? "Interesting," he says.

Is it hard not to get involved?

Rock stars banning the box

by Robert K. Oermann

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

Rock stars are protesting their own records in the "Ban the Box" movement.

Everyone from Genesis to Living Colour is organizing against the way compact discs are packaged. As anyone who's purchased a CD can tell you, the first thing you do when you get it home is to take it out of its long cardboard box or double-sized plastic container and toss the packaging away.

And in these days of garbage crisis, do any of us really need reminding of how wasteful and un-ecological that is?

Rocker Joan Jett was among the first to speak out against the record industry's packaging. She told her label that if she had to have a long box on her next CD she'd prefer that one not be made at all. Don't be surprised if her next album is cassette-only.

Others who have joined the movement are Phil Collins, Ringo Starr, Jackson Browne and U2.

"The Ban the Box Coalition was formed just prior to Earth Day in April," recalls the organization's director Martin Folkman. "In the May 3rd issue of Rolling Stone we ran an ad.

"We had an initial group of artists – REM, Kris Kristofferson, Olivia Newton-John, Belinda Carlisle. After that ad appeared, the thing just snowballed."

Lou Reed, James Taylor, Dire Straits, Julian Lennon, the Neville Brothers, Suzanne Vega and Bobby McFerrin have joined the Coalition in New York and Los Angeles. In Nashville, John Hiatt and Rosanne Cash have added their voices to the chorus.

"We have made some significant progress," Folkman says.

The first artist to have a no-long box clause written into a recording contract is kiddie music superstar Raffi. His new MCA agreement prohibits the use of extraneous CD packaging.

The record industry initially opposed the Ban the Box Coalition, but seems to be slowly changing its tune. Some think the long box will disappear next year.

In the meantime, some music retailers are making adjustments.

"Everybody thinks of us as the bad guys," says Michael Tannen, the manager of the Tower Records store in Nashville. Record shop managers think the long boxes are a help to shoppers because they provide eye-catching graphics and useful print information about the CDs inside. Also, the larger size deters shoplifting.

"But we feel as long as the long box is there, we should be dealing with the environmental concerns of our customers."

Two months ago, Tower installed a container for the packaging at its counter so that consumers can dispose of the long boxes they buy there and then. It is emptied once a week and the cardboard is sent for recycling.

Tannen says the majority of his CD buyers are using the recycling bin now.

Unfortunately, when I do want to watch PBS, or any other channel for that matter, I cannot. Mr. Kesey, I don't know if you live under a satellite dish, but it's damn near impossible to get even the strongest channels in while living in the dorms. I have to hold my aerial out the window while executing a pirouette to watch the news. The lack of cable makes almost all television viewing impossible.

You were correct in your statement that the college must do a better job allocating funds. I have also been subjected to many upper level English courses with 35-40 people. This makes discussion nearly impossible and forces the professor to follow a lecture format. I can only hope that President Trout and the administration will grace the English department with a new professor and at least come close to the 14:1 ratio they tout so consistently.

Still, though cable television may seem petty, it is something that students have requested and should reappear on campus. Let's see the administration meet a student demand. Although very striking, the Academic Resources Center seems to be nothing more than a building to make the alumni go "ooh" and "aah." Chandeliers and vaulted ceilings may bring in thousands of dollars, but there is little problem with the present Coffee House or Snack Bar. Give the students what they want. This may happen someday, Mr. Kesey, but one can only hope that the administration does not share your close-mindedness.

Sincerely,
Brett Lankford

Humor helps – especially in a situation where mood can be everything. Unless you're James Spader, in which case it doesn't seem to matter.

The ad poster for "White Palace" is a big color photo of Spader with his head buried in Sarandon's bosom. It was photographed two months after the movie wrapped.

When asked if it was hard to get back in the mood, Spader laughed.

"Does it look like it was hard?"

alcohol level of .10 or more could be sentenced up to a year in jail and given twelve points which means an automatic revocation of the driver's license.

Probation before judgement is also a form of punishment for drunk drivers. This means that the driver is found guilty but given no points and does not serve any jail time. They are, however, placed on probation and possibly fined. Rehabilitation is also requested in most cases. Most of the first time offenders receive this form of punishment. Judge Sisk explained that usually no one goes to jail on the first offense no matter what the blood alcohol level is.

Judge Sisk gave an example of a first offense case that would take place in his courtroom. The usual sentence is a $150 fine, sixty days suspended license, eighteen months of supervised probation, and rehabilitation is required. The offended must pay for all costs of the rehabilitation.

Judge Sisk said that the problem can be stopped. "The problem of drunk driving and alcohol abuse doesn't need to be tolerated, people need to be outraged and then do something about it," he said. The question is when will people see that this is a very serious problem and when will they act.

For the benefit of a certain individual whom has proven to be inept at basic reading comprehension let me again and perhaps more bluntly, state my basic arguement. Mr. Stuart Neiman is a pompous tyrannical being whose articles and speeches are condescending arrogant and demeaning in nature.

However I must confess you hit my soft spot earlier in your article. As I read your mournful speech regarding the perpetual abuse you have received since becoming monarch I faintly heard a violin (or was it a cello) playing a song (Send in the Clowns) in the background and a soft tear ran down my cheek in remorse knowing I had kicked a man who was blatantly down. Washington College receives national recognition

Last month Washington college gained national publicity for the computer system that links many facets of the college. From October 13th through the 17th, a panel of four attended the EDUCOM conference in Atlanta, Georgia.

EDUCOM is a national organization that supports academic computing. The conference is held annually in various cities around the country. At the conference presentations are made by selected schools and businesses, speeches are made by keynote speakers, new software, hardware, and computer styles are unveiled, and those who take part are also able to tour nearby facilities that use computers in their every day operations. This year Georgia Tech and the computer facilities of CNN were the tours. Approximately two thousand people attend each year. The keynote speakers at the conference were Former President Jimmy Carter and NeXT founder Steven Jobs. Carter spoke on the universities' role in global communication while Steve Jobs predicted that the interpersonal computing will be the breakthrough of the '90's. Jobs was the co-developer of the Apple Computer and then developed the NeXT computer. He also won the 1990 Andrew Fluegelman Award that is given for excellence in software.

To be eligible to give a presentation, a proposal must be submitted to a judging committee affiliated with the conference the previous January. The proposals that are submitted from all over the country are then gone through by the committee. Only a very small number are selected to take part in the conference. The presentations encompass a wide range of issues from networking on campuses to teaching with computers to developing new computer lines. Washington College had not only one, but three proposals selected this year. Dean Baer commented that this left no doubt that Washington College had been recognized nationally as an academic computing school. "No other small college in the United Stated had as many proposals accepted as we did," she said.

Dean Elizabeth Baer, Provost and Dean of the College; Dr. Steven Cades, professor of sociology; Dr. Paul Bishop, Director of Computing; and Ryder Daniels, a recent graduate of the college, attended the conference in representation of the college.

Each presentation was scheduled to last one hour. The first and second of Washington College's presentations was given by Paul Bishop. The first dealt with student access to computers on campus. The second concerned networking and how the computers in various places around campus are linked together. For both of these presentations, Dr. Bishop had audiences of over three hundred.

The third panel consisted of Dean Baer, Dr. Cades, and Ryder Daniels. They each had ten minutes in which to speak on why and how the computer program at Washington College has achieved academic success. The creation of the new computerized classroom in the soon to be finished Academic Resources Center was also discussed. The three touched on why it was thought necessary for the campus to have such a facility and then how the money was raised in order to complete the technological classroom.

Dean Elizabeth Baer was one of the faculty members that represented the college at the EDUCOM conference that was held this past month.

For the remaining thirty minutes of the presentation time, a representative of Vanderbilt University talked about their multi media classroom, the students response to it, and how effective teaching has been with it. Vanderbilt has had its computerized classroom in effect for approximately a year.

Almost three hundred were present in the audience, Including the first two presentation by Dr. Bishop, approximately a thousand people attended the presentations, which is half of the total number of people that attended the entire conference.

Audio visual aids were used for all three presentations to emphasize the college's use of computers. Overheads and charts portrayed by the use of a computer were used. Slides were shown that demonstrated how computers fit into the every day life here at the college. A consultant hired by Apple Computers helped with converting the graphs and charts into the Macintosh language. This enabled the presentations to be verbally given and then reinforced with pictures. Two audio visual rehearsals were completed before the actual presentation was given in front of a live audience.

Ryder Daniels was the only student at the conference. During his speech he challenged other schools in the audience to get more involved with their students in the area of computing. This is what he attributes Washington College's computing success to. He claims it works because the students are actively involved in academic computing. Whether they are lab assistants in the library or the computing center, working in collaboration with a member or members of the faculty in software publication, or whether they are simply writing out papers that may be due for class, Daniels says that the students are definitely involved.

Two years from now the EDUCOM conference will be held at John Hopkins. Dean Baer commented that this may be a good year to listen to Ryder Daniels and have more students actively involved in the conference, for it is close to home and travel costs will be inexpensive unlike traveling across country for the conference next year. Next year's conference is planned to be held in San Diego, California.

One of the most exciting parts of the conference, as expressed by Dean Baer was when all of the hardware and software vendors are displayed. "Take Miller Gymnasium and multiply that by twenty and then you will get some ides of the space of the room, " she said. New products are unveiled during this time. Apple displayed a couple of new computer lines that they are coming out with. New software and brochures galore are given out. "It's a good opportunity for Somerset dorm hosted their annual haunted house on Wednesday night from 7:30pm until 9:00pm and it was free to both the public and the college community. The residents were helped out by the Student Government which had allocated $200 for the Somerset Haunted House.

Those brave enough to try the Haunted House were split into groups of four to five and were guided through the terrifying spectacle by residents disguised as ghouls. One moment of terror came at the beginning of the tour, and was provided by Senior Vicco Von Voss who scared both college and middle school students alike by coming after them with a chainsaw (for safety reasons, the blade had been removed.)

Upon reaching the third floor, the groups were led through a series of small cubicles. Each cubical contained a separate gastly sight, including an amputation, the grim reaper, Dracula in his coffin, and a man being executed in the Electic Chair. At each turn, the characters tried to grab their frightened audience and pull them into the action. The costuming was excellent, and included a stab at the Washington College—Hobart lacrosse rivalry.

Our gift from the Reagan revolution

In the midst of all the budget fussing and fidgeting, the Congress did come to agree on something, they wanted a pay raise. As the national debt teeters precariously close to one trillion, the members of Congress decide that $ 89000 a year is too little.

This leads into a very big question. What does this have to do with the Washington College student body?

Plenty.

The national debt is the gift we will get to enjoy during our careers. There is already much speculation that the Washington College classes of 1991-1994 will never see a penny of social security, as the baby boomers retire on social security benefits and checks paid for by us.

Remember Reagan's tax reforms? Remember the tax cuts? Now picture a country that can't provide medical care to the poor, a country whose inner city schools are battlegrounds. A country with an oil dependent economy that gets the deep trembles whenever oil prices jump.

This is our inheritance. We will have to work to pay off the foreign investors who feel America is a wonderful investment. What can be done to change what appears to be our future?

A change of attitude is a good place to start. Higher taxes? Well, if the money must go somewhere, it might as well go to the government. Either way, whether money is spent on CD players, or TV sets or just taken away by the government, it's bound to end up in the profit column of a Japanese firm. Wouldn't it be great if the tax payer could specify where their tax money goes—but on the other hand, who really wants to pay for Congresses raise?

Reagan and company didn't create the debt, but they didn't do anything to lessen it. The battlecry of "No new taxes" is old fashioned, and downright dangerous. New taxes are the only way that America will ever get out of debt.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters must be signed. Students should include major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Make recycling not a fad, but a fact of life

Dear Editor and Global Village residents:

This is a mid-fall update on the Washington College recycling scene. Please share this information with your friends, neighbors, and co-workers. W.C. has recycled a few tons of paper so far. The S.G.A. has received a check for over $500.00 earned by the W.C. aluminum program. However, thinking about where and how their trash disapears is still not a habit for many members of the community. Recycling is not a fad. In ten years every school kid will be taught the rules of the trash as if they were learning the rules of the road. To all recycling Draft Dodgers I now declare a general amnesty.

Right now last year's recycling system is still in place. Aluminum is placed in the marked beige containers by students, consolidated by maintenance, and picked up on Mondays. White office paper is saved in the desk-top trays, consolidated by the users or staff, and picked up on Mondays. There is no glass pick-up service in the dorms. Those good-hearted industrious citizens who wish to recycle their glass should take it to the color-coded drums behind the snack-bar. Soon there will be several more collection stations on campus.

Here are the basics of recycling:

Glass - empty, remove lids, separate clear, brown, and green.

Aluminum - empty, (does not stick to magnet).

White office paper - color saved separately, no plastic windows, no latex address labels, no paper clips, inks O.K., staples O.K..

Newspaper - shiny

Many thanks from the Rugby team

The Washington College Rugby Football Club would like to thank the many fans who showed up to support us on Sunday at our first home game. Though we lost to a much more experienced Delaware team, we played well, and the fan support was greatly appreciated. After the game, several of Delaware's team members commented that they could never draw even a fraction of the number of fans that we had at our game, and they're a Division I school. We understand that many of you were confused as to the rules of the game (you should have seen our first few practices!) but you hung in there with us, cheering when we cheered and groaning when we groaned, so to all of you, thanks. We play in Millersville, PA this coming weekend, but we're home again on Saturday the 10th for a game, then on Sunday the 11th for an intersquad scrimmage during Worton Park's Sports Day. We hope to see you there again.

Many Thanks,
The Washington College Rugby Team

Do you support the presence of U.S. forces in the Persain Gulf? Why or why not?

We're not just fighting for Texaco

Kyndra Ponder

"Hell no, I won't fight for Texaco!" Maybe its not poetic, but that statement sure echoes the feelings of a lot of Americans over the U.S. involvement in the Persian Gulf Crisis.

Criticism of and hostility toward American government officials would be highly warranted if our own economic interests were the only reasons that American troops are stationed in Saudi Arabia right now. However, oil is not the sole reason for our military involvement - especially not to the degree that we are seeing today. Persian Gulf petroleum is not such a vital commodity to the United States that a combat veteran President would send young men into combat situations against a man like Sadam Hussein. We have greater interests there than just oil. Personally, I'm a little tired of hearing that same argument over and over again.

Some Americans have chosen to believe that we are there acting in accordance with our foreign policy - to help protect our allies against foreign aggression. That too may be true, however U.S. foreign policy would not justify such heavy American involvement in the gulf.

Over the past several years the United States defense industry has sold fairly advanced weapon systems to the Saudis and the Kuwaitis. Our allies in the Persian Gulf have huge arsenals of advanced American technology - including AWACS fighters and highly sensitive radar systems.

Sadam would be a very happy man to have such advanced war-time systems on his side. Fighting against those systems could turn a challenge for U.S. troops into a far more difficult and costly - if not impossible - action.

I, as a normal American citizen, do not know the exact capabilities of each of the weapons that the U.S. has sold, but I do know that we are using many of the same weapons and radar systems in our own armed forces.

You see, President Bush did not mobilize the troops so quickly for just oil or our foreign policy. Although those may be very valid reasons, our involvement goes deeper than that. American Marine Corps, Army and Navy personnel are not in the middle of the Saudi desert solely for Texaco. but they are doing a special job trying to keep Sadam Hussein from gaining the technology to be an even more dangerous madman than he already is.

When one considers the combined reasons for American involvement in the Persian Gulf - the U.S. need for oil, foreign policy mandates and our own military interests there, then I think that most people would understandably be in favor of the government's actions regarding Sadam Hussein.

Kyndra Ponder is a senior majoring in English.

Yes, I think not only the U.S. but all countries should be involved, I think it is great that Japan and the Soviet Union are taking a stand. Iraq's behavior affects the entire world.

Yes, I do support the troops in the Persian Gulf for the sole reason of keeping the troops morale up. Yet, I do not, will not, and can not support an administration or government that is willing to go to war because of a state of dependency which they induced.

Tanya Cunic

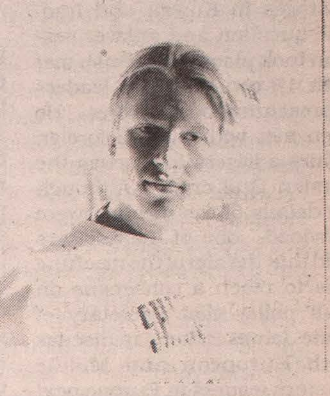
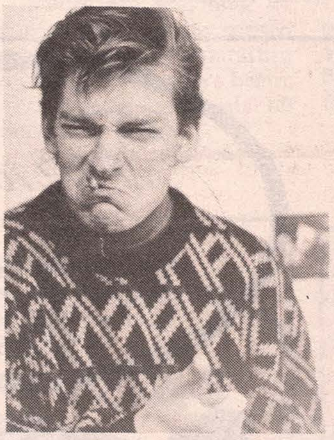
Denville, NJ



Absolutely not. This looks too much like an excuse for imperialism from where I am sitting. Why didn't we learn our lesson in the '70s. Now that we know that renewable fuel sources can be cheaper and better, why are we supporting dependence on a fuel source that will be used up, some say by 2070.

Justin Cann
Sophomore
Annapolis, MD



Yes, but not indefinitely. The development of nuclear weapons by a country that has vowed to destroy Israel in the past is a terrifying possibility, not to mention the threat by Saddam Hussein to the world's economy. Like it or not, countries act according to their own self-interest, including the U.S., and if we were not there Saudi Arabia would have been overrun a month ago.

Jeff Vail

State College, PA

No, I don't support the presence of U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf, it is stupid for us to be in a conflict over oil, we should be worried about more important issues. I don't like the thought of sacrificing American lives because of this ridiculous conflict.

Erika Fitzhugh

Cambridge, MD

Yes, I do. Our roll in the world dictates that we should help other nations when they are threatened by an aggressive government which does not have a legitimate right to take control of the country. It bothers me that some other nations are not taking an affirmative stand in upholding national sovereignty.

A devil's advoate view of the U.S. presence in the Persian Gulf

Steve Bruchey

Since the other op-ed opinion in this week's Campus Voices is in favor of the United State's presence in the Persian Gulf Conflict, I shall take a moment to present some alternative points of view. Why are we in the Gulf? Is it for surf? The hell with that, our Fightin' Boys are in Saudi Arabia. Sand: yes. Surf: NO. Are we there to defend the ideals of Western Democracies? If you accept the rhetoric that is being shoveled our way, then it is a whole hearty "Yes Sir!"

Please do not get me wrong, I believe in the United States of America and if this escalated into war and the Draft were enacted, I would go. However, America should not carry the brunt of the load alone. Other Western Democracies use oil and many use just as much or more than the US. Where are they? They are there in spirit. Sure, some of them have written checks. [Germany should be commended in this department because they are not allowed to send troops outside of their borders, so they gave some financial backing.] What about Italy, Spain, and the rest of our "close NATO allies?" If the ideals of Western Democracies need to be represented, then wouldn't it be better if all Western Democracies be working to represent the ideals that they are supposed to be practicing each and every day?

This whole Operation Desert Shield is getting expensive. What effect is this going to have on our own economy? We have had enough problems with getting a budget passed, let alone include enough money to be able to finance this operation. We could always take out a loan to pay for it. Who cares if we add a few billion to the deficit. All of America is obsessed with the credit-card mentality of "Let's take it home now and pay for it later." Phil Rizuto from The Money Store could probably hook us up with however much we need.

If we don't want to take out a loan, we could always cut social spending. That would work. We could cut all aid to college students and then we could send them to Saudi Arabia because they would have tons of free time on their hands now.

I would like to ask another question. What does it matter if the price of oil goes up? It could be one of the best things that could ever happen to this nation. Not only could

OUTLOOK

In the world: Hindu militants attack mosque in India

UNITED STATES

President Bush was questioned yesterday on whether he is trying to create a situation which would justify the use of military force against Iraq to free American hostages in Kuwait and Iraq. The question and answer session took place when Bush met with 15 congressional leaders representing both parties. He then met with his top foreign affairs advisers to discuss the Persian Gulf crisis. Although no details of the meeting were provided, one of the advisers said that the aim of the meetung was to reach a consensus on Gulf policy that Secretary of State James Baker can discuss with European and Middle Eastern leaders in Europe next month. Several of congressional leaders who met with Bush said afterward that he implied that military action was not imminent, but that the president did not rule it out. Bush's patience is reportedly "growing thin" and he is frustrated by the conditions that Americans are being held in in Kuwait. Both he and James Baker drew attention to the hostages this week accusing Saddam Hussein of violating international law. A State Departmant official said the comments made by Bush and Baker were based on letters from hostages that had been smuggled out and on eyewitness reports.

INDIA

Thousands of Hindu militants, who attempted to storm barricades in order to begin building a temple on the site of an existing Mosque, were fired upon by police in the northern town of Ayodhya. Five people were killed in the incident, and 15 others lost their lives in similar religious violence elsewhere in India. Due to the controversial nature of the existence of an Islamic Mosque in the town, there was heavy security. This, however, did not stop the Hindu militants from staging an early morning charge on the Isalmic shrine. At first police tried to fight off the mob with batons and tear gas, but then resorted to opening fire. Thousand of protesters managed to get to the Mosque where they pried bricks from the wall and chipped plaster from the three domes. Before police were able to chase them away they planted orange flags on each dome. The dispute stems from the Hindu belief that the Mosque stands on the birthplace of Ram, a Hindu god. Independent scholars say there is no evidence for this claim, but the dispute has been infused with religious hatreds in India that have existed since Moslem emperors invaded Hindu-dominated India 400 years ago.

ENGLISH CHANNEL

The two parts of the Channel tunnel or "chunnel", one half being dug from France the other from England, met Monday night to link England to the European mainland for the first time in her history. The hole is as yet only two inches wide and it will take another month before it is big enough for people to pass through. By January it is expected to be ready for the historic meeting of British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and French President Francois Mitterand. Trains are scheduled to run both ways through two 32 mile long tubes by June of 1993. The trains will speed between Calais and Dover at 90 miles per hour. While the French celebrated the breakthrough, the British pondered the consequences of a permanent link with the European mainland. Margaret Thatcher has given only grudging, half-hearted support to the $14 billion project say critics who also say her support for European unity has been similar. France, meanwhile, plans to invest $30 billion in a 2,000 mile high-speed rail network over the next decade. A similar plan for England was recently turned down by the conservative leadership.

we get more oil from, oh I don't know, Texas, we would be forced to think of less expensive alternatives. I am a realist. The price of gasoline would go up, a lot more than the price that we are used to. Regardless, our gas prices would just begin to reach the level of our Western Allies. We would also be forced to think of cheaper fuels. This would be a wonderful opportunity to phase out our use of fossil fuels. The possibilities are endless. Solar power, nuclear energy, and others.

Our cars would have to be more efficient too; more miles to the gallon, lower emissions, etc. People would be forced to carpool. These high prices would also force us to develop more extensive, economical and efficient public transportation systems. A wave of environmentalism would sweep over the nation. By decreasing the amount of traffic in America's cities and on our highways, we would reduce the amount of CFC's and other harmful emissions.

All of the effects of this new Middle East Crisis, if used the correct way could propel the United States back as the world's leader. We could be on the cutting edge of moving off of the oil standard and therefore let us effect the economy of Iraq in a more powerful way than those effects of our trade embargo. As for our friends in the Middle East, who are not even democracies anyway, that need to sell oil to keep their countries financially afloat will still have the market of the Third World and those who would be reluctant to follow us into the future.

Amy discovers the true meaning of W.C. athletics

Now that I have completed my final field hockey season I feel many emotions. They include sorrow, regret, and exhilaration. I am sorry because I will never again play for a field hockey team that has achieved so many honors. I feel regret for the losses I will never overcome. Exhilaration fills me because I have had the chance to be a part of such an excellent group for four years. It is not just the end of field hockey that leaves me sad. It is the realization that I will no longer be a part of Washington College and I will never again have the opportunity to experience the many worlds that athletics have opened to me.

Amy Tiehel

Many say that athletics are negative. Professors become annoyed when athletes have to leave class, and school work may suffer when athletes are on the road. However, what we are learning on the field, court or in the swimming pool, we could never learn in a classroom.

Athletics have taught me discipline, sacrifice, commitment, and how to handle loss. When I had an away game and I knew I wouldn't be back until eleven 'o clock at night, I had to do my work before I left. When I wanted to go out to the Vern on a Thursday night I didn't because I knew I had a game on Saturday. When it was cold and raining, I went to practice. The whole team was committed and we practiced hard every day for two hours rain or shine. This in turn taught us the true meaning of commitment. We never gave up, especially where our teammates were concerned. Athletics also taught me how to handle loss. As it happens in life, we sometimes lose no matter how well we perform. Sometimes everybody on the team would play to the utmost of their ability, but we would still not come out on top. In life, we must all learn how to handle loss, and athletics have helped me learn how to deal with it and keep on trying.

Through my athletic connections I have met some of my closest friends. I have also had the opportunity to see schools I never would have even known about. Washington College has offered me the chance to try out for regional and national teams, something that would never have been offered me at a bigger school.

Being an athlete here has taught me the meaning of believing in myself. When I felt like I just couldn't go on anymore, somewhere deep inside of me I found that extra something. Knowing my teammates supported me one-hundred percent encouraged me to push myself to the limit.

When I leave Washington College I will take many memories with me, but my athletic experiences will remain my most cherished memories.

Tahoe experiences season of violence

By FAITH BREMNER

©Copyright 1990, USA TODAY/Apple College Information Network

RENO, Nev. – A Placer County sheriff's deputy takes his 24-foot sailboat out on Lake Tahoe. He is in the process of getting a divorce and is deeply in debt.

Two days later, the experienced sailor's body, clad in a life-jacket, washes up on the Nevada shore. His boat has not been found.

A retired oil company president and his wife are taken hostage in their exclusive Incline Village home. Their two captors, wanted for murder in another state, demand a $500,000 ransom before Washoe County sheriff's deputies storm the house and rescue the couple.

A Kingsbury Grade gas station attendant momentarily steps into a back room late one night. When she returns, she finds a man strung out on methamphetamine helping himself to the till.

The man plunges a 6-inch hunting knife into her, knocking her onto the floor. He climbs on top of her and continues to stab her, fatally, 15 times in all, before he takes off with $350.

The common denominator in all three of these mysterious, violent events is that they happened at Lake Tahoe in the fall. They took place at the close of the busy tourist season when the days begin to grow shorter and the air turns cool and frosty.

Lake Tahoe may be a beautiful, glittery and woodsy get-away for millions of tourists each year. But the lake has experienced bizarre and violent activities nearly every fall.

"The month of October here at Lake Tahoe is the roughest month for violent crime that we have, and I don't know why," said Capt. Ron Pierini, commander of the Douglas County Sheriff's Department Tahoe substation. "The numbers are down as far as transients coming through and people visiting."

One of the most notorious crimes – when Richard Coddington raped two teen-age models and killed their two chaperones in his South Lake Tahoe mobile home – took place in May 1987.

But a search through 10 years of newspaper clippings shows that August, September and October appear to be the most violence-prone months. Of the 33 highly publicized criminal events at the lake, more than half took place during those three months. August, the busiest tourist month at the lake, and October, one of the slowest, tied for first place.

Douglas County, which includes the Stateline casino core, has been getting hit especially hard in the late summer and fall.

On Aug. 27, 1980, a 900-pound bomb blew a five-story-high hole in Harvey's casino. Then, on Sept. 30, 1987, Connie Sue Weiss was stabbed to death at the Kingsbury gasoline station.

The following month, Ohio lawyer David Riebel sprayed the Lakeside Inn and Casino with submachine gun fire in a failed robbery attempt. Also in October 1987, the body of an unidentified elderly woman washed up on Zephyr Cove Beach.

Two years later, fishermen found Modesto, Calif., real estate agent Dori Greene's body in shallow water off the Cave Rock boat landing on Oct. 27. At about the same time, South Lake Tahoe cab driver James Fripp disappeared after picking up a fare at a Stateline casino.

His body was found earlier this month near Sierra Ski Ranch on the California side of the lake. Two weeks ago, Terry Pappageorge, a drifter from Aurora, Colo., was allegedly stabbed to death in a cabin at the Zephyr Cove Resort by two traveling companions.

Police are searching for the men, who allegedly carried Pappageorge's body around in a rented van for two days before they dumped it in the water off Camp Richardson.

"It's like clockwork," Pierini said. "We had a relatively slow summer this year compared to some.

"It looked like we were going to escape this year, but it didn't happen."

Law enforcement officials and criminal behavior experts say Tahoe's August-through-October crime wave is a coincidence.

"I've read a lot of books on criminal behavior but I have never heard of it being related to the fall," said psychologist Carlos Brandenburg, director of Lakes Crossing Center for the Mentally Disordered Offender in Reno.

"The closest thing would be the relationship between suicidal and self-destructive behavior and the beginning of the holidays."

Volleyball impressive at Invitational

By Matt Giller

This past weekend the Shorewomen traveled to the Chesapeake Invitational and finished second last weekend. Only Johns Hopkins (5-0) played better and bettered all comers.

In their first match the Ladies of the Shore dropped the first game against Goucher 15-5. However, the WAC came from behind and beat Goucher the next two games 15-10 and 15-8. Washington then met Hopkins in the next round only to fall 15-7, 15-2 victims.

The Shorewomen came right back and redeemed themselves by thrashing Hood College 15-7, 15-0. In the next round the Washington adversary was Marymount College. The two teams battled long and hard but Marymount spiked home a 15-13, 15-5 win. Things didn't get any easier for the Shorewomen as their next opponent was Notre Dame. W.C. fell to the Irish in the first game 15-13. But the WAC showed some guts as they came back to defeat N.D. in the final two games 15-13, 15-11.

SInce starting off the season 7-18, the Washington College Volleyball Team has managed to reach a formidable

Rugby loses in home debut

Matt Giller

At Worton Park Sunday, Washington College hosted the experienced club from the University of Delaware in the debut home rugby game. However, the "yellow-yolked" Blue Hens crashed the Shoremen party by defeating them 21-10.

Bill Kelleher scored first for the Blue Hens and Tom "Chewy" Bainter converted the extra point to take an early 6-0 lead. Before the half was over U of D scored two more trys which were converted by Russ Rose. Both kick attempts were wide.

Early in the second half Bainter kicked a field goal for three points into a stiff wind. But the 300 or so fans that showed up rallied the Shoremen on. W.C. pushed the ball up the field via the scrum and some strategic kicks until Eric Bach pushed the ball into the zone for the Shoremen's first try(he paid his dues after the game, however). Don Steele's conversion made the score 17-6.

Washington rallied again and got deep into the Blue hens side of the field. However, Delaware's speedy scrum half Mike Cherubini burned the WAC defense for an 85 meter try. The extra point went wide and the score remained 21-6.

Chuck Cort showed some jets as he scooted 50 meters with the clock running down to complete the scoring.

The club continues the fall schedule with an away game this Saturday at Millersville College in Pennsylvania. They return home to Worton Park to maul the Severn River Club on Saturday, November 10 at 1 pm.

The team is proud to announce that this past week's Rugby Queen was Jen Rowe. The Rugby Team would like to thank Jen for volunteering.

The Great Sabha: Back in black

Things couldn't be worse for the good guys this time of the year. Evil spirits run rampant. They are belly up with glee, soused with mirth,stinko with jocularity. The Great Sabha will fend them off as their powers are traditionaly stronger than his during this month. The Great One must where black in November. He advises all to take part in this struggle to ward them off. Please where something black - anything will do, even a G-string(The Great One will make random spot checks). Anyway let's get to this week's gridiron action.

NFL

Washington -2 1/2 over DETROIT. Lions, Tigers, and Bears - who cares. The Skins all the way. Give the points.

PHILADELPHIA -9 1/2 over New England. Kiam should put a tent over that circus he calls an organization. Give the points.

MIAMI -9 1/2 over Phoenix. Whe Marino's hot, he's hot - and right now who cares, they've got Emmitt Smith. Give the points.

LA Raiders +2 over KANSAS CITY. The Silver and Black is back. Take the points.

CINCINNATI -6 1/2 over New Orleans. Walsh just ain't the Saints's answer - yet. Give the points.

Buffalo -3 over CLEVELAND. The Great Sabha hates both of these teams. He hopes great tidal wave from Great Lake crashes on stadium. Anyway give the points.

San Francisco -6 1/2 over GREEN BAY. The Battle of the Bays should once again go to the city where the gays reach the bay. Give the points.

NY JETS -4 1/2 over Dallas. Sabha doesn't like Jet favorites but then again it is only the Cowgirls. Give the points.

SEATTLE -5 over San Diego. The hawks of the sea should beat the lightning bolts by more than a try, sorry touchdown(I'm getting into this rugby stuff). Give the points.

Chicago -5 over TAMPA BAY. The biggest game of the year for the Bucs to this point. It should be a tough one but give the points anyway.

Houston +3 over LA RAMS. The Rams have look like goats recently. Take the points.

BEST BETS

PITTSBURGH -3 1/2 over Atlanta. After Joe's "O" went on a two week hiatus in the beginning of the season, the Steelers have really turned things around on that side of the ball. Give the points.

Denver -1 over MINNESOTA. The Vikes stink! Give the points.

MONDAY NIGHT

NY Giants -9 over INDIANAPOLIS. Who scheduled this one for Prime Time? My cousin Gandhi could pick this one. Give the points.

COLLEGE

x-Notre Dame -35 over Navy. I will eat my Tarot Cards if the Irish don't score 50 points. Give the points.

VIRGINIA 13 1/2 over Georgia Tech. This will be the Wahoos toughest test on offense. Give the points.

Texas A&M -30 over SMU. Isn't the rivalry it used to be. Give the points.

NEBRASKA 6- 1/2 over Colorado. The Cornhuskers will vie for top honors before this season has completed. Give the points.

WASHINGTON -16 over Arizona. The Shoremen, er Huskies, are the best of the west. Give the points.

Rhymin' Simon rocks on "Rhythm"

by Raphael Koster

When a songwriter of Paul Simon's stature comes out with a new album, the public is expected to sit up and notice. After all, this is the man who gave us "Bridge Over Troubled Water" and "Mrs. Robinson," "The Sounds of Silence" and Graceland. Yet as listeners, we worry when we hear his latest venture is an attempt to bring the native rhythms of Brazil into the American rock mainstream. After all, David Byrne tried that with Rei Momo, and failed quite thoroughly.

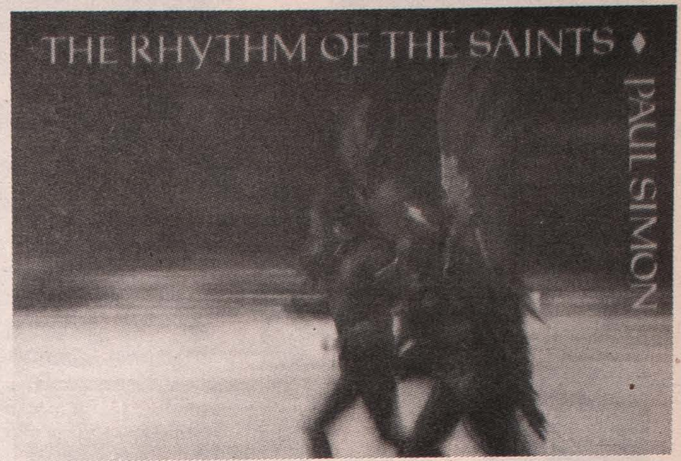
Well, The Rhythm of the Saints is here now, and receiving wide critical acclaim- but will the average college listener like it? Probably not. The problem is not that Simon fails to integrate the frenetic drum tattoos of Brazil with his own personal, intimate, poetic lyrical style; on the contrary, he succeeds at that very well, for the most part.

The problem lies in that his approach to this album included matching his already mellow style to various Latin American styles, almost all of which are also mellow. The result is an album that has few songs that seem musically different from the rest.

Simon has been trying to write a calm pensive album since the late seventies. The Grammy-winning Still Crazy After All These Years was already beginning to inch towards an extremely polished style drenched in electric piano and soft brass: and One Trick Pony and Hearts and Bones were perhaps commercial failures for that reason: they were too melancholy, too calm, too quiet. Despite the fact that Hearts and Bones was a major artistic breakthrough for Simon, it took Graceland, an idiosyncratic, lively, and exotic album, for Simon to once again appeal to the masses.

"Saints" is like that album in some ways, but not in enough. The exoticism is still there; but it does not have the melodic distinctiveness that characterized songs like "I Know What I Know," "The Boy in the Bubble," or "You Can Call Me Al." Simply put, these aren't songs you are going to hum along with. Several of them are interesting: like the bizarre single "The Obvious Child" which was written over a drum performance recorded live in a town square; or "Can't Run But" which sounds quite similar to Peter Gabriel's older work. But they don't have the "hooks" that Graceland did.

Lyrically, they are typical Simon: that is to say, well above the average quality of pop lyrics today. Simon can certainly be classified as a rock poet like Lennon or Dylan, even if he rarely ventures to the visceral realms that those two inhabit.



The song lyrics on "Saints" are mostly excellent, but they often suffer from having been written over the rhythm track: "The Obvious Child" lacks a focus just because the drums play on for quite a while, and Simon has to fill the time with something. Among the best on the album are "Can't Run But," "Spirit Voices," "The Cool, Cool River," "Born at the Right Time," and the title track. They feature lyrical gems like "...moves like a fist through traffic," and "A couple was rubbing against us/ Rubbing and doing that new dance/ The man was wearing a jacket and jeans/ The woman was laughing in advance..."

Simon's latest effort is worth a listen; depending on what you look for in music, you may take it to heart, or may never look at it again. It is this very quality that prevents it from being as great an achievement as Graceland: Once Simon has shown us that he has material everyone can love, it is disappointing to hear him talk to only some of us.

Raph Koster has written many music reviews for the Elm. He is a Junior.

Apple introduces the Macintosh Classic.

Trying to stretch dollars when you're computer shopping doesn't mean you're willing to make sacrifices.

That's why you should consider the new, affordable Macintosh® Classic® computer.

It has everything you need—including a monitor, keyboard, mouse, 2 megabytes of RAM, and a 40-megabyte hard disk. Just plug everything in and the Macintosh Classic is ready to run, because the system software is already installed.* And, thanks to the Macintosh computer's legendary ease of use, you'll be up and running in no time.

Like every Macintosh, the Classic can run thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. And this is one cheap roommate that doesn't have trouble sharing. The Apple® SuperDrive™—standard equipment with every Macintosh—reads from and writes to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks, which means you can share information with someone who uses a different type of computer.

See the Macintosh Classic for yourself. It'll change your mind about cheap roommates.

educators to see what is new and improved in the computer field," says Dean Baer.

Washington College's success at the conference can be seen in that a delegation from Japan came to visit the campus after hearing about it at the EDUCOM conference. They wanted to visit the campus in order to learn about the networking capabilities of the computer system here. They toured the campus and looked at the college computer system.

Washington College was recognized nationally and being given three presentation opportunities was indeed a major accomplishment. A quote from the new brochure submitted by the college on academic computing sums up the college's success in the field of academic computing. It reads, "Washington College, Maryland's oldest college, may have its feet rooted in tradition, but its students are poised on the brink of the future. An academic computing network has transformed this small campus into a unified community of computer-literate students, faculty, and staff members who electronically exchange information, ideas and software." Hopefully this will continue to be true in the future and will grow in scope.

Student action needed on proposed Academic Council changes

By: Justine DeSantis

Last spring, the Ad Hoc Committee on Governance proposed a change in the structure of Academic Council. Academic Council is the committee that, among other things, must approve all new courses before they can be added to the curriculum. The proposed change would lower the number of committee members from the present two deans, seven faculty (six teachers and one librarian), and six students, to one dean, four faculty, and one student.

There are three academic divisions at Washington College, Natural Sciences, Social Sciences and Humanities. As the Council stands now, there are two faculty and two student representatives from each division. The proposed change would call for one faculty representative from each division, one faculty member at large and one student. It is unfair and unproductive to have the nine hundred ten students enrolled this semester represented by one individual. How can a political science major accurately represent the interests of a biology major? Obviously the members of the Ad Hoc Committee saw the impossibility of this because they did not suggest that there be only one representative of faculty.

In order for a new class to be added to the curriculum it must be approved by Academic Council. New courses are important to all students, as it is the students who are the recipients of the curriculum, therefore, equal representation of faculty and students on Academic Council is necessary. A proposal to lower the number of members of Council is not detrimental if students are fairly represented - four faculty and one student is not fair. There are less faculty members than there are students but yet the faculty has more representation than the student body. This also does not seem fair.

One of the main issues that led the Ad Hoc Committee to propose this change was lack of attendance at Council meetings on the part of the students. The reality of this situation, one that does not seem to be clear to most faculty, is that it was only a problem last year. For many years prior to that and for this year, lack of attendance has not been a problem.

The S.G.A. asked its members on Monday night, and I am asking you now to please talk to your professors. Let them know that you are concerned about this issue. It is the faculty that will be voting on this proposal so it is to them that we must make our appeal. A brief conversation can make

SGA holds meeting to approve funds

By: Kyndra Ponder

On Monday night the SGA held an emergency meeting in the Sophie Kerr Room at the Library. SGA Vice-President and Acting President, Kevin Kelly, presided. The major purpose of the meeting was to approve funding for various groups on campus that requested assistance from the Student Government Association.

The Junior Class requested $1450 from the SGA to pay for a dance in the Dining Hall on November 30. The Juniors plan to use the dance as a fundraiser for the B.U.S. H. project that they have planned - adding new picnic tables and grills to the front of Kent House. Junior Class President, John Kelly agreed to share the half of the profits from the evening with the SGA for co-sponsoring the dance.

The International Relations Club asked the SGA to help pay for the Calypso band which will appear in the Coffee House on Saturday night. The SGA, upon the recommendation of Treasurer Brian Gimelson, approved $600 to pay for the band. Alcohol will be served at the dance.

A Freshman writing group, the Bad Poets Society asked for $200 to pay for a publication and a series of readings for this semester. The Senate approved the allocation, but also expressed concern over the large numbers of organizations on campus which cater to similar needs and interests. Senators wondered why some of the organizations could not work together and accomplish the same set of goals. Secretary Jenny Albers reported that the name of the dorm which won the $50 prize for sending the most volunteers to help build the Garnett community playground would be announced next week. She also read a Thank-You note from the organizers which said that without the work of Washington College students, the playground would not have been built.

Social Chairman, Steve Heuttner announced that he will have questionnaires ready next week to be distributed. The questionnaires will ask students to write the names of bands that they would like to see appear on campus at a large SGA event.

Kevin Kelly then nominated Brooke Frank to serve as the Acting SGA Vice-President until President Stuart Neiman returns next semester. The Senate will vote on Frank's nomination at next week's meeting. All senators are encouraged to attend. Kelly also reported that Lionel Dyson has been appointed to serve as the clerk of the SCC.

Kelly then made the report on the Student Academic Board. One History and one English Professor will be added next semester and one English Professor will be added to the staff next year.

EDITORIAL

One is just not enough

A proposal to change the size and membership of the Academic Council deserves our attention as a student body. The Academic Council approves changes in the curriculum, changes that would effect the academic lives of every student on campus. Currently, there are 14 members of the Academic Council; six faculty, six students and two non-voting deans. This size is considered too big. The changes proposed would streamline the council to five members.

The five members would represent the college's academic community as a whole. The current proposal suggests that the Academic Council members would be three faculty members elected to represent the three divisions of the faculty, Social Sciences, Natural Sciences, and Humanities; one faculty member elected to represent the faculty at large; and one student to represent all the students from all the majors.

This new faculty—student ratio of four to one is unacceptable. It is impossible for one student to represent the views of all students. Furthermore, there is no reasonable justification for allowing the students only one seat on Academic Council. Student attendance of meetings, although lacking during the past year, has never been stronger. True, there are issues such as tenure that do not effect the students directly, but in the end, the issues that Academic Council addresses will directly effect our education. Education is definitely something important to each and every student on this campus.

This issue has been temporarily tabled, and will be presented for a vote at the December faculty meeting. Tabling this proposal is not enough. It needs to be changed. The number of students sitting on Academic Council should equal the number of faculty. This way, both sides will be able to speak their part.

As students, we need to express our concern over these proposed changes. To sit back, and passively allow our right to equal representation be taken away is a waste. This is our education. We pay for it, we're the ones who will be using it. We should have a say in course changes.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Many thanks from the Garnett school playground

Dear Washington College Students, Faculty, and Staff:

Thank you all for your tremendous participation in the construction last week of Garnett School's Community Playground. We could not have done it without you. You showed up in large numbers, often at key points in the five-construction period, and many of you came back day after day eager to do more.

Many thanks also to the following individuals for their special help before and during construction: Dr. and Mrs. Charles Trout, Steve and Linda Cades, Geoff Miller, Ed Maxcy, Laura Hopper, Susie Mazzullo, Julie Athey, Doug Peterson, Marty Williams, members of the SGA, and the staff of Central Services.

We heartily thank the following organizations and dorms for their participation during construction: Kappa Alpha, Phi Delta Theta, Alpha Chi Omega, Phi Sigma Kappa, Theta Chi, A O Pi, Zetas, Lambdas, women's crew, men's and women's lacrosse, volleyball, swimming, tennis, field hockey, soccer, baseball, rugby, Minta Martin, Queen Anne's, Reid, Somerset, Middle, Wicomico, East, Kent, West, Caroline, Worcester, Dorchester, Talbot, Cardinal, Campus Christian Fellowship, Neuman's Club, Pegasus, and The Elm.

Our community discovered itself last week, and we are grateful for your help in that discovery. We look forward to seeing you at the playground often.

The importance of impeccable grammer

Dear Editors,

"I will not go down to posterity talking bad grammer."

- Benjamin Disraeli, 1881

Although Mr. Disraeli didn't use English in its best form, he deserves credit for stating a noble goal. Equally praise-worthy is Ms. Susan Stobbart, whose letter to the editor lamented The Elm's poor grammer. Her principles are anachronisms, but her prejudices are impeccable. She is on my short list of civilization's friends. This list includes the old grammerian whose last words were: "I am about to - or I am going to - die: either expression is correct."

Ms. Stobbart is correct in that The Elm's careless editing reflects poorly on our school. Careless use of our language also reflects poorly on our society. Language serves as our principal force of social cohesion. When we are assaulted

Know Stu before you start to attack him

A letter to the editor:

Is it just me or are many other people tired of seeing the S.G.A. President attacked. Let's face it, a person that becomes involved in a political position, be it a school President or the President of the United States, is going to be up for some harassment. But this is ridiculous! Don't get me wrong, I believe that some of the letters were written with good intentions. But I also believe that the authors of these letters went beyond their intentions, and started attacking Stu in an area that doesn't need to be touched. Mr. Winkelman, for example, seems to think that a jacket and tie are not what a 'normal' student would wear. A jacket and tie are what I regard, a mature adult would wear. You may be correct, but I believe Stu to be a more mature adult than some other people on this campus. As to the cigars, please, I know many people younger and (believe it or not) more 'pompous' than our dear President who find contentment in smoking a good cuban 'stoggie'

But in all these attacks on Stu Neiman, I think most everyone has lost sight of, or never really knew, who Stu Neiman is. I know you're thinking, "What do I care who he is?" But you should know. I mean we know that George Bush loves to fish. What does Stu like to do? Lets face it, we don't know our own S.G.A. President. Maybe you don't want to either, which is your choice, but wouldn't it be a little more fair if you knew who you're attacking? Maybe, quite possibly I'm wrong. But isn't it a lot easier to attack someone who you don't even know?

I realize that I've set myself up for rebuttals and disagreements, but do the editor and me a favor, come see me if you don't agree, or you think I'm an idiot.

My point is proved. Stop slandering Stu!

Emily Daignault

Someone do something about Stu

Dear Editor,

If the SGA refuses to impeach Stuart Neiman because they're "afraid to upset him any further than he already is", maybe the student body ought to impeach the S.G.A.

Sincerely,
James L. Jenkins, Jr.
Junior

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: How do you feel about the recent construction work and reforestation of the Campus

Welcome to the jungle?

Andrew Evans

Upon arriving at school this year, I was pleased to see the ample space for playing frisbee and football in front of the Cullen Dormitories, where I live. During the first couple weeks of school, my friends and I would frequently have catches on the lawn. Occasionally the trees in the middle of the lawn would bring an abrupt end to the flight of a frisbee, but that was only a slight problem that we wrote off as a challenge. Then it happened... I was awoken one morning at 7:00 by the ever so subtle sound of construction. Augers, Back hoes, and bulldozers were busily remolding the earth. At the time the noise was my only concern, the only thing I dislike more than waking is being woken up.

By that afternoon it was apparent that someone intended on robbing us of our playing grounds. The new foliage was lying about the lawn in front of our dorm and on the island across Campus Avenue. Within a week we were blessed with the presence of close to forty new trees just in front of the dorm. Do not get me wrong, I have nothing against trees, but frankly this is ridiculous. Whoever said "Too much of a good thing is never enough." obviously never tried to play frisbee in the middle of a forest.

Furthermore, at the price per tree that the school must have paid a question comes to mind: Is the planting of forty new trees really a necessary part of campus beautification? The trees were not planted until early October, with so little time before cold weather the trees may not have a chance to take root. In this area the ground usually freezes to a depth of two feet, and so the roots will need to be below that depth in order to survive the winter. I would not be surprised if many of the new trees are dead come this spring. if the college did not realize the possibility of failure, I expect that the landscapers would realize this.

The way in which the trees were planted was as absurd as the life of the dung beetle. What's that, you're not familiar with the dung beetle, well let me elaborate. The dung beetle is a small insect that generally inhabits stables, for reasons obvious to its name. the beetle begins with a small piece of dung and it begins rolling it to gather more. The critter continues rolling faster and faster and faster until it amasses on ever-growing, ever-expanding dung empire. In the bug's ultimate moment of glory does it savor it's accomplishment? No, the pile of dung roles back and crushes the life out of the poor fellow. My point is that the campus planting should have been better organized, and that it may in the near future come back to haunt us.

I do believe that the planting of trees across campus is a sound idea and investment. However, if the planting of the trees was planned out a little better, I think it would be much more successful. For instance, the plan would work much better, if the trees were planted in the late spring or early summer and if they were placed more evenly throughout the campus, instead of planting large clusters in just a few location., In the future, I hope the landscaping company and the college will think twice before planting a forest.

I think that a nice looking campus is important for the college's future; but the construction is inconvenient for current students. Living in Worcester, we are awakened early in the morning by the construction and our rooms always have a layer of dust covering everything.

I wish they had asked students' opinions about the landscape and construction plans. We needed campus beautification. Unfortunately, the landscaping has taken away a lot of activity space; open spaces of lawn where people used to play croquet, frisbee, football, etc.

Construction does not make for happy students

Julie Greene

No, I am not pleased with the construction and landscaping taking place on this campus. There are several reasons for this.

First, is that the money spent on bricks could have been used to hire more faculty members needed in crucial areas of study. I personally do not care whether I am walking to the dining hall on dirt or bricks. But, I do care whether or not next semester there will still be professors to teach, as well as classes that are not overbooked.

Second, I do not see enough benefits to outweigh the costs of building a circular drive way in the Kent Quad. I've heard the original intent of this driveway was to make it easier to load and unload cars at the beginning and end of semesters.

Security told me that too many cars were driving over the walkways and grass, so they built an official driveway to help reduce the number of tickets being handed out.

Fine, so now we can all drive legally on Kent Quad. Forget that there was a driveway on the other side of Kent, a road in front of the Cullen Complex, and a driveway by the side of Wicomico leading up to Hodson.

Now, besides the construction waking me up early in the morning, I have to deal with students driving underneath my window, shouting, and beeping their horns at three in the morning. Where is security? Well, let's see. The last two times there were fire drills the on duty officer was napping in Gibson. Should the residents at Cullen really have to get out of their toasty warm beds at three in the morning to leave a message on the answering machine at security, which probably will not be taken care of until the noise outside their window goes away.

Another bonus residents of Cullen and Kent get from the new driveway and construction is a new layer of dust and dirt on all their belongings. I cannot leave a book on my desk for one day without having to wipe a layer of dust of it because I left my window open.

What about all the trees and grass that were destroyed to build that driveway? They were helping us improve the quality of our lives by absorbing carbon dioxide in the atmosphere.

Then there is the fact that the college has decided to take every free space on campus and plant trees there, or rip them up to build a driveway. Where are the students who want to play catch, softball, croquet, frisbee, football, and practice lacrosse supposed to go now? I assume

In the world: Marine reserves called up

United States

The overwhelming majority of senators, governors, and House members were reelected despite a sharp downturn in public mood and an obvious voter distaste for politics. Seventy-two percent of those who voted said the nation is "seriously off the wrong track," according to preliminary results of an ABC Election Day survey with the economy and the Persian Gulf topping the worry list. Sixty-two percent said they trusted the federal government "only some of the time."

The Pentagon announced yesterday that it is considering a call-up of Army combat reserve units. However, since these units may not be ready to fight in the Persian Gulf, Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams said the reserves would likely go to training camp in the American desert first.

Defense Secretary, Richard B. Cheney initiated the first combat reserve call-up since the Korean War, this week, when the Marine Corps asked for and received his permission to summon 3,000 Marine reservists to fill out the 5th Marine Expeditionary Brigade, which would probably be sent to the gulf under a rotation plan now in its final draft.

The first 824 Marines are being called-up this week from units in 14 states, and will report to Camp Pendleton, California. If they go to the Persian Gulf, they will join the more than 200,000 US combat troops and 34,000 non-combat reservists from all services who already are working in support roles in Saudi Arabia as drivers, stevedores, cooks, laundry workers, and water purifiers.

Excavation has begun on nine buried sections of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline for corrosion checks after charges the original inspectors were poorly trained or worked under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

Meanwhile, a federal criminal investigation is underway into accusations by a former corrosion inspector that his employer ignored drinking and drug use on and off the job.

Philippines

Imelda Marcos, after negotiating directly with secret emissaries of the Philippine government, asserted through her Los Angeles attorneys that Manila has agreed to drop its multibillion-dollar damage suit against her in exchange for 60% of whatever funds remain in various Hong Kong banks. Her claim, however, was disputed by lawyers for the Philippines. They characterized the "settlement" as simply a discussion of how to divide the Hong Kong portion of assets controlled by Marcos and the estate of her late husband, former Philippine dictator Ferdinand Marcos.

Jordan

Jordan's King Hussein, taking his plea for peace to a United Nation's conference on global warming, declared this week that if war broke out in the Persian Gulf the world would suffer an ecological catastrophe and death toll "beyond our wildest dreams." Hussein urged government representatives from more than 120 nations to undertake "all possible efforts to resolve the gulf crisis through peaceful negotiations." British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher supported King Hussein's concerns.

they have to walk over to one of the athletic fields, which is being used for a practice or game. It is very difficult to carry anything out to the car when there is a wall of trees blocking my path to the parking lot.

Last, but not least, why weren't the students notified about the construction and the tree planting first? Why weren't they given a say? The administration might reply by saying that there were maps of the Master Plan on display for the student body to see. I looked at one of those maps and I didn't see a driveway, I saw a walkway going around the quad. I think that the students living in Cullen should have been consulted before they planted trees in their front lawn and the field across the street.

On the issue of whether it is beautification, I think they could have done much better. I really don't see the clumps of trees they planted as beautiful. Granted they counteract the trees torn down, and are good for the environment, but they could have been planted in better areas which would have been more practical for the students as well.

One last thought, why was the construction not started until the students came back to campus? I would think summer would have been a more appropriate and practical time for these projects to have been completed.

To the Editor, Students, Faculty, Parents and Board of Visitors and Governors of Washington College:

We are writing to let it be known that the Student Government Association of Washington College, on Monday November 5, 1990 voted unanimously that we want EQUAL representation on the Academic Council. At present, the Council consist of six voting students, and six voting faculty. A proposition has been made by an Ad-Hoc Committee to change this voting number to One Student, and Four Faculty, a ratio which we find highly inadequate and unacceptable. We believe that streamlining the Council is a good idea, but not at the risk of losing student rights. We are asking the faculty to vote to have Three Voting Students and Three Voting Faculty members on the Council, thus preserving the equal ratio requested. Please consider this proposition seriously, as the future of this student body is one of our greatest concerns. Respectfully,

The Student Government Association
of Washington College.

General Assembly internships bring valuble experience

Amy Klamberg

Applications will soon be due for those juniors and seniors interested in the Maryland General Assembly Internships. This program, held at the State Capital, is for all who want to learn more about Maryland politics and the legislative process. Applicants need not be political science majors although all applicants should have a minimum 3.0 G.P.A. to apply. No previous experience in government is necessary.

This internship opportunity, offered second semester every year to upperclassmen, has been a valuable experience for students in a variety of majors. Senior, English major Beth Ann Shepard interned last semester, and found the job to be a definite "maturing experience." Shepard plans to attend law school.

Each intern works closely with a state delegate, and spends most of his time researching issues or testifying before committees. Along with this exciting, front lines work, the intern is also expected to do some of the "drudgery" such as photo copying, reading mail, and filing. The student interns, chosen from colleges across Maryland, are allowed to sit in on any session of the General Assembly.

The student interns often find themselves dealing with very timely issues such as the environment, and abortion. Senior Brooke Frank worked for the delegate who ran the well publicized pro-life filibuster last spring in the Assembly. The interns really get a sense of the issues important to the residents of Maryland. Many interns, for example, worked on non-tidal wetlands legislation.

Senior, political science major, Steven Bruchey said he found the experience fascinating because it gave him a close look at the process of lobbying, "I got to deal with about 90% of the lobbyists who wanted to speak to my boss [Delegate Weir]"

The interns also got a chance to meet with lobbyists and legislative 'staffers' at receptions. These gatherings give the students a chance to talk about the issues they do research on with the political professionals.

The internship program is worth a total of eight credit hours (the equivalent of two regular classes.) The students work in Annapolis every Tuesday and Thursday. The credits are divided equally between work at the Capital and class room sessions. Every Monday, the student interns meet with Dr. Weissman for a seminar. This gives the participants a chance to discuss their experiences. The interns must also submit a paper to Dr. Weissman applying an issue they have dealt with on the job to some aspect of their major, and a bill analysis to Annapolis. "The issue paper is great," says Bruchey, "because it lets you take any bill you're interested in and apply it to your field."

All students interested should contact Dr. Weissman as soon as possible for applications. The internship program will start a week before classes begin next semester and will last until April. Senior Marie Ensor reflected that her experiences at the General Assembly were "a chance to see all of the facets of the legislative process come together."

Amy Tiehel

As I recall, weekends used to be fun at Washington College. Those seniors who were here with me freshman year know what I'm talking about. Parties like the Sig's Halloween Bash, S.G.A. dances and fraternity parties were celebrated events. What happened to "fun" weekends at the Wac? The answer is that many individuals abuse the freedom we are given here. This in turn has limited our social activities and has resulted in "boring" weekends.

Is it any wonder that there have been few parties allowed on campus this semester? It seems that on quite a few weekends this year drunk, obnoxious students have behaved in ways not exactly exemplary of the mature college student. These students made the choice to drink and acted irresponsibly because of it. This hurts the rest of us who can have a good time responsibly.

The issue doesn't have to be about banning alcohol altogether. However, it could come to that if we don't step back, take a look and make some changes ourselves. We need to realize as a student body that there are students here who actually have drinking problems. Many will say "So, what? It's no big deal. We're just in college." It is a big deal, and guess what, Many people develop life long habits in college.

Too many students depend on alcohol as the basis of their social life. Alcohol becomes the social life. What if our campus went "dry?" What would we do then? Sure, many would resort to off-campus bars and off-campus parties. However, this would soon get old and we would be forced to find other means of entertainment. So, given the choice, why do we always choose alcohol? It relieves pressure, tension and social insecurities. Also, getting drunk can sometimes be really fun. I'm the first to admit that I enjoy drinking beers with my friends or engaging in an occasional caps game.

The issue, therefore, is when we do drink, how much do we drink and why are we doing it? I've found that sometimes when I'm out on a weekend, and I'm not drinking, people will give me a hard time. Either I can't drink or I just don't feel like it. Quite a few people will play twenty questions trying to discern if I'm abnormal or not. When I do drink I often wonder if I'm doing it because everyone else is or because I really feel like it. I look around and see many out of control because they just didn't know when to stop.

If we can learn how to control ourselves when we're drinking and realize when enough is enough, we will all be the better for it. College is about becoming an adult and learning your limitations. We, the students at Washington College, need to grow up and make the right decisions in order to start having fun the way it used to.

Crew makes waves at Occoquan Invitational

By Petra Fajerson

Blue skies and temperatures in the eighties this past Saturday was an exception to the usually temperamental conditions at the Occoquan invitational regatta. The first race of the day was the men's novice eight in which WC placed 10th out of 19. This was the novice's first race of college crew and the men looked exhausted yet exhilerated as they got off the water. John Wagner, who has been standing in for the new crew coach Mike Davenport (who is in Tasmania assisting in the coaching of the US national team), felt the novice had done well and rowed up to their abilities.

The women's novice eight race that followed was equally exciting for rowers Jen Sendax, Jen Hozik, Suzanne Groner, Kate Towery, Berna Kemahli, Laura Green, Mary Bird, Kara Wieseneaught, and coxswain Merritt Pridgeon. Attaining 5th place out of 19 boats the women's novice program has proved itself outstanding in beating competitors such as Loyola, Bucknell, and William and Mary.

The third race including a WC boat was of the men's championship eight. Unfortunately, the official starts and times of this race were so inaccurate that the official place of WC cannot be considered a true representation of the mens' strength and skill in comparison to the competitors. The men felt they had rowed a strong piece with a good set, so it was understandably disappointing to end up with an official time of at least 25 seconds more than their actual time.

The women of the WC championship eight came in 5th out of 8 boats, finishing less than a minute after the first place winner. Transfer student Stina Sturges who rowed at University of Vermont last year was very pleased with the race. She felt coxswain Liz Corone did an excellent job in keeping the rowers motivated to give their all throughout the race.

Results have not yet come in for three of the races WC competed in. The boats entered for the men's and women's championship four races consisted entirely of rowers who had already raced earlier in the day. In the club eight boat there were also several rowers for whom it was the second race in the regatta. Obviously it is difficult to keep a good form and power having already given 110 percent in a previous event, but all the boats were able to maintain good pressure and look clean at the finish.

Overall it was a successful day for the WC crew team. Although no medals were won, each of the competing boats brought home the satisfaction of personal victories. The novice had the excitement of their first collegiate level race, and the varsity rowers had felt the improvement of their racing capabilities since the previous year. On November 17th the team will compete in the last race of the season at the Schuylkill Regatta in Philadelphia.

WAC Ruggers upset Millersville 7-6, stunning the Union

By Seth Engel

The Washington College Rugby team's Cinderella season got back on track last Sunday with a thrilling one point win over Millersville University .

In a tough match marred by ugly instances of cheap shots and questionable calls by the referee(who happened to be an injured Millersville player), the WAC (2-1) ruggers dug deep to erase a six point deficit and come back to win 7-6.

The opening few minutes were brutal. Millersville attempted to intimidate the WAC team with hard, illegal high hits. The first two minutes saw the hooker Frank Crivelli take a shot to the head that left him unconscious for a number of scary seconds. However, in a heroic show of heart and guts, Crivelli regained consciousnes and continued to play. This fired up the team, and strengthened its resolve. Crivelli's unprecedented team spirit lit the WAC ruggers' fire. Soon after, fly half Chuck Cort took an illegal forearm to the throat and went down hard. However, following Crivelli's lead, he bounced back up and asked for more.

The Millersville team struck first blood with a fluke bounce that ended up in the WAC try zone. A try and conversion gave them a 6-0 first half lead. The WAC ruggers were heartened by Crivelli and Cort's guts though, and didn't lose hope. They started to dominate the set scrums. Their tenacious defense didn't let play enter the WAC side of the field for the remainder of the forty-minute half.

After a rousing halftime pep talk by captains Crivelli and Eric Bach, the WAC ruggers came out with fire in their eyes and desire in their hearts for the second half. A quick penalty was called on Millersville; prop Matt Wickwire was faced with a very difficult free kick from forty yards out. Carefully measuring his steps, he put foot to ball and forty yards later the score had been cut in half, 6-3. The tide was definitely starting to drown the Millersville 15.

The Shoremen continued to dominate play, narrowly missing scores on numerous occasions. With about fifteen minutes to play, Cort burst through to block a Millersville kick deep in their

The Untaming of Shakespeare

by Brett Lankford

The drama department presents their modern adaptation of a classic when The Taming of the Shrew is performed on November 15, 16 and 17. The production, directed by drama professor Dale Daigle, does not take the traditional approach to Shakespeare's comedy. Instead, Daigle has incorporated some contemporary material and joined it with the Shakespearean text for an extremely creative and intriguing production.

Daigle decided to direct Shrew for a couple of different reasons. It has been five years since a Shakespearean play was performed at Washington College. "Every class should have one chance at doing Shakespeare," Daigle said. "I've wanted to do this play for a long time, but I've never had the right opportunity. The students also wanted to do something by Shakespeare." He readily admits that Shakespeare has always been his first love, and he has worked with Shakespearean text off and on for twenty years.

In addition, Daigle was also looking to present the play in a different manner. "While working on the script, I couldn't escape what seemed to be an undercurrent of brutality, abuse and exploitation in this apparent comedy." Daigle decided to make this the focus of his production. "The play is still very funny, but this production looks below the surface of that and elucidates some aspects that are not normally brought to light."

The director has attempted to deal with this new approach in a variety of ways. "I hate to use the word deconstruct because it sounds like pedagogical jargon, but in essence we have deconstructed the text," Daigle stated. He hopes that the addition of the contemporary material will help to shed some light on both the Shakespearean text as well as the modern piece. Daigle does warn that the contemporary work is graphic and explicit, and he suggests that anyone offended by visceral language should stay away.

Daigle admits that this has been more of a challenge than he had ever imagined. "I have always believed in the essence of the idea, but the evolution of it has brought into play the imaginations of all the people involved. The infinite possibilities that have resulted have been difficult to focus." The production has had an extended rehearsal period and has required an extreme commitment from the actors. Indeed, the collaboration between director and students has been one of the highlights of this production.

Cindy Croot and Jason West play the roles of Katherine and Petruchio, while Felicia Shakman plays the part of "the woman". Other cast members include Jeff Daly, Carey Smith, Clay Eichelberger, India Henson, Tim Madison, Karen Iacangelo, Jason Imber, Carl Pupa and Abrah Wilberding. Jason Rubin has designed the show's set, and Tom Andrews is technical director. The performance begins at 8:00 in Tawes Auditorium on Thursday, November 15. It is the last drama department production of the fall semester. Admission is free and open to the public.

Submissions needed for new literary magazines

by Bruce Hamilton

Attention all writers, poets, photographers, and artists! There are a number of new literary magazines in need of submissions. These magazines are diversified enough to suit almost all genres and creative venues.

Otherworlds is a magazine of typical genres. It will accept Science Fiction (all types), Fantasy (all types), Horror, Mystery (not action/adventure), Western, and "even Gothic Romance". Raphael Koster, the editor, states that there will also be essays on these genres. Otherworlds will also take poetry submissions and artwork in any of the genres. Submissions can be made to Koster through campus mail, quickmail, or to 213 Caroline or Koster's mailbox in the O'Neil Literary House. The deadline for Otherworlds is November 10, however, the editor is willing to work with manuscripts still in progress past that date.

Koster is also the editor of Translations. Translations will accept poetry and short stories from any language (French, Latin, Japanese, Chinese, etc.). Submissions should be in original language and English. Koster will help to polish the English of any translation and can help translate any Spanish. The deadline for Translations is November 15, and submissions can be made to the same address as above.

Shoestrings is a magazine dedicated to children's literature and poetry. Editors Keri Nygaard and Ann Veiga will be working with local elementary and middle schools and will also take submissions from Washington students. The deadline for submissions is December 15. Submissions should be made to either the mailboxes of either Veiga or Nygaard in the O'Neil Literary house. Anyone interested in helping with Shoestrings should contact the editors.

Basic Generic Magazine will contain poetry, short stories, children's literature, illustrations, and black and white photographs. The name of the magazine, according to the editors, "says it all". The editors of Basic Generic Magazine are Caitlin Bell-Hicken, Mark Phanuf, and Wendy Bridges. Photographs should be 8"x10". The dealine for submissions is November 10, and should be left in the editors mail-boxes at the O'Neil Literary House.

The Broadsides editors this semester are Tanya Allen and Rechel Demma. Submissions can be made anytime to the Broadsides mailbox (also in the Literary House). Broadsides will accept poetry, short stories and pen and ink illustrations. Unused submssions will be returned.

Bruce Hamilton is a junior and the Arts Editor.

He also reported on the Academic Council meeting. Currently 6 students, 6 faculty and two non-voting Dean's sit on an Ad-Hoc committee to discuss student needs and curriculum changes at W.C. The committee, according to Kelly, needs streamlining. The faculty members of the committee would like to cut the membership to 4 faculty and 1 student, but students involved feel that the committee needs equal student representation. The SGA voiced many concerns about the proposal.

Sophomore Whitney Myrus said that this resolution would change the personal feeling of Washington College into something more like larger schools where there is a division between faculty and students. Senior Class Vice-President, Suzanne Hewes agreed. She said that "this is our school" and that we as students should have some say in those changes that will affect us. The SGA voted unanimously to endorse equal representation at the Academic Council.

In addition, Kelly "urges students to go to faculty members to discuss the proposal about equal representation on the Academic Council. I feel that we deserve equal say in deciding the curriculum since we are the ones who are taking the classes and paying the bills." The SGA also suggested that students not only talk to faculty to express their feelings, but also that parents should send letters to the faculty in support of student representation.

Finally Kelly reported that Stuart Neiman had made an agreement with the Vice-President of Simmons Cable that the company would come into the dorms and re-install cable for free. The cable issue needs to be looked into more closely and Kelly is meeting with Gene Hessey to discuss it.

With all business having been completed, the SGA adjourned for the evening. The next meeting will be Tuesday night at 9:00 in the Sophie Kerr Room. Everyone is invited and encouraged to attend.

Campus plan nearly complete

A familiar sight for the residents of Kent and the Cullen Dormitories until recently. Construction of the Hodson Loop is now complete.

By: Susie Mazzullo

There will not be any more early morning wake up calls by bulldozers for the residents of the Cullen Dormitories because a meeting with Clint Baer, Director of Planning and Special Projects, revealed that the Campus Plan is almost one hundred percent complete. "Construction around the dormitories ended with the completion of the Hodson Loop," said Baer.

To date, a number of projects of the Campus Plan have been completed. Among them are the new tennis courts behind the Cardinal dormitories, the Hodson Loop road, and the extensive landscaping that has been taking place.

Eight new intercollegiate tennis courts are ready for use by Washington College students. They are located behind Cardinal and were constructed by Sports Systems out of Rockville, Maryland. The company specializes in the construction of tennis courts.

The courts are on two levels with landscaping on both sides. The landscaping was felt necessary for two reasons. It does indeed add aesthetic beauty to the area but its main purpose is to cut down on the wind. The nets will remain up until the bad winter weather hits, so until then, the courts are ready for play.

Also in that same area is a five acre field that is available for recreational use. The five acres have recently been reseeded so that by the spring the area will be ready for students to join in a pick up game of football, throw a frisbee, or participate in any other recreational sport.

The Hodson Loop road has also recently been completed. The completion of this project finishes any construction around the dorms the the time being. The policy for parking in front of the dorms, in the newly created spots, however, will soon be restricted. The parking will be restricted to the pick up and unloading of students and their belongings at the moving in and moving out times of the year. Clint Baer says that this is for two reasons. One is that the dormitories are simply more attractive without cars parked beside them. Parked cars will take away from the buildings. The second reason is for safety of the vehicles. The area in the middle of the loop has been reseeded and is intended for use by the students for recreational activities. Cars could ultimately be damaged by a thrown football or a hit baseball if cars are parked too close.

The landscaping projects that have been taking place primarily around the new Academic Resource Center (ARC) and the north entrance of the college, are also nearly complete. A substantial number of Maple trees have been planted as well as some surrounding shrubery. The landscaping plans were made by Alan Myers of the Bucher-Myers Architectural Firm.

Clint Baer explained that the extensive amount of landscaping was for a reason. Primarily, it was to shield the parking area in front of the new dorms from those entering the college by the north entrance. The trees will give the person driving by something else to see besides the parking lot. Also, the larger trees will take some time to grow. The surrounding plants, therefore, will give the area some color during all four seasons, not just in the spring, and fill in until the Maple trees can take root and prosper. Baer commented that we need to give the area some time to grow into what the plan was intended to be. "I think the spring will be very interesting with all of the flowering trees and plants."

The Academic Resource Center is also near completion. Since Monday and continuing throughout the week, furniture has been in the process of being moved into the building. Some areas still remain to be completed and like any new building, last minute problems need to be corrected, but the building will be open for the spring semester. During the next six to eight weeks, concentration will be on the completion of the fixtures and the moving in of supplies. Most of the book store fixtures have already been installed and the equipment for the computerized classrooms has arrived. Some students can look forward to attending class in the ARC as some classes are already scheduled to be held there.

The Academic Resource Center was made possible by the generosity of the Casey Family, especially, Betty Brown Casey.

The next major project soon to be launched is the start of construction on the Fitness Center that will be located near the gym. Bids have been accepted and administration is currently evaluating them. Ground breaking ceremonies are scheduled to be held during the December board meeting. Baer says that construction is scheduled to begin "when spring weather permits."

For the most part, construction on campus is complete, at least until the warm spring weather is upon us. Construction around the dormitories, however, is complete.

SGA discusses Neiman

By: Laura Hopper

The Student Government Association of Washington College met in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library on November 13th, 1990. Acting President Kevin Kelly called the meeting to order. Following roll call, and the approval of the minutes from the previous meeting, the Senate confirmed the selection of Brooke Frank as acting vice president. SGA Parliamentarian Gordy Scherer administered the oath of office.

SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson reported that current club spending for the semester equaled $4211.00. Gimelson also reported that he had discussed funding a band with Alpha Chi. The band, Disappear Fear, would perform in the Coffee House on the same night as the annual Alpha Chi Casino Night. The Senate approved $800 for the band.

Gimelson also presented funding requests. The first was from Diana Holden and Elizabeth Driscoll. Holden and Driscoll both have been involved in a psychology experiment, and have submitted a paper proposal to a convention in New York City. If their proposal is accepted, they would present their paper and would need funds to defray their traveling and housing expenses. The Senate approved $750 with the stipulation that they will receive the funding only if they are to present their paper.

The second proposal came from freshman Marie Jerardi, who is involved in the Kent County Christmas Committee. The Committee helps provide food and gifts for underprivileged families in Kent County. The Committee would like campus organizations to "adopt" families, and the SGA funding would be used to help the families that are not adopted. The Senate approved $500.

SGA Secretary Jenny Albers announced that the winner of the Garnett School Playground most dorm member participation contest would be announced at the next SGA meeting.

Next, Kelly read a letter from SGA Parliamentarian Gordy Scherer requesting that the SGA begin impeachment procedures against President Stuart Neiman. Neiman suffered a gun shot wound in the left leg, and is in Florida convalescing. Kelly informed the Senate that the Executive Board of the SGA had been debating various proposals, and had decided to write to Neiman and ask him for his resignation. Kelly remarked that he felt that it would be "detrimental to Stu's therapy to find out he's being impeached." Kelly went on to say that if impeachment was necessary, he would prefer it take place next semester.

Secretary Jenny Albers remarked that she felt Neiman's resignation would protect the integrity of the office.

Scherer, in support of his stand, pointed out that Neiman is not enrolled in 8 credit hours, and is unable to perform his duties as SGA president. Scherer went on to say that he did not feel it was right for Kelly and Frank to spend their time as only acting president and vice president.

After a lengthy debate between senators and board members, the Senate decided that the Executive Board would contact Neiman and request his resignation for medical reasons. This would be done first by phone and then by letter to be answered by Neiman within a time limit of two weeks. The motion passed by a vote of 6 to 5, with 9 abstentions.

Next, Kelly reported to the Senate on the Cable issue. Kelly clarified that Neiman had not made any sort of deal with Simmons cable. Kelly has spoken to Gene Hessey about the cable proposal, but there is no agreement yet with the company.

The proposed changes in the size and composition of the Academic Council have been sent back to the Ad Hoc Committee on Governance. The proposal, whatever form it is in, will be voted on at the December 5th faculty meeting. Kelly said the Student Affairs Committee is in support of the student position that the student - faculty ratio on the Academic Council be equal.

Kelly also presented some preliminary proposals from the Ad Hoc Committee on Student Life. The 3 proposals dealt with policy changes that would move parties out of the dorms and into large, more easily controlled areas.

Following the meeting, several SGA members were willing to comment on the Neiman issue. Scherer said he had been approached by several people who were wondering what actions the SGA was going to take. Said Scherer, "I believe we [the SGA] have a responsibility to uphold the rules of the College."

Advice to a stressing senior

A job hunting senior asked what her liberal arts education is worth. She had just returned from a seminar on finding on careers in public relations. She is afraid that her education here at Washington College had not taught her the specialized skills she will need to compete in the job market.

When we were younger, we used the phrase "When I grow up" now that we are in college, the phrase has been changed to "When I'm out in the real world."

To all those who wonder what we are being prepared for, the answer is we are being taught to think, to organize ourselves into productive units, to challenge ourselves and our peers. We will have the well rounded education that did not confine us to one narrow set of courses designed to push us into one career.

Many people in the Senior class will go on to graduate school, and obtain the specialized skills that today's job market is asking for. Many skills can be learned here, through extracurricular activities.

To the panicking senior, a final bit of advice. Your education has prepared you better than you can understand right now, the true value of your time spent here will be apparent some time in the future.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Winkleman answers Daignault

Is there anybody in there?

An old proverb states "Ignorance is Bliss." Miss Emily Daignault is obviously very happy. Your hypocritical article of a week ago requires an explanation on my part and a tutorial on your part.

Do you look both ways before you discredit it. Your point is that one should not attack a peer without first knowing them. Mr. Stuart Neiman and I happen to be friends. My Sophomore year, that being Mr. Neiman's Freshman year, Stuart and I were very good friends. We participated in multiple school activities together and talked quite regularly. As I was in England last year our friendship grew apart but we have spoken on a few occassions this year. You, on the contrary, know neither Mr. Neiman or myself; ergo, you are a hypocrite.

Your perpetual ignorance is again displayed when you suggest nobody on campus knows the real Stu Neiman. The man was not an introvert. He did come out of his Minta Martin luxury suite a few times a week for food and water and on those occasions I can assure you that the ensuing conversations were enjoyable for both parties. Many people know Stu. Maybe we should have a game show or a forum to satisfy such mislead perceptions as your own. You do realize that the SGA President is elected by the students, do you not?

You then touched on the quite dead and extremely beaten horse of Mr. Neiman's attire. It is not normal for a twenty year old college student to wear a jacket and tie everyday. I am impressed by his lovely apparel but it is not normal. Let me not imply that things out of the normal are bad in some way, my writing style, for example, is not normal (although many would also argue it is bad in some way.) You then suggest this attire displays the advanced maturity of Mr. Neiman. Excuse me but does a surveillance camera and multiple firearms necessitate a mature person? Perhaps if you were Al Haig or Sam Nunn, but probably not otherwise.

As you ended your not quite so illustrious letter, you did admit your ignorance, which I appreciate. You encouraged me to seek and confront you to respond to your letter. Hypocracy once again

In the world: Iraq searches for support in the Arab world

PERSIAN GULF:

Iraqui envoys travelled to several Arab capitals today to discuss their conditions for attending summit on the Persian Gulf crisis. Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia, Iraq's principle adversaries, have declined to comment on the summit proposed by Moroccan King Hassan II. Hassan has called the Summit a last chance to avert war in the Gulf. Arriving in Morocco with a message for Hassan, Iraqui First Deputy Prime Minister Taha Yassin Ramadan said that Iraq "is with any serious Arab action at any level that would serve the Arab nation." Along with Ramadan's visit, Morocco's Foreign Ministry also said Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir Petrovski was to arrive to discuss the Gulf crisis. Saudi Arabia is waiting to find out whether the Iraqui-Moroccan meetings lead to a proposal that could provide the foundation for a successful summit. As of now, the Saudis are skeptical that Iraq will pull out of Kuwait under the terms of the U.N. and Arab League resolutions. The Saudis also believe that Saddam Hussein wants long, drawn out negotiations that will link the Kuwait occupation with the Isreali-Palestinian issue.

GERMANY:

On Monday, several hundred anarchist apartment squatters on one street in East Berlin built barricades to fend off 1,400 police officers. In a battle that lasted five hours, the squatters fought police by throwing rocks, metal rods and molotov cocktails from rooftops. The police responded with tear gas and water cannons. After the battle ended, the barricade still stood and 20 squatters were arrested and 135 police officers had been injured. The next day the squatters were again at work building ternches and reenforcing the barricade to keep out the police assigned to evict them. Before Berlin was reunified, police and West Berlin anarchists battled each other on a weekly basis. Now, however the West Berlin anarchists have moved to East Berlin where open conflict with the authorities was unknown. The problem is caused by a housing shortage and a surplus of students in the city. Many other cities also have a problem with squatters, but in Berlin there is an added factor: the city became a magnet for draft-dodgers and anarchists because West Berlin residents were exempt from West Germany's mandatory military service. The squatters say they will hold on to this street in East Berlin as long as possible.

UNITED STATES:

Key Senate Republican leaders urged President Bush Tuesday to call a special session of congress to approve his plans for major new troop deployments in the Persian Gulf region. Neither the White House nor Democratic Congressional leaders responded positively to this proposal. Senate Democrats announced that hearings will be held during Congress' mid-winter recess on the administration's move toward a more offensive military policy in the Gulf. Support for U.S. policy in the Gulf is eroding both in the U.S. and abroad as war becomes a greater threat. Secretary of State James Baker defended the continued buildup by saying that the Iraqui Occupation of Kuwait threatens the "economic lifeline" of the West and that the massive military deployment in the region is justified to protect American jobs. On the possibility of a U.S. attack on Iraq Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn and Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Claiborne Pell, all of whom are democrats, said in a joint statement: "If it is the President's intention to ask the American people to stand behind a military mission that goes beyond deterring Iraq from attack on Saudi Arabia, the President owes the American people the fullest possible explanation of what our military mission is in that region and how he hopes to achieve that goal.

The government gave researchers permission on Tuesday to begin using gene therapy, a radical, but unproven, strategy of scientifically manipulating genes to combat disease. In a matter of weeks, researchers at the National Institutes of Health plan to inject genetically altered white blood cells into three patients with advanced cases of a malignant skin cancer for which there is no effective cure once the cancer has spread from the skin to other organs. The scientists hope the white blood cells will their way to the patients tumors and release a potent cancer-busting compound that could shrink or even destroy the growths. Other cancer patients are also scheduled to be injected in an attempt to gather a wide base of information. Results should be available within the next year.

The Greek update

What is Lambda Pi Delta up to, you ask? Since September we have become an integral part of the Chestertown community as well as the college community. In October, our fraternity helped construct the new Garnett School playground showing our concern and willingness to help out in Chestertown. This opportunity also helped us become even closer with the community and its needs. On Halloween we turned Cecil into the Haunted Fun House and opened our doors to Chestertown's children in yet another effort to closen our ties with the town. The Fun House was a great success and we hope to expand and make it an annual Lambda Pi Delta - Zeta Tau Alpha event every year. Also this fall, Lambda Pi Delta was proud to announce that we captured the highly esteemed Loving Cup by achieving the highest fraternal G.P.A. and we hope to make this an annual event as well. We are extremely proud of this honor because it shows us that social, athletic, and academic success go hand in hand.

This new year also brought our fraternity a new order of leadership. President Jeff Rexford and Vice-President Benji Ward take over as does Dr. Conkling, our new faculty advisor, who will also assist in the many important tasks placed on the new leadership. Other Lambda Pi Delta officers include: Dave Lipinski - Secretary, John Hernandez - Treasurer, and John Morrall - Social Chair. Front and foremost is the issue of national status. This year we seek a national fraternity to meet the demands of the school. All fraternities and sororities must be nationally affiliated and thus our new government has its work cut out for it. A key ingredient in a successful attempt to go national is continued support and guidance from the faculty and administration. Without this cooperation our task is impossible and by staying on course with our successful start this year, we hope to keep those school and community ties open.

This week's Greek Update was supplied by the brothers of Lambda Pi Delta. Members of any greek organization are welcome to submit accounts of their groups actions to the Elm through Campus Mail, either on disk or in typewritten form.

Washington College's boredom can be fatal

fiction

I was working on a case one night, one of the toughest murder mysteries I have ever encountered in my young private detective career. It was a classic case of lover's jealousy. She had accused him of infidelity. He had flatly denied it and slapped her across the face. The next thing I knew, the guy wound up dead—a bullet right through the heart.

All that night the questions kept rising in my mind like bubbles in club soda. Which of the two women had killed this poor sap? Where was the murder weapon now? Was it a possible conspiracy between the girls against the guy? What time did "M*A*S*H" come on? What was I going to eat for dinner? Should I go to Newt's or the Vern?

I tell you, there were just too many angles on this case, and I don't like angles when it comes to murder. I decided to give up for the night, go home to my apartment, have a shot of bourbon and get a couple hours of shut-eye. But as I stood up, I heard my outer office door open and close, and I figured my night was just about to begin.

"Can you help me?"

The partial lighting in the office hid my visitor's face, and I motioned for him to sit down.

"Well, that depends on what kind of help you need."

The visitor, an older gentleman with deep lines carved in his face, leaned forward in his chair and said in a small voice, "There's been a series of murders at Washington College."

I poured each of us a double shot of sour mash whiskey while my new client continued his intriguing story.

"Well, Inspector, it all started last Wednesday night when a body was discovered in the basement of Reid Hall. The next day, two bodies were uncovered in the laundry room of Minta Martin. And finally, this morning, a corpse turned up in the C-House. The strange thing about these deaths is that not one corpse showed any sign of foul play. There were no bullet or knife wounds, or signs of lethal blows with blunt objects. No, none of the bodies had a scratch on them. However, they were all found in the same position, with their hands over their faces and legs tucked underneath them. This particular body position leads me to believe that the murderer maybe drugged them or strangled them. In any case, the fact is that we won't know until the autopsy reports come back, and right now we have no suspects, no motives, and a lot of speculation. Oh, Inspector, can you help me? As a college official it is my job to get to the bottom of this horrible mystery and restore the school to normal operation. Please understand my position. There is a black cloud looming large over the campus of Washington College and I want you to find this evil killer. Of course, he'll probably only get kicked out for a semester for behavior unbecoming of a Washington College student, but at least we will have shown that we, as a college, pay strict attention to our honor code."

I was leaning back in my desk chair with my fingertips together in front of my face. The official's story fascinated me and I kept turning the unique characteristics of the case over and over in my head. Questioning my client, I took down a few scratch notes about the victims and then concluded, "Well, let me tell you what I plan to do. I'll go up to the campus, investigate the scene of each death, and give you a preliminary report of my findings tomorrow. However, I must warn you that with such a large student body, the chances of finding this bastard are about as good as those of the dining hall serving a good meal."

The official stood up and we shook hands. He said he had to get back home because it was almost time for "The Gong Show." He thanked me for my decision to take the case and expressed extreme confidence in my ability to bring this killer to justice. As I heard the door close, I told myself it was going to be a long night and downed another shot of whiskey.

As I walked up High Street towards campus, the neon of Chestertown's jazzy nightclubs reflected off the wet sidewalks and, by the time I reached Minta Martin, a thick curtain of fog had engulfed the campus. The place was as quiet as a cemetery. As I entered the dorm, I made sure that I had extra bullets in my overcoat pocket. I turned toward the flight of steps that led to the basement, and cautiously entered the hall where the laundry room was located. I moved slowly, looking at each door I passed. STU NEIMAN-S.G.A. PRESIDENT.

"Ah yes, the Neiman case." What I had expected to be an assassination attempt turned out to be nothing more than a self-inflicted bullet wound.

It seemed like I had just handled that case yesterday. But I was here on new business, and made my way to the laundry room. The scene there was the same as the scenes in both Reid Hall and the C-House would turn out to be. There were chalk outlines of the bodies and, as the official had said, no signs of foul play.

It became clear to me that I wasn't going to get to the bottom of these detestable murders until I spoke with the roommates of the victims.

"Where were you the night your roommate cashed in her chips?"

"I was in the library, Inspector."

"Did she say or do anything odd?"

"No, sir, she came in from studying and said she wanted to go out, but nobody else wanted to do anything, so she stayed here. She'd been complaining about the poor weekends around here and how boring they are. But I wouldn't call that an odd statement, I would call it cold, hard fact."

The other interviews pretty much followed the same pattern. And I was beginning to get some very strange feelings about this case.

The next day, I told the college official about my findings.

"Look, Inspector, you don't possibly expect me to believe that these people died from boredom, do you?"

"No, I'm not asking you to believe it, I'm just asking you to consider it as a very real possibility."

"Now you listen to me, Inspector," asserted the college official sternly. "The fact of the matter is that I've got four dead bodies on this campus and no explanation. I want good solid evidence and I want it now. Is that understood?"

My right hand instinctively clenched itself into a knot and connected squarely with the official's chin. He hit the ground in a lump. I kicked him in the kidneys twice and when he finally turned over, spitting up blood, I said, "Now look here, what you've got is four dead bodies without a scratch on 'em. You have got to realize that this is not about murder, it's not about suicide attempts, it's about having a school where the weekends stink, the parties are lame, and everybody wants to go home. These people keeled over from boredom, as the autopsy reports will attest, and if you don't want the entire student body to follow suit like a pack of lemmings running off a cliff, you had damn better do something to make this school fun."

Thoroughly peeved at the official's closed-mindedness, I pulled out my revolver, pushed the end of the barrel up against his nose, and growled, "You know that there are more bored students out there that are on the edge of death and need help—find 'em or I'll find you. Now, Mr. Official, this case is permanently closed, and if you don't mind I've got a date with a glass of finely aged scotch and a classic, kick-ass John Wayne movie, The Flying Leathernecks."

I walked slowly out of the official's office to let him know I meant business. And as I made my way back to my place, I felt glad that I wasn't a student at Washington College.

SPORTS

Preview: Women's swim team

Matt Giller

New swim coach Kim Lessard takes over the helm leading a team that has compiled a 28-5 record over the last 3 years - 10-2 last season. The transition from former coach Dennis Berry(who now coaches the new men's swim team) to Lessard should not be a difficult one since she has been the assistant at the WAC for two years.

Lessard has been dealt an interesting hand as first year coach - out of 15 swimmers, eight are freshmen or first year swimmers at the WAC. The talented rookies and the experienced veterans should complement each other for another successful season.

The wealth of talent in the upperclass is led by junior All-American Kasey Carroll. Her versatility is extremely valuabble to the team. Kasey will swim the freestyle, butterfly, and IM events.

Co-captain senior Sam Streamer, who placed in 3 individual events at the MAC Championships, will lead the team in the sprint free events.

"Lester the Molester" Leslie Newcomb,junior, who also placed in 3 events at the MAC's will be a stronger asset in the breaststroke and distance free events.

The other co-captain senior Vickie Vahos has qualified for the MAC's the past two years in the backstroke. She proved in last Saturday's meet against Ursinus that she will be valuable in sprint free events.

Senior Kristin Callazzo wasn't able to finish the 1989-90 season due to injury. If healthy, Kristin will be extra depth in the freestyle and backstroke events.

Junior Karen Brady has competed in the MAC's in the past 2 years. Karen's been a wonderful asset in all freestyle events.

Joan Colton, junior, will add depth in the fly and IM events.

The eight new swimmers are led by Mimi Devlin, an IM specialist. The freshman recorded the 2nd All-time fastest IM for WC on Saturday in her first intercollegiate meet.

Also in her first meet in the Big Time, Jennifer Green swam the 3rd fastest backstroke time for the Shorewomen.

Other newcomers include Ramsey Bingham who adds depth in the 50 and 100 freestyle. Jennifer McCartney will swm the butterfly and breastroke. Magdalina Fuchs will swim the 50, 100, 200 freestyle. Kelly Loftus will be penciled in in the backstroke, IM, and distance freestyle events. Denim Burk will take to the blocks in the freestyle and breastroke events. Sophomore Karen Prendergast adds depth to the butterfly, backstroke, and IM.

Last Saturday, the Shorewomen hit the home waters hosting a tough Ursinus squad. Ursinus, who had already had a meet under their belt fended off the WAC in a grueling 111-94 victory. Ursinus, incidentally, was responsible for one of the WAC's two losses last year. While Shorewomen finished the year ninth in the Conference, Ursinus finished in the #3 slot.

Carroll came away with three first place finishes(500 free, 1000 free, and free relay, which included Streamer, Brady, and Devlin).

Seven members have already qualified for the MAC Championships with outstanding times: Devlin(100 fly, 200 IM), Carroll(500 and 100 free), Streamer(100 and 200 free), Green(50 free and backstroke), Vahos(200 backstroke), Newcomb(200 breastroke), and McCartney(100 butterfly).

Matt Giller is a senior International Studies major. His hobbies include testing car batteries with his tongue, thumbing through Cliff Notes, and making strange noises with his arm pits. His ambition is to be as cool as Amy Tiehel.

Swimmer Carroll is honored

While junior Kasey Carroll is nationally recognized for her success in the pool, it isn't until now that her success in the classroom as been appreciated at a national level. Carroll recently was named to the 1990 College Swimming Coaches Association of America All-Academic Team.

Out of 156 chosen for CSCAA squad, the All-American Carroll is one of just 30 Division III women. She has stood out in the pool by holding or sharing 12 W.C. swimming records in just two short years.

Applicants for the CSCAA are required to have participated at the NCAA or NAIA Swimming Championships. Requirements in the classroom include a cumulative GPA of at least 3.5.

Among the 15 schools that compete in the Middle Atlantic Conference, only Washington College was represented on the CSCAA team.

Rugby narrowly defeats Severn River

By Simon Black and Kevin McLaughlin

This past Saturday saw the College's fledgling rugby club overcome adverse weather conditions and a determined onslaught by the Severn River Men's Rugby Club to extend their first season's record to a respectable 3 and 1.

Those who braved the rain and biting wind saw a battle of attrition take shape as each team tried to use the wet and windy conditions to its advantage. The first half proved to be pivotal as Severn River failed to score with the wind at their backs; this was a result of Washington College's forward domination in the tight and loose play and effctive tackling by the backs.

Aggressive play at the beginning of the second half allowed Washington to advance deep into Severn territory, where they remained for most of the half. Despite a series of probing attacks by W.C., the Severn River defense held. A well placed kick by their fullback followed immediately by an impressive run on the blind side netted Severn a try. Fortunately a conversion attempt into the wind went wide leaving W.C. facing a 4-0 deficit.

With their backs to the wall and the clock approaching injury time, the WAC applied the pressure. Spearheaded by the forward pack and a series of back-line movements, W.C. found itself again inches from the opposition's try line. Yet another determined "assault" by Matt Giller resulted in a try. With the score tied at 4-4, it was up to Mike Bishop, on his debut, to put W.C. in the lead. Bishop's much heralded golden boot did not disappoint as the WAC went up to stay 6-4. The last moments of the game turned into a defensive stalemate as the final whistle blew.

Notable standouts for W.C. included forwards Frank Crivelli, playing with a broken cheekbone, Matt Wickwire, and Matt "Rocket" Giller, and in the backs Bishop and Eric Bach. The victory, however, was indeed a team effort and bodes much promise for the spring season. We would like to thank the surprising number of supporters who braved the harsh conditions to attend WCRFC's second home game. This Saturday the Rugby Club will again be hosting the University of Delaware in what will surely turn out to be an exciting rematch. Kickoff is 1 pm at Worton Park.

Baseball Team is selling fruit

The Washington College Baseball Squad is presently conducting a fruit sale on and off the campus. Funds realized from this project will be used to enhance the baseball program and facilities. Several projects, such as improving the infield and the construction of new dugouts, are being considered. The expense of making the annual trip to Florida to play seven games during the spring break has also increased and the cost for transportation for this trip must be covered outside the regular budget.

Each student, has or will, receive shortly in their mailboxes, information concerning the cost of the various boxes of fruit. Included with this information will be an order form which can be mailed back to the Baseball Office. Members of the baseball squad will be contacting students individually about their orders.

Orders may be charged through the bookstore. Just indicate on the order slip whether you wish to pay by check or have it charged to your personal account in the bookstore.

Those who received fruit last year were very satisfied.

Sabha returns from session with the gods

Sabha was torn away from his duties at the Elm last week because of an emergency meeting on Mount Olympus. He regrets to inform that the gods have not been happy with the Great One this season. Many, including Zeus, have lost serious dinero because of Sabha's blunders causing marital strife and economic problems in the heavens. While Sabha's head hangs low, his prophetic powers are at an all-time high(especially his college picks). Sabha's pigskin picks are as follows:

NFL

WASHINGTON -7 over New Orleans. Saints shall go marching home with an "L" stuffed in their jock straps. Give the points.

ATLANTA +2 over Philadelphia. Elvis hates Buddy - it's that simple. Take the points.

KANSAS CITY -4 over San Diego. The headlines will say Monday morning, "Chiefs trounce the Chargers" - say that ten times fast. Give the points.

Houston -3 over CLEVELAND. Browns don't need a new coach, they need a new quarterback, a new offensive line, new receivers, etc... Give the points.

SEATTLE -3 1/2 over Minnesota. The Vikings should only play outdoors because they stink. Give the points.

Chicago -2 1/2 over DENVER. Elway's going to have to pick up his spine after this one. Give the points.

PHOENIX +5 1/2 over Green Bay. Rumor has it that none of the black Packer players are going to make the trip to Arizona. Take the points.

LA RAMS -9 over Dallas. The only action the Sabha will watch in this game is on the sidelines - go Ram cheerleaders! Oh, by the way, give the points.

Tampa Bay +14 over San Francisco. The Bucs will get some cheezy touchdown late in the game to beat the spread - if not, who cares. Take the points.

NY Jets -2 1/2 over INDIANAPOLIS. Rematch of Super Bowl III(kind of). Give the points.

Pittsburgh +2 1/2 over CINCINNATI. Ickey Wood's mother sews socks that smell. Take the points.

BEST BETS

BUFFALO -15 over New England. Bring back Flutie! Give the points.

NY GIANTS -13 over Detroit. The Pistons have a better shot in this one. Give mucho points and bet mucho bavaros.

MONDAY NIGHT

LA Raiders +3 1/2 over MIAMI. Bo to Sabha: "nice shoes." Take the points.

COLLEGE

AUBURN -17 over Georgia. They shouldn't be called the Bulldogs, they should be called the bull—. Give the points.

COLORADO -32 over Kansas. The Jayhawks at halftime will be clicking their heels three times and saying, "there's no place like home, there's no place like home, there's no place like home." Give the points.

Cincinnati +40 over ALABAMA. The Sabha hopes Bama plays gently. Take the points.

NOTRE DAME -7 over Penn State. If the Irish lose this game, Holtz's penance will be 2000 Hail Mary's and climb to the top of the University Chapel naked.

UCLA +4 1/2 over Usc. Like, no Rose Bowl bid here dudes. But like who cares - it should be a rightous, most totally awesome, funky, cool game fer sure. Take the points, dude, totally.

Sabha's season totals
NFL: 42-35-1
Best Bets: 9-3
College: 10-20

This weekend's rugby pick:

Washington +6 over Delaware. Sabha and the gods concur, this is a lock. By the way, Elvis will be in the crowd.

Tennnis team and individuals ranked high in the nation

Washington College's Men's Tennis Team shined in the latest Volvo Tennis Collegiate Rankings as three members were recognized nationally as well as the team.

The Shoremen are ranked #6 behind #1 ranked rival Swarthmore College, Kalamazoo College(Michigan), University of California, Santa Cruz, Claremont College(California), and Emory University(Georgia).

The top three singles all made the nation's top 50 headed by senior Scott Read(#1). W.C.'s iron curtain representative Irakli Metrevelli is ranked sixth nationally and sophomore transfer Trevor Hurd from Spring, Texas is currently ranked in the national polls 48th.

The Reed and Metrevelli doubles team placed seventh on the Volvo Rankings.

Radical politics colloquium given

People are beginning to ask again: What will it take to change the world, to make it better, safer, fairer, healthier? After a decade of passive politics, today's college students have little sense of political activism in the United States, claims Dan Premo, professor and chair of Washington College's department of political science.

As curator of the Louis L. Goldstein Program in Public Affairs, a new academic program at Washington College, Premo hopes to answer that question, to challenge current conservative political thought and to show students politics can make a difference, with a four-day colloquium on the future of radical politics in America, beginning Saturday, November 17. The events are also open to the public, free of charge.

The colloquium will provide an historical perspective of radical politics in the United States from the 19th century, exploring the relationship between socialism and democracy, and the impact of feminist thought, as well as prospects for the future. The colloquium features both scholarly and activist participants.

The screening of Reds, a film on John Reed and the Russian Revolution directed by and starring Warren Beatty, kicks off the series Saturday, November 17 at 7:30 p.m. in the Norman James Theater. A second film, The Front, will be shown in Norman James on Sunday afternoon November 18, at 1:30. The Front, directed by Martin Ritt, deals with the blacklisting of writers in the 1950s, and stars Woody Allen and Zero Mostel. A discussion with screenwriter Walter Bernstein will follow.

Bernstein returns Monday afternoon at 4 to discuss with Fred Whitehead "A History of Radical Politics in America." Whitehead, a teaching associate at the University of Kansas School of Medicine, has written extensively on the radical tradition.

A symposium on the future of radical politics in America concludes the colloquium on Tuesday, November 20 at 4 p.m. in Hynson Lounge. Moderated by philosophy professor Kevin Brien, the panel includes long-time political activist Michael Albert, who is co-editor of Z Magazine; Carol C. Gould, a professor of philosophy and head of the department of humanities at Stevens Institute of Technology, and Fred Whitehead.

Albert has committed his life to political activism in campus, anti-war, anti-intervention and community projects and movements. Founder of the South End Press, he has authored or co-authored several books, including Liberating Theory and Looking Forward : Toward a Humane Economy for the Twenty-First Century.

Gould is the author of Rethinking Democracy: Freedom and Social Cooperation in Politics, Economy, and Society, and has written extensively on feminist philosophy.

Capital Saxophone Quartet to perform

The Washington College Concert Series is presenting the Capital Saxophone Quartet in concert on Tuesday, November 20. Their performance of classical and jazz music begins at 8:00 p.m. in the Gibson Performing Arts Center.

The Quartet, consisting of saxophones in the soprano, alto, tenor and baritone ranges - is a winner of the 1989 Baltimore Chamber Awards. The ensemble is made up of Christopher Ford (soprano), Robert E. Beeson (alto), Walter Todenhoft (tenor) and Evan Olcott (baritone).

Founded in 1983 when the four members were graduate students at the University of Maryland at College Park, the ensemble has since strived to balance significant, original works for saxophone quartet with works adapted for the group.

Their program for Tuesday's performance includes an arrangement by Christopher Ford of Antonio Vivaldi's first concerto, "La Primavera," of Opus 8, known as the "Four Seasons," and the "Quartett," opus 109 by Alexander Glazunov, a Russian musician who later emigrated to Paris. The ensemble will also perform "Quatour," a "bright, typically French work" by Pierre Max Dubois, the "Threepenny Opera Suite" from Kurt Weill's Dreigroschen Oper, and a ragtime suite of Tom Turpin and Scott Joplin tunes.

This performance is sponsored in part by the Peggy and Yale Gordon Trust. Tickets are $10 for adults; admission for students and children 18 and under is free.

Upcoming

The International House will present Maureen Ahern, Professor of Anthropology at Ohio State University, speaking on "The First Spanish-Indian Contact in the Southwest: a 1540 report." The talk will take place at East Hall, Tuesday, November 27 at 7:30 p.m.

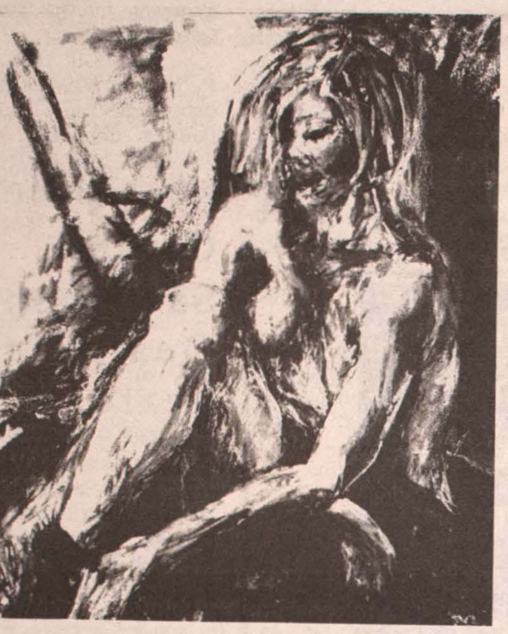
ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Terry Wolf exhibition

Eastern Shore artist Terry Wolf will exhibit his recent paintings, including landscapes and figure studies, at Washington College from November 16 to December 16. The exhibit, in the Gibson Performing Arts Center, will be open Thursday through Sunday from 1 to 5 p.m. and there will be an opening reception Friday, November 16 at 6 p.m. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.



Terry Wolf has exhibited his paintings at many galleries on the Delmarva peninsula, including Hard Castle's, Muriels Gallery, Veron Good Gallery, the University of Delaware, and the Rehobeth Art League in Delaware; the Chads Ford Gallery in Pennsylvania, and several galleries in Chestertown. Of his painting, Wolf says, "I am interested in the expressive illustrative aspects of painting. The object means everything to me, whether it's in a landscape or a figurative work. I take the object and through color and line press out meanings to give new ways of seeing familiar objects."

Wolf was educated at the Taylor School of Art in Wilmington Delaware and the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania.

Wolf, who works in both pastels and oils, says "my pastels are not done in a traditional manner, but built up loosely in many layers, usually on canvas. My oils are used for a slower, in-depth study of the object." Wolf paints on the Eastern Shore and in Maine, and the "wildness, calmness and appeal to the senses" of both places play an important role in his landscapes.

FBI investigator to discuss explosives

The Washington College Lecture Committee will present a lecture by Dr. Frederick W. Whitehurst, Supervisory Special Agent with the Scientific Analysis Section of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Thursday, November 29 at 8 p.m. in the lecture hall of the Dunning Science Building. The talk, "Terrorist Explosives: In Plain View," is subtitled "Tracking Terrorists Through the Scientific Method," and will present the latest information on scientific methods of identifying terrorist material.

Frederick Whitehurst is part of the Laboratory Division of the FBI and his section specializes in the analysis of bombs and explosive devices. The FBI scientific investigation teams take both a reactive approach - going to the scene of an incident and gathering evidence - and a proactive approach - predicting the types of devices which will be used by terrorist groups in possible future incidents - to their investigations. Whitehurst began his career with the FBI as a special agent and worked for four years investigating bank robberies, chasing fugitives, and conducting narcotics investigations in Texas and on the West Coast. He has been at the J. Edgar Hoover Laboratories in Washington, D.C. for four and a half years. His educational background includes an undergraduate degree from East Carolina University and a P.H.D. in quantum chemistry from Duke University in 1982.

Dr. Whitehurst will be available for conferences with students interested in a possible career with the FBI. Students interested in scheduling a meeting with Dr. Whitehurst on November 29 should contact the Career Development office at 778-2800, ext. 311, to arrange an appointment with Dr. Whitehurst.

Cann, who proposed that the SGA contact Neiman directly to request his resignation, remarked that he felt "if Stu were to return, the disruption would be even worse - - nothing personal."

Freshman class president Lionel Dyson took the point of view that "A public decree against Stu would only be detrimental to his mental well being should he return. And there are far more diplomatic means of pursuing his resignation then by compelling him to do so as a result of public ridicule."

Acting President Kevin Kelly focused on what he would like to accomplish, not on the Neiman controversy. Kelly would like to see an equal student faculty ratio and an end to the cable question. "My primary goal for this semester is to finish the cable issue and send a proposal to the administration. Second, to make the student representation on Academic Council equal to the faculty, and third to bring better bands to campus." When pressed about Neiman, Kelly responded, "If the student body feels that it's important that Stu resign or be impeached, I will support that."

Neiman removed from office

By: Laura Hopper

Stuart Neiman was removed from the office of SGA president by a Senate vote of 12 to 7 on Tuesday night, November 11. The action took place during a regualr meeting. After dispensing with regular business, Kelly read a letter from Steven Bruchey, president of the Senior class, asking the SGA to remove Neiman from office in accordance with Article IV, Section III of the SGA constitution which states that "Any member, group, or class, within the SGA may request, in writing, the removal from office of any representative serving in the Senate, SAB, or SCC."

Bruchey explained his request for Neiman's removal is based on the fact that as Neiman is not on campus, but on medical leave in Florida, he can not fulfill his duties as SGA president. Bruchey then introduced a motion for the removal of Neiman.

SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson then read a statement from Neiman "You have to do what you have to do to best represent your constituents, I recognize that. I'm not going to resign until I have the opportunity to defend myself, and I have an opportunity to speak with those people to who me to resign. That would happen in January when I return to Washington College. If things are operating functionally under Sparky's administration then that's fine, and I think they should continue as such. I don't think that should be forced to make a decision while I'm convalescing until January. In January, I'll either be part of impeachment proceedings, I'll find out what's taken place, or, if asked to by the college, I'll resign."

Senators Vince Sanudo and John Kelly both suggested waiting until next semester to before attempting to impeach or remove Neiman from office. Freshman class president Lionel Dyson requested a roll call vote with the results to be posted in every dorm along with the minutes from the SGA meeting, stating that if the Senators felt so strongly about removing Neiman from office, they should also be willing to attach their names to such an action. Off-campus senator Cyndi Bucci stressed that senators should vote according to the wishes of their constituents, not according to any personal feelings they might have about Neiman.

The senate passed Dyson's motion for a roll call vote 10 to 8 with one abstention. The roll call vote on Neiman's removal was 12 in favor, 7 not in favor, no abstentions. Kelly and Frank were then re-sworn in by parlaimentarian Gordy Scherer. When asked to comment on Neiman's removal, Kelly responded, "I wish he could have been here to defend himself. But I think it's important that we got the issue settled. I think the senators handled themselves admirably."

Hessey answers rumors

By: Kyndra Ponder

In an interview yesterday with The Elm, Gene Hessey - Vice President of Finance at Washington College - clarified many rumors that have been circulating around campus regarding the accidental shooting of Stuart Neiman.

Hessey confirmed that "security personnel were aware" that Neiman was storing weapons in his room. He added that "the department exercised poor judgement" by allowing Neiman to keep the guns instead of putting them in storage as College Policy mandates.

Hessey reported that last spring, Neiman approached the Security Department to ask for permission to keep what the department believed was a gun collection in his room and that security "suggested off-campus storage." Apparently, Neiman did not like that option and when he returned to campus in the fall, offered to "place the weapons in a secured safe". The Security Department agreed after having verified that the guns were properly registered, allowed Neiman to store them in his room on campus.

Although Hessey would not release the names of specific officers involved, he did say that "a reprimand has been issued" to those officers who knew.

When asked for further detail regarding the reprimand, Hessey would only say that those involved were strongly reminded that "College Policy is what the department is charged to enforce" and that at no time should such a decision have

College responds to Neiman shooting

By: Kyndra Ponder

Last Tuesday afternoon, students were invited to Norman James Theater to "discuss campus safety and related concerns with the Director of Campus Security and the Deans of Students."

Although attendance was poor during the first several minutes of the meeting, Dean Maxcy, Dean McIntyre and Director of Security Jerry Roderick used this time to answer questions from the Elm regarding the Stuart Neiman incident, involving the SGA president's accidental shooting on Halloween. When asked why the college has released no official statement regarding the shooting, Dean McIntyre responded that Neiman's rights under the Buckley Amendment, which protects student privacy, prevent the release of certain information. She went on to add that Stuart Neiman is on medical leave from Washington College as a result of what the Chestertown police have termed an accidental shooting, and is "receiving both medical and psychological help."

McIntyre also stated that while Neiman would like to return to the campus next semester, the "final decision is not his to make," adding that the administration is primarily concerned with the health and safety of Neiman, as well as of other students.

When questioned about whether Neiman will receive a reprimand if he returns to college, Maxcy stated that he will have to appear before the Judicial Screening Board, made up of students from the Student Affairs Committee.

When asked whether he was aware that Neiman stored firearms in his room in violation of the school's code, Roderick refused to answer and referred

Winken, blinken, Neiman, and Security

Winken, blinken, Neiman and Security...

Gene Hessey, Vice President for Finance and in charge of security for the "Neiman case," has confirmed the rumor that most of the campus has already heard. Security knew about Stuart Neiman's collection of firearms and ammunition, and permitted him to store them in his room. An act which ended up endangering his life, and could have endangered all of ours. But before we start outright condemning everyone who was even slightly involved in the case, let's clarify the situation a little.

One, as president of the student body, Neiman must have seemed a stable, reliable person who would do his up most to prevent any accidents from occurring. With his cigar, navy suit, and skills of persuasion, he would have done his best to reinforce this image.

Two, with all the allegations of possession of illegal firearms, drugs, etc...it was probably a relief to find a student who, although he wanted to break college policy, at least had the good manners to inform the appropriate college agency that he would be breaking college policy.

Now where does that leave the College?

Between a rock and a hard place. What's to be done about Neiman? Should he be allowed to return to campus? Should he face the SCC? If he does, what should his punishment be?

Here's a suggestion. If Neiman returns, make him face charges in front of the SCC. Since he is partly responsible for the accident (partly, because Security knew about the weapons, but didn't make him store them in the proper place,) he should pay for any damages. He should also demonstrate the love he supposedly has for Washington College by, shall we say, working the entire phonathon, or some equivalent community service project. This way, the College gets the benefit of his obviously superior skills of persuasion, while not allowing him off the hook.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Trout reiterates campus firearms policy

Dear Editor,

On November 14th, I sent to all Resident Assistants the following memorandum and I want to share this message with the entire community:

In response to recent queries about Washington College's policy that governs the possession of guns on campus, I wish to call to your attention and that of the entire student body the following as stated on page 23 of the student handbook:

Students may not possess or use fireworks or firearms of any kind anywhere on campus; however, those wishing to take advantage of local hunting may store firearms in the safe in the Business Office.

I request that you meet with those residents who live on your floor with the purpose of re-explaining the policy.

Please note that the Administration is granting those resident students who own and possess guns on-campus, which have not been registered with Campus Security, a seven-day amnesty period in which to register the gun or guns. Any student found in possession of a gun or guns that have not been registered with Campus Security will run the risk of immediate expulsion from Washington College.

Thank you for your assistance.

Sincerely,
Charles H. Trout
President

To 'The Great Dane',

I see that you are expecting me to give you an apology, but alas I cannot. I think for once you should learn that not all journalists are expected or required to redefine their work. On the contrary they should stand behind it fully. So that, Mr. Winkleman, is what I'm doing. The reason that you are not getting your apology is simple, and you already know why. The title of my letter to the editor was not thought of by myself. Therefore I never said that you did not know Stu. In fact after we talked the other

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: Do you feel Washington College's Health Services are adequate? Why or why not?

Money for health care, not bricks and shrubs

Patricia Karnes

I do not think that the Health Services at Washington College are adequate. They do serve a needed purpose here, to an extent, however for those students who get ill (inconveniently) at 4:00 in the afternoon, the Health Services are not open to provide care.

The hours are just not adequate. I - as a science major who spends all afternoon in labs many weekdays - should remember to get sick between 8:30 and 3:30 and definitely not on the weekends! What happens to a student who catches a particularly nasty strain of flu on Friday and is, by Monday, dehydrated? In this case, a fairly routine illness turns into a very serious problem because the student did not have access to health care during the weekend.

I also think that one of the problems with Health Services is that they are seriously understaffed. Let's face it, two part time doctors for 900 students is ridiculous. Granted, most students don't need to see a doctor and can be helped with a few aspirin, a little cough syrup or even the handy-dandy over-used cure-all - antibiotics (which don't really help if you have a virus!) There are however, those students who need something more than a handful of pills and the direction to "Go home and sleep. Come back tomorrow if you aren't better". They need to see a doctor and more often than not, there is just not a doctor around.

In order to help both problems - the lack of hours and the understaffing at Health Services - Washington College could invest more time and money directly into the things that the students need rather than spending the resources on things that affect us indirectly. Take for example, the Academic Resources Center. Do we really need it? The new phone system, the dying trees in front of Cullen and the all-brick fire lane are also fine examples of the unnecessary expenditures that the school has made.

Granted, these things all help to improve the college's appearance, but in the process, 900 students have been ignored. Health care is one of the services that cannot and should not be ignored.

I want to go into the health care field and I hope that my attitude toward my patients will be one of compassion and not one directed toward building a monetary facade. In other words, health care should do what it says, care for people's well-being instead of conveniently and haphazardly pushing them aside, collecting the fee then going on to the next poor soul. By concentrating on material goods and appearances, the college is denying Health Services much needed money and causing them to do just that.

Patricia Karnes is a junior biology major who hopes to attend medical school.

I hate to sound unappreciative toward any type of college service; however I would hardly consider the care administered by the Health Services adequate. I think that most important the facility should expand its hours – it seems as though every time I need medical attention, the doctor is 'out.'

No, the physical medicine of the Health Services is not adequate. I feel I can only trust my family physician. However, the psychological aspect of the Health Services is well equipped, and is often over-burdened.

I feel the Health Services do an O.K. job for the minor illnesses we sometimes suffer from. Although during my first experience at the Health Center I thought they were spearing my tonsils; instead of taking a throat culture, but in the long run I did get better and that's what counts.

Brown bags, cough drops, and drive up windows

Mike Winkelman

Who cares about the health services? Aside from hypochondriacs, students only go to the health service twice a year, i.e. a token visit each semester. These visits are usually to receive armloads of free medicine to cure the common cold. Occasionally "pink eye," strep throat, or minor bronchitis warrant the simple issuing of minor antibiotics. Therefore, why does Washington College need a physician?

Might I suggest a replacement for one campus physician; a drive through drug window. Students would have the chance to receive drugs by simply driving or walking through the lounge of Queen Anne's. Located in the lounge would be a student (work study campus job) with assorted brown bags. Each bag would contain random types of medicines with no labels. You would then return to your room and continue to take these "mystery" pills until you became well again, assuming you were well in the beginning.

For those of you more advanced in the medical field, i.e. non-biology majors, the opportunity will exist for you to choose the medicine of your choice. A few pointers have been given to me by Dr. X.

Bad cough: first visit - cough medicine; second visit - bronchitis, more cough medicine and antibiotics.

Reddening of the eye: first visit - put a patch over it; second visit - pink eye, eye drops and antibiotics.

Sore throat: first visit - don't talk; second visit - strep throat, throat lozenges and antibiotics.

Crotch itch: first visit - scratch em!; second visit - sell a bushel for ten dollars.

Aside from these basic medical procedures, Dr. X is essentially a referral service. Our counselors are fantastic, therefore all suitable cases are referred to them by the doctor. Such major problems as surgeries are referred to the hospital. And anyone socially imbibing on a weekend night that happens to injure themselves is not going to call Dr. X for help.

Many women have approached me lately and complained, "every time I go to see Dr. X the first thing he asks me is, 'Are you pregnant?'" Calm down ladies, illegitimate children are hard to locate these days.

However, if the college decides to keep these medical experts it should be required to print a monthly listing of STD statistics. The dorm with the most STDs would win a case of condoms. It could be scored on a points system ranging from herpes simplex one for 1 point

In the world: Margaret Thatcher steps down

United States

A report issued this week by the nation's top business economists said that the soaring oil prices following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait have pushed the nation's ailing economy into a recession. A recession is usually defined as two consecutive quarters of declining gross national product. If indeed true, this recession ended an eight year period of continuous growth of the nation's economy, a post-war record.

The Commerce Department simultaneously reported that the United States trade deficit jumped 28.9 percent in the July-September quarter, to $29.75 billion, the highest imbalance in a year. Imports rose 5% to a record $125. 91 billion, as the Persian Gulf crisis drove up the costs of oil. Exports, dampened by the falling overseas demand for US farm products fell 0.6 % to $90.16 billion.

Soviet Union

In an attempt to prevent the disintegration of the Soviet Union, President Mikhail Gorbachev has begun an aggressive, high-stakes campaign to persuade or bludgeon all fifteen republics into the union treaty he has proposed. Alarmed by the "heated rhetoric," the three Baltic republics which declared their independence from the Soviet Union last spring, decided to hold an emergency joint session of their parliaments to discuss the threat of economic or military action. A union would be imaginable without the Baltic republics, however, Gorbachev is also at odds on this matter with his political rival, Boris Yeltsin, a leader in the giant Russian Federation. Without the Russian Federation, a union is unthinkable.

Great Britain

Earlier this week, Chancellor of the Exchequer John Major was selected as the new Conservative Party leader and prime minister to succeed Margaret Thatcher. At 47, he will become the youngest prime minister since 1783. The morning after Mr. Major's selection, Margaret Thatcher turned her resignation into Queen Elizabeth II, after eleven years in power. Within hours, Mr. Major was invited to form a new government. Mr. Major was Mrs. Thatcher's choice as a successor. He has committed himself to "building on" her achievements.

Iraq

It was decided earlier this week, in a meeting between the United States and the Soviet Union, that Iraq would have until January 15 to leave Kuwait. After this date, Iraq faces a possible UN-sanctioned military attack. The resolution will be voted on by the UN Security Council later this week, however, the United States already has an agreement on measure from the Security Council members who could kill the resolution with a veto. Only four more votes are needed for the resolution to pass.

Panama

General Manuel Noriega's taped prison conversations show he was shifting assets around the world at the same time he pleaded poverty before a federal judge, according to court papers filed earlier this week by an attorney for the government of Panama in its $6.5 billion lawsuit against Noriega. There is believed to be $300-$500 billion of assets around the world. General Noriega's attorney disputed the claim during a hearing before a United States court judge.

Asthma — Get the Facts

Asthma is a chronic lung disease that affects almost 10 million Americans, including approximately three million children.

Each year asthma is responsible for nine million lost work days, and 111 million restricted activity days. If untreated, asthma can also be life-threatening. The asthma death rate has been increasing steadily since 1979.

However, according to the American Lung Association®, people with asthma can lead normal, active lives through ongoing supervision by a physician and the proper use of medications and exercise.

More information about asthma and how to manage it is available from your local American Lung Association — the Christmas Seal People®.

The Greek update: the brothers of Kappa Alpha

This fall has proved to be a busy semester for the brothers of Kappa Alpha Order. As in the past, the Beta Omega chapter of Kappa Alpha Order is involving itself in numerous community service projects.

Traditionally Labor Day is not only the last hurrah of summer, but also the weekend of the Jerry Lewis Telethon to benefit the Muscular Dystrophy Association. On Labor Day, the Chestertown Jaycee's decided to hold a carnival to help raise additional funds for MDA. In previous years the Jaycee's have only worked the phones, taking pledges from the Kent County region, so the addition of a carnival meant more work for the Jaycees. In an effort to help lessen the burden on the Jaycees, the brothers of Kappa Alpha volunteered their time to help man the phones. Kappa Alpha also sent brothers over to help work the booths on the day of the carnival. A dozen KA's in all were involved in everything from the dunking booth to the ring toss, one of our brothers went so far as to dress up as Chessie the Chesapeake creature.

October 6, 1990 was not only an important day for the College, with the inauguration of President Trout, but also an important one for the community as the Lion's Club held their annual Chicken Barbecue. Both these events kept the brothers of Kappa Alpha busy. At nine o'clock Saturday morning a group of KA's headed across 213 to the Lutheran Church to help the Lions cook the chicken dinners. On campus we had brothers serving as tour guides for visiting guests, and also as ushers during the inauguration. That evening four brothers volunteered to be ushers for the special performance of the Manhattan String Quartet. Additionally, Kappa Alpha Order provides ushers throughout the year for the Washington College Concert Series.

Nothing brings a town together more than a local service project that will benefit the entire community. On Thursday, October 31, 1990 local volunteers from across Kent County were on hand to help with the construction of Garnett Elementary School's new playground. The outpouring of assistance continued throughout the five days of labor intensive construction. A valuable part of the volunteer work was provided by students and organizations from Washington College. The brothers of Beta Omega played an important role in this community effort. Twenty brothers were in involved in different aspects of the project. The brothers of Kappa Alpha Order accounted for roughly sixty-five man hours of service, the most of any Greek organization on the campus, and brothers were at the site every day during the five days of construction. One brother spent his entire day, from eight in the morning until nine at night, helping out. Due to the high level of participation by both the college and local community, the event proved to be an impressive success, and it gave the brothers of Beta Omega a chance to get out and show their support for another worthy cause in the Chestertown area.

On Wednesday, November 7, 1990, the brothers of Beta Omega put Advising Day to good use. A day that would normally have been spent sleeping, avoiding class work, and generally being lazy, instead was used to paint the interior of Middle Hall. The necessary paint and brushes were provided by the Maintenance Department, while Beta Omega constituted the labor force. Beginning around eleven in the morning and continuing throughout the day, brothers worked in shifts of four to five painting the walls and trim on all three floors. The next phase of the project will involve the replacement of the old molding in the building. This work will be done in conjunction will minor wall repairs and a complete repainting of the stairwells. The Maintenance Staff will be handling all of this work because of liability concerns.

The Sisters of Alpha Chi Omega, Beta Pi chapter sponsor an annual Casino Night to raise money for local charities. This year the event took place on Saturday, November 16, 1990. It was held in conjunction with a special event in the Coffee House. A Baltimore based band, Disappear Fear, was cosponsored by the Coffee House and the SGA to provide music and alternative entertainment.

Volunteers from various campus organizations, both Greek and non-Greek, were on hand to work. Among those present were eight brothers from Kappa Alpha Order. The event ran from eight until midnight and included blackjack, roulette, a raffle, poker, and other games of chance. Each volunteer was responsible for a gaming table, and worked one,

To the Editor, Students, Faculty, Parents and Board of Visitors and Governors of Washington College:

We are writing to let it be known that the Student Government Association of Washington College, on Monday November 5, 1990 voted unanimously that we want EQUAL representation on the Academic Council. At present, the Council consist of six voting students, and six voting faculty. A proposition has been made by an Ad-Hoc Committee to change this voting number to One Student, and Four Faculty, a ratio which we find highly inadequate and unacceptable. We believe that streamlining the Council is a good idea, but not at the risk of losing student rights. We are asking the faculty to vote to have Three Voting Students and Three Voting Faculty members on the Council, thus preserving the equal ratio requested. Please consider this proposition seriously, as the future of this student body is one of our greatest concerns. Respectfully,

The Student Government Association
of Washington College.

Stuart Neiman, currently in Florida, was removed from office by the SGA Senate last week. Despite this, Neiman hopes to return to campus next semester

Stu: the interview

By Laura Hopper

Early on the morning of November 1st, Stuart Neiman accidentally shot himself in the leg. Within hours, rumors were flying around the campus about the nature of the shooting as well as the number and type of weapons removed from Neiman's room by the Chestertown police department. Granted medical leave by the college, Neiman returned to south Florida, while Kevin Kelly, SGA Vice President, assumed Neiman's office as acting president. This past week, the SGA voted to remove Neiman from office. Neiman is still in south Florida and agreed to a brief phone interview.

The Elm: We've all heard about the amount of guns and ammunition you had in your room. Why did you feel it was necessary to bring them with you to College?

Neiman: "Shooting is my hobby. I am a gun collector, and although I fully realize that it was against the rules of the College, I felt compelled to keep my collection under my immediate responsibility. I took every precaution, including purchasing a fire-proof, bomb-proof safe in which to store the weapons. That safe was then hidden inside of a make-shift nightstand and I was the only person who knew the combination. And lastly, I am not the only person on campus with guns in his or her possession."

Elm: You knew it was against college policy, but you still kept your guns in your room?

Neiman: "Anyone who thinks that I am the only one who has taken liberty over school rules is living in a dream world, considering the underage drinking, drug use, animals and long term guests that can be found on campus. I am not justifying my actions, I know what I did was wrong and I am willing to accept the responsibility for my actions.

Elm: What happened that night?

Neiman: "I couldn't sleep since I'd slept most of the day. I got up around 3 A.M. and decided to clean my gun.

Elm: You woke up at 3 in the morning and decided to clean your gun? Why?

Neiman: "My gun was dirty so I decided to clean it. I know it sounds crazy but that's the truth, that's what happened."

Elm: So what did happen?

Neiman: I was using an aerosol propellant to clean the gun. I opened the door to the hall, propped the barrel against my leg. I heard a loud pop. I dropped the gun. I closed the door and noticed a hole in my pants. I didn't feel a thing. About ten seconds later I noticed blood up and down my leg."

Elm: The police report mentions that you told two different stories about the shooting. Do you mind commenting on that?

Neiman: "My story changed out of panic and embarrassment. Getting shot has a funny effect on your thinking."

Elm: You realize that the SGA has removed you from office. Do you plan to fight the removal?

Neiman: "No. I have no anger. I understand where its coming from but by not having been given a chance to speak to the people who voted to remove me from office, and by not being given a chance to speak to their constituents, I don't feel the action was completely fair. I don't believe this action was necessary immediately, I believe it could have waited. While I have no anger, I don't feel as though I was treated fairly because no one knew what had happened. The vote was based on rumor and on a misunderstanding of the situation. I know this to be true because when was I given a chance to explain and defend myself?

Elm: Why do you feel the need to defend yourself?

Neiman: "Because I feel as though I'm being attacked. I feel as though I'm being attacked because there are rumors circulating and a rumor is an indirect way of attacking someone."

Elm: Why do you want to return to Washington College?

Neiman: "I've been asked that question by my family, the deans, and by other students. My answer is simply this, I love Washington College. I've invested three years of my life and energy into this academic environment. I've held representative positions since my first year and have served in more elected and appointed organizations that any other student in this school."

Elm: Wouldn't it be easier to start over at a different institution?

Neiman: "No, I'm not embarrassed by an accident. There are still members of the community who believe in me. I have many friends, and I owe something to the people who have stood by me, and I owe it to myself to continue in an area that I have invested so much of my life in."

Elm: What about your future plans? Would you try to run for office again at Washington College?

Neiman: "No comment. I've not thought about it yet. All

A modest proposal for a Secretary of the Environment

By David Searles

Last spring, President Bush attempted to act as the "environmental president," as he campaigned to do so. It is time for Congress to make it reality.

Bush had announced that he was going to elevate the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to cabinet level status, to show the world the environmental concerns we have. Unfortunately, knowing Bush, this was more PR than reality. It can become reality, if Congress authorizes the creation of a Department of the Environment. While we are at it, the department should include combining all heritage and natural resources agencies into this department. The new department should be called the Department of Environment, Heritage and Natural Resources.

This is not a new idea. It was a dream of former Democratic U.S. Senator Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin, the father of Earth Day, in the late '60s and in the '70s. It was part of his environmental campaign that we would have such a department. His dream is long over due in becoming reality. The department building could be called the Senator Gaylord Nelson Hall, in his honor and for his environmental efforts. It would also be nice if he was appointed as the department's first secretary. In reality, though, Bush is not that serious about the environment, and our heritage and natural resources.

It would probably be better to create two separate departments; environment as part of a Department of Environment, Science and Technology, and a Department of Heritage and Natural Resources. We will be lucky to get one combined department, though. At least with this proposal, all environmental and all heritage and natural resources agencies would be combined within one department. Presently, they are scattered throughout the bureaucracy, where they are lost when it comes to priorities, budgeting and good management. They are also susceptible to politics, when in reality, their missions should be the same, regardless of which administration or political party is in power.

The 1990s will be the environmental decade, as it should be. Our existence depends upon it. It is time for the President, Congress and America to recognize this fact. Creating a Department of Environment, Heritage and Natural Resources would be an excellent beginning.

David J. Searles is a graduate student here.

Daignault on the change of seasons

Emily Daignault

Autumn. The time of change in which Mother Nature takes her paints out and splashs new hues to the grass and trees. But what else happens in Autumn? The wind blows colder, the days seem longer, and the mornings seem rougher. The stores go crazy with the anticipation of Christmas, so much so that they seem to forget Thanksgiving. But as the winds blow colder around our cozy bungalow here in Chestertown, we see other seasonal adaptations. The fall athletic teams wind their seasons to a close (all except Crew, that is) The standard of dress is changed to warmer clothes like sweaters and down jackets. Another sight now, is people counting down the days until we are released from this fine institution we're in.

The leaves twist in their last rites and finally descend upon the Earth, as a nearby gust swoops them up off of their grave and twirls them through quadruple loops. The clouds in the sky accent the pastel lit night as darkness fades

Women's swim team wins 3 on the road

By Matt Giller

In the last two weeks the women's swim team won three straight on the road without a defeat in impressive fashion. The Shorewomen first defeated Salisbury State (127-78), then Juniata (118-84), and finally Goucher (147-60) to improve their record to three wins and one loss.

Their first match that pitted them against the Sea Urchins of Salisbury State looked good right from the opening heat. The Medley Relay team of Jennifer Green, Jennifer McCartney, Mimi Devlin, and Vicki Vahos started the evening with a first place swim. In the same heat, the team of Kelly Loftus, Devin Buck, Joan Colton, and Karen Prendergast placed third.

Kasey Carroll led with three individual firsts in the 800 Freestyle, 200 IM, and the 400 Free. Senior Sam Streamer won the 50 and 100 Freestyle while Mimi Devlin won the 100 Butterfly and 100 Breastroke. Jennifer Green impressed as she won the 100 Backstroke.

Vicki Vahos, Ramsey Bigham, Kristin Callazzo, and Sam Streamer won the 200 Free Relay to round out the medals in the team's first win of the 1990-91 season.

The long trek to Juniata College in Pennsylvania obviously did not bother the Shorewomen as they won impressively (118-84) over a good MAC team.

Carroll, Streamer, and Devlin led the group with eight firsts between them. Carroll (3 firsts) continued her attack in the grueling 800 Meter Free with a first and broke W.C.'s record in the 200 IM. Carroll then won an event she hasn't swum competitively in two years - the 200 Breastroke.

Streamer easily won the 200 and 400 Freestyles and joined Green, Magdalena Fuchs, and junior Karen Brady for first in the 400 Freestyle Relay.

Freshman Devlin had impressive swims in the 50 free and 200 butterfly. The other freshman who impressed was Green, who continues to improve, with a first place finish in the 200 Backstroke.

Other outstanding swims: Vicki Vahos(200 Free, 200 Backstroke), Joan Colton (200 Butterfly), McCartney (200 Butterfly, 200 Breaststroke) Fuchs (200 Freestyle), Callazzo (400 Freestyle).

Coach Kim Lessard commented on the two impressive victories. "These past two meets allowed us to move swimmers around in some different events and we look very strong. Times are continuing to drop and we'll be ready for our tough conference meet against Widener."

Their successful road trip culminated in their most recent meet. The Shorewomen embarrassed Goucher in front of their home crowd. The 147-60 thrashing of Goucher improved the WAC record to 3-1. The whole team swam well but some surprises came from Brady who won the 100 Butterfly the first time she ever swam it. Colton placed second behind her. Karen Prendergast qualified for the MAC's in the 100 Backstroke. Fuchs, by winning the 200 and 500 freestyles, qualifies for the MAC's as well. McCartney joined the bevy of WAC swimmers at the MAC's by winning the 100 Breastroke.

The new fat Great Sabha: pigskin picks for the weekend

The Great Sabha returns from his turkey feast. Matt Giller generously took him to his house so the Great One could experience the All-American Thanksgiving. The Sabha has been fattened and ready to prophecize so more pigskin picks.

NFL

WASHINGTON -2 1/2 over Miami. The Skins just flat out will not lose. Give the points.

BUFFALO -3 1/2 over Philadelphia. Bruce Smith will hit Randall so hard it'll hurt his feelings. Give the points.

TAMPA BAY +1 1/2 over Atlanta. Vinnie should dim Neon Deion. Take the points.

CLEVELAND + 3 1/2 over LA rams. The Dog Pound's bark will probably be good enough to beat the Rams. Take the points.

PITTSBURGH -4 over Cincinnati. Its the battle of stupid names - Bubby vs Boomer. Give the points.

PHOENIX -3 over Indianapolis. Wake the Sabha up when this is over. Those who care, give the points.

DENVER +3 over LA Raiders. Sabha's shocker of the week. The Broncs have had ten days to lick their sores; they should ready for this one. Take the points.

SAN DIEGO -6 over NY Jets. The Jets' attack hasn't gotten off the ground since Broadway Joe - don't expect anything this week either. Give the points.

Houston pick 'em over SEATTLE. Sabha just feels it. Pick the Oilers.

DALLAS +1 1/2 over New Orleans. Sabha loves the boy named Troy. Take the points.

MINNESOTA -3 1/2 over Green Bay. Somebody woke up the Vikes last week. Maybe they'll stay awake this week long enough to pull it out. Give the points.

BEST BETS

Kansas City -7 over NEW ENGLAND. Hey Pats, psst, Flutie could use a job. Give the points.

Detroit +9 over CHICAGO. The Sabha doesn't necessarily say the Lions will win, just cover the spread, and after all that is the name of the game. Take the points.

The Elm to Gene Hessey, Senior Vice President for Management and Finance, who is involved with the investigation of the Neiman case. Roderick went on to add that the security office makes provisions to store weapons in the Business Office for students who wish to hunt. However, difficulties arise when students want access to their guns when the Business Office is closed.

The College was unwilling to make any further statements regarding the shooting because officials "do not want to compromise the fairness of the judiciary proceedings by divulging any further information."

Maxcy explained that the shooting has "clearly brought to the forefront the issue of firearms on campus." He stated that Washington College students who bring guns on campus will be severely disciplined, with the possible exception of those "few, very responsible off-campus hunters." Maxcy concluded, "If you want to hunt, go hunting. If you want to go to college, go to college, but don't try to do both."

Five other students who attended the meeting expressed concern over the nonfunctional fire extinguishers in Middle Hall and Minta Martin, discovered during two recent fires in those buildings. In Middle Hall, one of the two extinguishers worked while in Minta Martin, only one of three worked. Roderick replied that the fire extinguishers are supposed to be checked by an outside company three times each semester to ensure that they are in operating order.

The students then expressed concern over the fact that twenty minutes elapsed before campus security responded to the fire in Minta Martin. According to the Supervisor at the 911 emergency dispatch center, operators cannot contact the Fire Department unless they are absolutely certain that there is "a serious fire" - which usually means that Security has to confirm that there is a fire in a building on campus. The deans and Roderick denied that information, saying that in the event of a serious fire, students should call the 911 emergency number as well as Security.

In addition, Christabel Garcia-Zamor, a freshman volunteer at the Chestertown Fire Department, questioned the lack of seriousness with which students approach fire alarms. At Middle Hall, for example, students said that there were people standing in the hallways despite the alarm, and it was not until an upper floor resident came downstairs with a severely burned hand that residents realized the seriousness of the problem.

One of the girls in attendance suggested that the college implement regularly scheduled fire drills and that the students be informed about them. As a result, students would be more likely to take alarms outside of the schedule seriously.

Dean Maxcy proposed that the college begin a Campus Safety Committee, comprised of students who are truly interested in student safety at Washington College.

been made "unilaterally within the department."

Hessey stressed that in the future such decision will not be taken care of within individual departments, but will instead be referred to him for further consideration. Hessey stated that in the future, "there will be no exceptions." In addition, Hessey reminds students of the college's firearm policy, saying that "failure to register guns will be cause for dismissal."

The Macintosh Classic

Three new ways to survive college.

With Apple's introduction of three new Macintosh® computers, meeting the challenges of college life just got a whole lot easier. Because now, everybody can afford a Macintosh.

The Macintosh Classic® is our most affordable model, yet it comes with everything you need—including a hard disk drive. The Macintosh LC combines color capabilities with affordability. And the Macintosh IIsi is perfect for students who need a computer with extra power and expandability.

No matter which Macintosh you choose, you'll have a computer that lightens your work load without giving you another tough subject to learn. Every Macintosh computer is easy to set up and even easier to master. And when you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. That's because thousands of available programs all work in the same, consistent manner. You can even share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to Apple's versatile SuperDrive,™ which reads from and writes to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple® II floppy disks.

See the new Macintosh computers for yourself, and find out how surviving college just got a whole lot easier.

Another student brought up the issue of insufficient outside lighting on campus. Roderick replied that there will be no new lighting installed within the next few weeks, but that when the new Academic Resources Building is opened, both that area and the road off of Washington Avenue will have new lights. He added that more lights were recently installed near the Cardinal dorms, but that some areas between the new dorms and the Dining Hall are still in the dark.

Maxcy said that "students need to let people know what we need in terms of lighting" as well as the needs and concerns in other areas of safety on campus. He said that there will be another open meeting with Roderick and the deans at the beginning of next semester so that students will once again be able to express their concerns over campus security.

Gift Ideas for Quitters

The just-quit smoker has special needs, so the American Lung Association® — the Christmas Seal People® — has come up with some gift ideas for the new nonsmokers on your holiday list.

Give something that will replace the ritual of lighting up. Low calorie candies make a good stocking stuffer. Or keep those nervous hands busy with hobbies like knitting or model building. A subscription to a game magazine might keep their minds off cigarettes.

Help keep them away from smoking situations with a season ticket to their favorite theater, dance group, or symphony. Smoking has been banned from most indoor arenas, so tickets to sports events will also provide an entertaining but smokeless atmosphere.

New nonsmokers may appreciate a way to relieve tension other than lighting up. A mood video or an album of relaxing music is a possibility.

Staying quit is the hardest part of quitting. Give new ex-smokers the American Lung Association's self-help manual, "A Lifetime of Freedom From Smoking®," which is imaginatively designed to aid a new nonsmoker in becoming a life-long nonsmoker.

Donating to Christmas Seals® helps support a full range of American Lung Association quit-smoking and smoking prevention education programs.

President Trout holds open forum

By: Kyndra Ponder

Tuesday night students were given an opportunity to discuss the state of the College as well as to voice any concerns that they might have about the school with President Trout. Although attendance was poor, Trout spoke out about many issues that he would like to work on during his time at Washington College.

Trout began by saying that he has three major goals for the campus in the near future. Each of his goals will work to increase the quality of the education that students here receive. He would like to ensure that the college has enough money to award "adequate financial aid" to those students who are unable to afford the $16,000 price tag of Washington College. He also said that he would like to actively recruit more faculty and consequently, enhance the academic environment of the college.

Trout then stated that he and his predecessors have been accused of caring more about "bricks and mortar" than the academics of the school ,but, he asked "What would have happened if the Presidents of the 80's and the Board of Visitors and Governors had remained status quo?" in terms of the appearance of the campus. He said that while it has been an inconvenience to the college community, the construction has enhanced life here. "Face it," he said, "the place looks good."

Updating the students about the final phases of the campus plan, Trout mentioned the Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center - noting that it has been promised to be completed by October of next year. He then took the opportunity to address the criticism of the fitness center which appeared last week in This is Not The Elm, saying that "Washington College has a fine athletic tradition and not to nurture, strengthen and encourage it here would be a mistake."

Trout also mentioned that he would like to see two other changes to the college, including the complete renovation of William Smith Hall and Ferguson Hall - which he termed a "ghetto".

Junior, Cynthia Fields-Bélanger asked President Trout if there were any plans to renovate the Gibson Fine Arts building, citing the lack of a large chorus room and adequate space in which to practice. Trout replied that there is no plan to redo Gibson in the near future.

Senior Mike Winkelman asked Trout about the "extortion" that students here endure with the WCDS Meal Plans. He pointed out that the price seems extremely high and that when a student chooses the 14 or the 10-Meal Plan, the prices do not drop in proportion with the number of meals served. Winkelman also asked why the students in the Cardinal dorms were required to board when the dorms are equipped with modern kitchens. Trout promised that he would look into the situation for Winkelman.

Raphael Koster brought up the subject of parking and lighting on campus. Trout responded that he would look into the lighting problem but responded that the parking situation will become worse over the next few years as the campus plan moves into completion. He added, however, that "American culture is such that we think that if your car isn't parked within 50 feet of your entry, it's a death sentence. It's not." Trout said that "a courageous SGA will have to deal with the parking issue by deciding, for example, if freshmen will be banned from having cars on campus.

SGA Vice-President, Brooke Frank asked whether

Trout and Baer award grants to faculty

By: Susie Mazzullo

President Charles Trout and Dean Elizabeth Baer have recently awarded grants of money to a number of faculty for a variety of projects.

The Enhancement Fund has existed since 1984 and former President, Douglass Cater, was instrumental in raising money every year for this fund since it is not an endowment.

Twice a year the members of the faculty are invited to submit proposals that explain their budget and the specific outcome of their project. Also with that invitation they are sent a list of guidelines that explain deadlines for submitting the proposals, guidelines for what specific information should be contained in the proposals, the criteria for selection, and a list of types of projects that have received funding in the past.

Deadlines are twice annually, one in the fall semester and one in the spring semester. This year's deadlines are October 1, 1990 and April 1, 1991. As explained by Dean Baer, the October deadline proposals are usually projects that the faculty members wish to undertake during the academic school year, while those submitted in the spring semester are those projects that will be started during the summer months.

Some of the areas that faculty members must discuss in their proposals are the goal(s) of the project they wish to undertake, the relationship of the project to the research and/or teaching of that faculty member, the benefit that the project would have to the institution, and they must also include an itemized budget.

Once submitted, the proposals are read by Dean Baer and President Trout. They then decide who will receive funding. "It's a painful process to decide who gets funding and who doesn't," says Baer. Proposals are approved until the funding that has been set aside for this project has run out. Those who receive funding must present a full report at the completion of their project.

As explained in the guidelines that faculty members receive, the selection process is based on a number of factors. There are six criteria that President Trout and Dean Baer look for when they are reading the proposals. These include the benefit of the project to the individual as a teacher and a scholar and the benefit of the project to the institution as a whole. The feasibility of the project, the possible outcome of the project such as publication or the development of a new course and how much effort has previously been made by the faculty member to receive funding from other sources, are also criteria for selection. Dean Baer and President Trout also note the amount and time of any other awards that that particular member of the faculty has previously received.

This year, thirteen faculty members were awarded funding. These are Richard De Prospo, Dale Daigle, Mary Ann Baenninger, Satinder Sidhu, Benjamin Alexander, Tahir Shad, Tex Andrews, Ellen Klein, Emilie Amt, Gail Kaplan, Rosette Roat, Tom Cousineau, and Kate Verville. The proposals of these faculty members range in scope from reimbursement for tapes acquired this past summer to funding for the ability to do research of two books in Oxford during the Christmas break. Other requests for funding included a request to attend the International Beckett Symposium in Monaco, funding for continued research on chlorination of drinking water, funding to write a book, and funding to research and develop a new psychology course.

The purpose of the project according to Baer is to "support the faculty in a number of activities that will enhance their lives as teacher and scholars."

EDITORIAL

Congratulations

At the faculty meeting next week, the Ad-hoc committee on governance will present their revised proposal for the Academic Council. The new proposal is that the membership be changed to four faculty members, one mediator and one representative for each division, and three students, one for each division. A committee member remarked to one of the deans that these changes would not have been made if it were not for the number of students who approached faculty members asking them to vote against the original proposal.

Congratulations and thank you to all the students who took time out to talk to their professors. This could not have happened without the support of the student body.

This experiences proves that if we, as a whole, unite behind an idea, be it the Academic Council, renovation of the student center, increased funding for the library, etc...the Administration will take notice. Perhaps nothing will be done about our concerns, but at least we will have registered them, and not just sat idly by.

The students of Washington College have underestimated the influence they hold. Since the college exists for the purpose of educating us, we have a great deal influence. Yes, there are issues that have little or nothing to do with us, such as tenure, faculty by-laws, etc...but issues that do effect our lives, such as the Academic Council, or renovations for the student center, are within our jurisdiction, and deserve more student input then we give them.

As we head into Christmas break, give some though to issues that effect us. Parking, hours for the health services, dining hall, snack bar and coffee house are important issues. Perhaps if we, under the guidance of the SGA, we to unite behind a solution to one of these problems, something would get done. But it will take forever, if as students, we can't or won't make our feelings known.

I will be returning as Editor-in-Chief next semester, so until then, Merry Christmas to all, and to all, good night.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammar. Letters must be signed. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Student apologizes to College

To the Washington College;

As a result of my actions at the 1990 Division III Tennis Championships, I was disqualified from further participation following the first round. I sincerely apologize to my teammates, students, faculty and alumni of Washington College for the behavior and hope that the reputation of our fine athletic and academic institution has not been discredited.

While spending the last several months looking back on the regrettable event, the focus of this apology came into view. My attitude has changed. The insight enlightened by the past event in addition to my experience as a resident assistant led to one conclusion. This conclusion was the fact that all actions have consequences. I would like to direct my reflections not only to the many new students but also the upperclassmen as well. I can recall the first days of my freshman year when hallmates found it amusing to vandalize the dorm. However, as the year progressed, it became less frequent as the weeks passed. I would attribute this to their maturation and realization that actions do in fact have consequences.

A more recent experience also had a profound impact on my view of the decision-making process and its consequences. While visiting the Herman Toulson Boot Camp, a shock incarceration center for youthful offenders, I realized just how important good decisions are in relation's to one's future. Inmates of this maximum security prison had all made choices while broke the law. Focusing on the consequence's of one's decisions, the corrections officers hoped to guide the young men down a new path of consistent and correct decision-making to be used in the future. One example of this philosophy was the use of the "decision bag." If an inmate made a bad choice, he was required to carry a 70 lb. bag for 15 minutes each hour. This behavior reinforced a good decision when placed in a similar situation in the future.

Each and every day we make decisions which influence our lives. Unfortunately for the inmates I visited, their choices led to consequences which put them behind bars. Although many of us will not face consequences as severe, it is nevertheless still important to remember that all actions result in consequences.

Sincerely,
Scott A. Sheppard

Do we really need another paper?

This is the Elm and it has been a tradition at Washington College for some 60 odd years. At a college of such esteemed literary stature, the Elm perhaps is one of our most important traditions. This year the Elm has come under fire by claims of tainting this tradition from a standpoint of quality. Not a very unrealistic possibility considering that the paper is violently understaffed with only a handful of dedicated but overworked students. This is not the first time that the paper has been attacked in this manner. In years past similar problems have befuddled this publication, however the school has been able to survive these phases due to the large pool of qualified writers who have come to the paper's rescue and have brought it up to a respectable standard. Has the Washington College family become so unwilling to cooperate that we need two school newspapers for 900 students? The staff of This is Not The Elm has shown through the production of their own newspaper that the Elm has been somewhat lacking over the semester. However, the need for them to produce a weekly paper to rival the official college newspaper is ridiculous and counterproductive. The first issue of the paper proved its point by demonstrating that the Elm truly needed to cover some important issues which had been overlooked. As has been previously stated, the Washington College family should not be divided with two competing publications. On the contrary the college should be united under the umbrella of one campus newspaper – The Elm. It is somewhat of an embarrassment for people to be viewing Washington College, with its reputation of such literary prestige, and see two papers whose goals are for the most part identical fighting for top honor. Competition breeds innovation, granted; but at the same time there is much to be gained by cooperation. If the people in charge of these publications truly have the schools best interest in mind, they will find SOME WAY to work together, and unite their resources. In a time of such world crisis, we should show some initiative to try to reconcile our differences at home, and not mirror the pigheadedness which is being demonstrated on a much more grandiose scale.

Sincerely,

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: What do you want for Christmas?

My christmas list

Carolin Leibig

Now that there are only 17 shopping days left until Christmas, it's time to make a wish list to assist those who want to buy us something. I have already given this some thought and I have realized that this process gets harder every year. As a kid, I could list 20 or more items per holiday season without so much as lifting the pencil from the paper. Ah, yes, life was simple back then. But now that I am older I see the world less as a 30 second commercial for the "Barbie Dreamhouse" and more as a place of war and suffering. It is difficult to make Christmas wishes without thinking about those who cannot; those who, for whatever reason, do not have the chance to sit an Santa's lap and say: "I would like a Sony CD player with remote control." In fact a lot of people, if given the chance to ask Santa for something, might say: "I would like some food and clean water." Sadly, that could be the wish of someone right here in the U.S.. Not everyone celebrates Christmas, or wants to sit on the lap of some large man wearing a red suit and fake beard, but at this time of year a large percentage of the world's population celebrates some kind of religious holiday, so why don't we all merge our holidays and have one big party. That is definitely on my wish list: A world party. Also on my Christmas list is world peace, end to world hunger, and love, health, happiness and the time to enjoy them all. I also wish for greater understanding between people, and that we all finally come to our senses and quit harping on our differences and start emphasizing our similarities, of which there are more.

The other day I watched "Santa Claus is Coming to Town", I know you have seen it. It is the one where we find out how Santa became what he is today. He had to go through many hardships: being left on the Kringle's doorstep, being attacked by Winter Warlock's tree, and being arrested by Burgermeister Meisterburger for repeatedly giving the children of Sombertown toys. But through it all Santa never lost the spirit of giving, in fact it was only intensified. At the end of the show, the stop-action figure of Fred Astaire said that if everyone could be just a little more like Santa, then there would be peace on earth and goodwill to man. I was touched and inspired and immediately made the aforementioned items part of my Christmas list. Peace, love, goodwill...I better add a 1991 Porsche 911 SC Cabriolet to my list since it is more likely I receive it than the other items on my list, which are nothing but pipe-dreams. But maybe they will be realized one day...Merry Christmas, Happy Chanukah, and may 1991 be the year we all wake up and smell the coffee!*

Dear Santa Claus, do you have a limit?

Emily Daignault

As the Christmas season approaches, many children find themselves working fervently on the usual task. A Christmas letter of their desires addressed to the North Pole. Yep, that's right, it's the letters to Santa. In the olden days, the wish lists consisted mostly of pleas for sweeter foods, later bed hours, and toys. The latter being the most predominant want for many, many years. Train sets, Lego's, Barbie dolls, Slinky's, Tyco car sets, a shiny red bicycle, and of course, a matching red wagon top the list of favorites. But what about the wish lists from the 'Adults'. Do the professors of this college sit at home and write Santa, asking for train sets? O.K, I know that's extreme, but what would certain members of society in Chestertown and the U.S. ask for? Here's some possibilities...

Nate 'The Great' Smith: New Nike's. Possibly in purple.

The Health Services: Glow in the dark 'Three for Free'.

The Dining Services: A resting place for the 'Veggie Puffs'.

Kevin 'Sparky' Kelly: Some cigars and a tie.

Stuart Neiman: A plane ticket to Chestertown.

Dan Quayle: A draft card. (He was in the National Guard during Vietnam)

President Bush: The dismissal of his evil twin "Skippy".

The Secretary of State, James Baker: A bulletproof vest.

Enough of this insidious guessing games! The question is "What do I want for Christmas?" Well, here's my answer.

Through the past several months, our country has been on the edge of war. This is a well known fact. But what I would like for Christmas is this. I would like for the conflict to be resolved in the Middle East. I would like for the people of this planet to be equal in every necessary way. I would like to not find myself being launched off my horse like a rocket so often. To be able to exist on less than six hours sleep. To have all of my term papers and exams receive an 'A'. But these are pipe dreams! Reality must be confronted, so here it is what I'll really ask for.

Nintendos and racing cars,
Free passes to all the bars,
Male species beyond belief,
Wearing nothing but their briefs.
An answering machine and new phone,
just to add to my new home.
A horse that doesn't buck,
so I won't continually yell, "f—k".
A computer that works itself,
hopefully cheaper than the Stealth.
A room in Reid that has power,
(Hopefully every hour.)
A strand of pearls that shine with luster,
Costing the same as a Dustbuster.
A pack of friends in my life,
But none of whom will call me their wife.
A car that won't stall or quit,
Thereby curbing my saying, "Sh—!"
My Christmas wishes are not complete,
Until I leave this seat..
My final one is no shock to me,
Or, I think, to Thee.
I wish you all,
Hope and glory in spring, winter, summer, or fall.
So now I'll be off to by my evergreen,
But here's one more thought that's keen.
Merry Christmas to the Students of W.C.
To all of you, from all of me!

The end of an era, the Carter years (1986-1990?)

Phil "Slice" Macek

Let's make no mistake about it, we are in the midst of a true living legend. A man who takes on a demanding full-time job just being himself. Yes, it's not easy being Wayne Carter, but Wayne wouldn't have it any other way. "It's so hard to be good at so many different things. Let's face it, being as great as I am is a curse when your surrounded by mediocrity." Wayne does not say these things with the smug tone of a "holier-than-thou" arrogance in his voice. On the contrary, he is just stating cold hard facts. With all of Wayne's greatness in mind, I humbly picked up my interview pad and entered the presence of the true "Big Daddy." I specifically wanted to ask him about the facet of his life that has raised him to his present level of national prominence—his ability and desire to excel at the game of caps. A big reason for Wayne's ability to "toss the tin" can be seen in the extent to which Wayne has made the game of caps an integral part of his philosophy of life. "Life, just like caps, is a competition and that is what makes my life so great. There's no better feeling than hearing somebody talk trash and then finding out that they can't back it up on the caps court. I'm talking about people like Gumby, Bob Kennedy, Bill Shaw, and the king of nasty, sandy trash talking, Andy Prevost. P.S. Andy, get a phone."

With the way Carter embraces the game in my mind I proceeded to ask him the following questions, all the while hoping and praying that some of his influence would rub off on me.

Slice: Wayne, if you would, please describe the ideal caps shot.

Wayne: The ideal shot is a retaliation shot with good loft so as to splash the other team. Under optimal conditions, this retaliation shot would win the game. Bounce shots are also good just for the "sheer cheesiness" of such shots.

S: Tell us about shots that float.

W: The floater is a bad shot that either hits the rim and lightly settles into the cup or bounces in.

S: Wayne, in all honesty, are you a pioneer of the game?

W: You know Slice, I've been asked that question many times and I like to answer it by quoting one of America's finest actors, Bill Murray: when it comes to caps "I am the little acorn that becomes the giant Oak." I have taken this game as a tiny sapling and nurtured it through practice into a strong sturdy tree. This game is a mainstay on campus, And while I don't want to toot my own horn for making it as popular as it is, "Toot, Toot."

S: This leads me to a seemingly inevitable question Wayne, Where did you perfect your craft?

W: In the ideal caps arena, the upper eight man of Cecil.

S: So Wayne, let me see if I can sum up a typical "Big Daddy" day. You wake up at noon. Then after a quick shower and saying your daily prayers to Pete Townshend, it's off to Burger King for a lunch consisting of three double cheeseburgers and the biggest bucket of Coke they have. Then after a challenging afternoon of Nintendo golf and napping, it's back to Burger King for dinner and then a few rounds of Bud longnecks and eight ball at the Blue Bird Tavern. My question is this, with all the taxing demands of your frantic lifestyle, how do you find time to practice and promote the game of caps?

W: I promote the game by taking it to the rookies. I play in all kinds of arenas, with my personal favorites being Cecil, Cardinal F, and a few private off-campus locales. I will always make time for caps. That's a promise. I am always looking to take the game to new areas, you might say it is my "calling" in life.

S: It's been said more than once that you are a "small god" on the Caps court. Do you see an heir apparent to your throne upon your graduation?

W: In talent maybe, but certainly not in the overall package that is Wayne Carter.

S: O.K. Wayne picture this, the other team has just hit a shot to put them up 18 to 16. It's your rebuttal, and a miss means a loss for your squad. What goes through your mind while you teeter on the edge of defeat?

W: This is the position I wanna be in. I want the pressure; I want the game to come to me. If I make the shot, I want the glory. If I miss, I'll take the blame. Remember, Slice, the true legends want this kind of pressure, and I am a true legend.

S: What is your position on talking trash in order to get a psychological edge on your opponents?

W: You sit down, you toss the cap in the cup, the other guys chug. There is no room for talking trash in this league.

S: What player on the campus touring circuit strikes the most fear in your heart?

W: When it comes to caps, I fear no man. However, when it comes to key shots there's nothing like looking across the court and seeing the long arms and longer hair of Scott Peterson ready to fire up the cap. It affects some players so badly that they become ineffective players, but it fires me up and usually leads me to victory. I cannot be defeated!

S: Well at the other extreme, who is the worst player you have ever seen?

W: John Kircher

Changes in store for Miller Library

By Laura Hopper

As the students head home for vacation, Miller Library will undergo a few changes that will effect the students. These changes are part of a plan to utilize the library space as effectively as possible.

The week after the students leave, workmen will remove the carpeting, draperies and furniture from the Smoking Room. The room will be cleaned, repainted, and recarpeted. New shelves will be installed, and the old smoking room will become a periodicals reading room, complete with some new furniture. The newest issue of each periodical and newspaper the library receives will be located in this reading room. Students will, hopefully, be able to locate and read periodicals here, as well as socialize.

Also planned is the rehabilitation of the Meeting Room, currently used for Art History courses. With the opening of the ARC and its new audio-visual center, the Art History courses will be relocated, and the Meeting Room will become the microforms center. This would only happen if new Audio-Visual equipment for the ARC arrives, is installed and tested before the students return.

With the renovation of the smoking room, smoking will not be allowed in the library. The library staff requests that students honor this, and not smoke in the stairwells or bathrooms.

there were any plans to renovate the dorms - highlighting the Caroline and Queen Anne's complex. Trout told Frank that there were no current plans for total renovation.

Freshman, Tarin Towers asked about a tuition increase for next year. Trout responded that there will be - out of necessity - "some raise in tuition". He added that the cost of tuition has increased "dollar for dollar" over the years with most luxury items like cars.

Finally Freshman Class President, Lionel Dyson, asked Trout whether he planned to have a "higher profile" on campus next semester. Trout responded that he was upset with not being more available and more visible on campus and gave himself only a "C or C-" for his performance. He then asked what he could do to make himself more known to the students, but also added that with the schedule that the Development Office has given him, it is hard to just keep afloat of the work load.

Trout thanked everyone for coming and closed by saying that he has been "delighted with the students that he has come to know and that he regrets that he hasn't had the chance to meet more, but he looks forward to knowing more students in the future."

With Carter's legendary status firmly cemented in the annals of Washington College history, I decided to see how other members of the college community saw this symbol of all that is good and right with the world. Chris Seymour, a junior and budding young caps superstar in his own right, had this to say about Wayne's prowess on the caps court. "Carter is constantly walking that fine line between genius and insanity. He's a crafty, right-handed veteran who always commands respect from his opponents. His blue collar, workman-like ethic coupled with his true love for competition makes him a legend of the game and a certain Hall-of-Famer.

Wayne has also garnered the respect of Cardinal R.A., Matt Moore. After saying that Wayne was a dinosaur, a "throwback" to the days when men played caps and nothing else, Moore expanded on Carter's dedication to the game. "Wayne is a professional crusader with a profound sense of duty to the game." Moore further stated that Carter was a "visionary" and that "he seems to be everywhere on the caps court." Lastly, Moore stated that Carter's unique ability to innovate new techniques in the middle of a game and to keep his opponents off balance with key rebuttals "transcended all conventional boundaries of the game."

While it is true that Wayne's caps career has been the paradigm of achievement, starting with his Olympic gold medal against the Russians in Lake Placid, 1980, and continuing up through his recent naming as Sports Illustrated's "Athlete of the Decade," he is certainly no stranger to controversy. Back in early 1987, Wayne got entangled in a point shaving scandal that rocked the world. Citizens everywhere were appalled. "How could our hero, the role model we want our kids to become, be subject to such horrible allegations?" Fortunately, Wayne was never convicted of any criminal acts. However, he will always live with the anger that his reputation has been tainted. Recently, there have been a flood of rumors that "Big Daddy" has been using steroids to increase his caps ability. However, when I asked Wayne about this he responded, "That is just not true. I do not believe in steroid use, I just try to eat as much fast food as possible. This is all a great misunderstanding, and I will overcome!

Finally, while it has been a great learning experience for me to spend some time with an extraordinary member of the human species, it must be remembered that Wayne's personality goes far beyond the game of caps. "You must remember that nobody is above the game," says Wayne sternly. "This game has been so very good to me, and now I would like to give something back. I want to share my good fortune with those who haven't lived the Wayne Carter fairy tale life. I am especially concerned with the young of this country." When I asked Wayne if he had one message for the young that stood above all else, Wayne paused for a minute and said, "I have become a caps legend because I have tremendous respect for the game of throwing a discarded beer bottle top into a cup of cheap beer while sitting on a dirty floor. Thus, I beg all people not to abuse alcohol, and above all, do not drink and drive. If you pattern your life after me, I might just see you in the Hall of Fame one day."

I thanked Wayne for his time and asked if I might have the highly coveted chance to play a game with him. As he headed toward the fridge to get a cold case he said, "We'll go to 25, challengers shoot first."

Swim team wins a pair

By Matt Giller

Last week the Shorewomen's swim team(5-1) trounced Notre Dame 164-97 and defeated MAC rival Widener 118-85.

The meet against Notre Dame started off with an exciting first heet. The 200 Medley Relay team of Jennifer Green, Mimi Devlin, Kasey Carroll and Magdalena Fuchs outswam Notre Dame by one tenth of a second.

Sam Streamer added three individual firsts by winning the 50, 100 and 1000 meter Freestyles. Carroll broke her own team record in the 200 Butterfly to accompany her 200 Freestyle victory.

Green won both the 100 and 200 meter Backstroke with Vickie Vahos and Kelly Loftus placing second and third behind her, respectively, in the 200 and Vahos and Prendergast taking third and fourth in the 100 Backstroke.

Freshman Mimi Devlin won the 100 Breastroke with Devin Burk and Loftus placing third and fourth, respectively. Leslie Newcomb had a season best time in the 200 Breastroke to win and placed second in the grueling 1000 Freestyle and 200 IM.

Freshman Jennifer McCartney won the 500 Freestyle (swimming it for the first time) as senior teammate Kristin Callazzo placed second behind her. Fuchs added two important second place finishes in the 50 and 100 Freestyle qualifying for the MACs in the 50 meter sprint. Prendergast and Joan Colton finished third and fourth, respectively, in the 100 Butterfly with good times.

Last week included the Shorewomen's biggest win ever over MAC antagonist, the Widener Pioneers.

Carroll, Streamer and Devlin led the Shorewomen with a combined seven individual firsts. Carroll won the 1000 Freestyle and back three events later to break the team record in the 200 IM (2:19.9). She later won the 500 Freestyle in a season best time (5:20.5).

Streamer broke her own school records in the 50 and 100 Freestyle with times of 26.3 and 57.6 in the respective events. Devlin and Green added first place times in the 200 Freestyle and 200 Butterfly. Green also gained a first place time in the 200 Backstroke.

The 400 Medley Relay teams of Green, Newcomb, Devlin, and Fuchs won while Vahos, Burk, McCartney and Ramsey Bingham placed third in the same heat.

Other key swims were turned in by McCartney (200 Butterfly, 200 Breastroke - both were personal best times), Kristen Callazzo (personal best in the 50 and 100 Freestyle), Fuchs (personal best in the 200 Freestyle), Joan Colton (fourth in the 200 Butterfly), Prendergast (third in the 200 Backstroke).

The women end the pre-Holiday schedule with a meet at Bryn Mawr College tomorrow.

Basketball splits two

By Matt Giller

This past week the Shoremen netters(2-4) played two difficult contests but were only awarded one win. While the Shoremen thrilled the home crowd with a 68-53 victory over Gallaudet, they were unable to pull off a road win at Widener as the Pioneers held the WAC off 66-50.

Saturday's contest was close throughout as both teams went into their halftime lockerrooms with Widener leading 27-24. After Junior Tim Liddy sank two free throws to cut Widener's lead to 47-45 with 7:49 remaining in the game, the WAC did not score another bucket until sophomore Darren Vican scored with 1:21 left. Widener rolled from there. Liddy led the WAC with 19 points and 6 rebounds.

The Shoremen rallied from a 32-25 deficit to defeat Gallaudet last Tuesday night and pick up their second victory. Liddy again led W.C. scorers with 19 points. Peter Basel and Vican contributed with 13 and 12 respectively.

An Interview with the Brain Chillins

by Bruce Hamilton

ELM: First question, how did you guys form?

Joe Boone: I'll take that one. Squawk, peep, moo!

ELM: Was that all this year?

JB: Snort, euhhhhhhh.

ELM: I'll have to print that phonetically.

Morgan Huff: That was yesterday, he's talking in past tense.

JB: Burp.

MH: That's in the third person. That verb there, it's in third person.

ELM: So you guys must have known each other a long while for you to be able to understand him when he makes noises like that.

MH: Umm.

ELM: Who are your major musical influences?

Joe: Mr. Kurt, the manager at Acme.

MH: He's good. I got arrested for shoplifting.

ELM: I didn't know that.

MH: He was gonna make me and [another student] an example to the rest of the student body, because- shoplifting is a crime. I don't know if you knew that or not. But uh, of course [the other student] here stole a chocolate donut, shoplifting his favorite pastry. I, of course, on the other hand had to explain to Mr. Kurt that mine was a star-shaped pastry, known in America as a French Cruller.

ELM: Did you do any time for this, Morgan?

MH: No I didn't, but if all goes well Mr. Kurt will do the just thing.

ELM: Were you eating the donuts in line?

MH: Yeah, he said we were 'still licking our lips in the line'. So, you know... we're sort of outlaws already. But yeah, I do like James Brown.

ELM: Any other influences?

JB: Nope.

ELM: Is all your stuff original or do you covers as well?

JB: Bruce, you were there.

ELM: Yeah, I was, for the one performance but I was also there last night when you guys were doing Cheap Trick.

MH: It wasn't them. We wrote that.

ELM: Oh, sorry. It sounded vaguely familiar, like a late seventies pop tune.

MH: They stole that from us.

Reviewing Jacob's Ladder

by Chris Goldenberg

"Once you've made peace with the devils around you, then those devils become angels." This quote is one of the fundamental and reverberating themes which pervades the haunting but stimulating film Jacob's Ladder.

The movie focuses upon Vietnam veteran Jacob Singer portrayed by Tim Robbins (Bull Durham, Cadillac Man). Several years have lapsed since Jacob Singer's tour of duty in the war and he must cope with civilian life again. He works as a mailman for the post office to support himself, separated from his wife Sara and living now with his girlfriend Jezzie in an apartment building. But Jacob's simple and banal life is suddenly plagued not only by horrible flashbacks from his military service but also by unexplainable ghastly visions of devils and other hellish images. During the day he hallucinates that men in business suits and mouthless demons are stalking him everywhere while at night he dreams of his deceased son and of his own terrifying conceptions of Hell. His life becomes one of constant misery which nobody else understands, alienating his girlfriend and believing himself to be insane. He sets out to discover the hidden causes for his delusions and the reason for his inability to distinguish nightmarish fantasy from reality. The answers prove to be quite shocking.

The film abounds with many religious references and distinct images of Heaven and Hell. The names of the movie's characters can all be cited from the Bible: Jacob, Jezebel (the name of a woman in the New Testament who seduced many Christians), Gabriel, and Sara. Jacob's life is an explicit representation of Hell where he must endure torture and suffering because of the fantastic demons which constantly torment him. His only salvation lies with his friendly and fatherly chiropractor Louis played by Danny Aiello (Moonstruck, Do the Right Thing). Louis, whom Jacob seeks for medical purposes to ease his back pains, is the only character who actually cares for him. Louis, who is the speaker of the above quote, is an illustration of the heavenly messiah who attempts to rescue Jacob from the abyss. Jacob even tells him, "Ya know, Louis, in this light, you look like an old cherub." One can observe several religious symbols in Jacob's bizarre dreams as well where the concept of Hell is manifested in the images of his own personal fears such as the phobia for hospitals and the phobia of being trapped alone in a gloomy subway station.

But the real subject of the film is not Jacob's search for the reason for the illusions which harass him but actually Jacob's search for himself. As Louis had stated to him, Jacob must deal with the terrors that surround him, confront his fears, and learn to live with them. The depiction of his deep fears gives us not only an insight into Jacob Singer's being but his overcoming of these fears also allows us to view Jacob as a man of internal strength and determination.

The only qualm from this critic was the last ninety seconds of the movie. Without revealing the film's ironic conclusion, the ending left me disappointed, somewhat angry, and feeling almost insulted as an avid moviegoer. It's simply easier to view for yourself. The film, however, must be seen for the excellent acting of Tom Robbins, and of Danny Aiello, and for the fine special effects used to display Jacob Singer's demons (which were inspired by the macabre, abstract drawings of Francis Bacon in the 1600's). Just as Jacob Singer was haunted, this film will also remain with its audience for a long time.

Chillins

ELM: But they were almost twenty years your predecessors.

TI: Joe's parents actually write all the songs.

JB: Fax.

MH: Joe's Dad faxes them to us.

JB: When I act bad at home he sends me hard bass lines.

ELM: Would you classify your music as..

TI: Chillins.

ELM: As chillins? Not falling under any typical genre?

JB: Sort of a keopectate slash meat by-product reggae fusion kinda thing.

MH: I kind of think of it as like.. you're drowning in a baby pool and instead of screaming for help on your last breath someone gives you a large bite of a meat snack.

ELM: A generic meat snack?

MH: Well, a jerky or something so you drown with the taste of pepperoni in your mouth.

JB: The socially acceptable meat snacks.

TI: It's kind of like being fondled by a rusty iron duck.

ELM: Where did you get your name?

MH: From a polyurethane bag.

JB: We found it at a garage sale.

MH: It's like a brain child, but .. it's not. It's plural.

ELM: So it's a sort of bastardization of brain childrens.

MH: No, it's not really a bastardization, it's vernacular.

JB: Sort of a heavy black motherly woman version. Are you interviewing us or are we interviewing you?

ELM: Well, that's the question.

ELM: How long have you been playing bass, Joe?

JB: Four months.

ELM: How long have you been playing drums, Morgan?

MH: I don't like to be called a drummer. Since the dawn of time I have played, but, I'm not a drummer. I just like to get sweaty with round things. It's not a technical thing, it's.. primal.

ELM: Do you break a lot of heads?

MH: Yeah, I play with a lot of heads.

ELM: How long have you been playing guitar, Tom?

TI: Captain!

ELM: Captain Tom.

TI: Captain Kermit.

ELM: Captain Kermit.

TI: I was at the zoo once, and there was this woman with this balloon. From then on I knew I just had to play.

ELM: So you went to the zoo and saw a woman with a balloon and you knew you had to play guitar.

TI: Well, first I had to scale a fish with my bare teeth. Then I had to make a sauce, and it was composed of mostly radishes and pickled yams.

ELM: So where do you plan to go with your band?

TI: Out of Chestertown. Vermont. Virginia.

JB: Across the street to Rock's bathroom?

ELM: But you're hopeful of getting a recording contract?

JB: Does Rock have one?

ELM: Not in his bathroom, I guess.

MH: He should.

ELM: Is it safe to say you have a lot of Hendrix influence?

TI: Jimi Hendrix was a superb guy at making desserts. He put ice cream on top of deviled eggs, he put paprika in apple sauce! I think Elvis is a large element in many things.

MH: The periodic table.

TI: He was a genius. He could roll things. He could roll fruit.

MH: He could do things with biscuits. Buttermilk? He could take buttermilk and throw in some jalapenos and make a hybrid Mexican biscuit, just for breakfast or an after-dinner snack!

ELM: Do you think Elvis ever got arrested for shoplifting a donut?

MH: No.

TI: But only because of the size or magnitude of his eyebrows, which, often, were financed.

ELM: Joe, you're from Memphis, right? Grew up in Memphis, went to school in Memphis?

JB: Yes.

ELM: So would you say that influenced your music?

JB: Yes, but not because of the music that was being played there. It was simply because I did live there and I could not be influenced by anywhere else because I didn't live there.

ELM: Tom, where are you from?

TI: I am from the island off the coast of the one that we are part of at this very moment. The island I am of course referring to is Long Island, known for its cabbage fields or its long chain of Arthur Treachers establishments.

ELM: Morgan, where are you from?

MH: I am from the state known as the commonwealth state.

ELM: Is that where you got your Elvis lamp?

MH: Yes.

TI: The structure of our music is basically an amalgam of the distant breezes you would often find unbelievable.

ELM: I see you have the New Kids pasted on your toilet and also a world tour poster.

MH: When were you in my toilet?

ELM: Do you respect or envy them in any way?

MH: Well, most of the New Kids are Sagittarius, and myself being a Gemini I have a strong leaning towards Sagittarius.

TI: Professor Sidhu is a real influence on our music. A lot of our songs are written about him, or during him. Like on song entitled "Oh black hole, how I long to be within thee" and it's basically a mathematical equation, which noone can understand. It's basically an attempt by all of us to write an essay on that and translate it into musical terms, that escalate upwards and then downwards and explode in your nostrils like a fresh piece of bacon.

MH: He's lying of course.

ELM: You mentioned the black hole song, what are some of your other song names?

TI: We have a song called no, a song called yes, a song called perhaps, and a song called..

MH: And 'Never mind the yogurt'.

TI: Which is definitely derived from the Sex Pistols.

MH: Yes, and there's 'I'll never be your bleach detergent'.

ELM: Do you write mainly ballads?

JB: Yes, all ballads.

TI: No, we're an anthem band.

JB: Ballads!

TI: Anthems!

JB: Ballads!

ELM: What are your favorite odors?

MH: Spring wine. I used to smell my mother's frying pans. Then I discovered what cheeze whiz could do for the personality. I don't like cheeze whiz, just what it can do for a personality. Also bound encyclopedias.

ELM: What's you favorite color?

TI: Jimi Hendrix. Elvis Costello. Elvis Presley. Judas Priest. Lots of bluegrass. Perhaps Frankincense?

MH: One last word. My violence. My girl. My accelerator.

Sabha has holiday wishes, egg nog, and bowl picks

Before you students go away to your winter wonderlands, the Great Sabha would like to giv the gift that keeps on giving - his college bowl picks(as well asthis week's NFL sure bets). The Sabha is indisputably the hottest pigskin prophet in the Milky Way(last week's results: NFL - 10-2-2; College - 8-2). The Great One is inebriated with joy - and wants to pass this holiday glee to all by letting them in on his genius. You will agree, Sabha's picks are worth more than your average petty gift. Sabha's gift is the gift of prophecy; his gift is now your gift. Let's get on with this, yo.

NFL:

PITTSBURGH -13 over New England. Santa Claus saw Victor Kiam naked and said,"Ho,ho,ho." Give the points.

Seattle +3 1/2 over GREEN BAY. The Sabha's going to try out his new ear muffs at this game. Take the points.

HOUSTON -13 over Cleveland. This used to be a war. Give the points.

NY GIANTS -6 over Minnesota. The Vikes will come down to Earth - hard. Give the points.

Phoenix +4 1/2 over ATLANTA. Both of these teams have a lot to ask Santa for. Take the points.

San Francisco -4 over CINCINNATI. I left my heart in Cincinnati? No. Give the points.

KANSAS CITY -7 over Denver. Elway, shmelway. Give the points.

New Orleans +4 1/2 over LA RAMS. The Saints should be marching home a winner here. Take the points.

Chicago +4 over WASHINGTON. The Skins will win by a field goal - by the way the Sabha thinks that the Hoggettes are really ugly. Take the points.

BEST BETS

Buffalo -6 over INDIANAPOLIS. Jeff George will ask Santa to come early and give him an offensive line. Give the points.

MIAMI -1 over Philadelphia. Shula vs. Buddy - need I say more. Give the points.

COLLEGE

NAVY +6 1/2 over Army. Remember when this game used to matter? Take the points.

BLOCKBUSTER BOWL

Florida State -5 1/2 over Penn State. Should be the best bowl game. Give the points.

PEACH BOWL

Auburn -9 over Indiana. Who's kiddin' who? Indiana's a basketball school. Give the points.

HOLIDAY BOWL

BYU -5 over Texas A&M. The Great One will choke on his turkey if Ty loses this one.

HANCOCK BOWL

USC -1 over Michigan St. What the hell kind of bowl is this? Give the point.

COPPER BOWL

Wyoming +9 over California. Sorry dudes, the Cowboys are totally rightous. Take the points, fer sure. Totally Sabha.

GATOR BOWL

Mississippi +11 over Michigan. First year coach at the Big "M" will choke just as Bo did. Take the points.

HALL OF FAME

Clemson 1 1/2 over Illinois. Clemson's paw on their jersey looks a lot like the Sabha's birthmark on his butt.

CITRUS BOWL

Georgia Tech +2 1/2 over Nebraska. The Cornhuskers can't win the big one. Take the points.

COTTON BOWL

Miami -7 over Texas. This is Sabha's holiday lock. Bet dad's Christmas tie on it. Give the points.

FIESTA BOWL

Alabama -8 over Louisville. Another basketball school pretending to play football. Give the points.

ROSE BOWL

Washington -8 over Iowa. The Sabha doesn't like Iowa because their cheerleaders look like poster girls for safe sex.

ORANGE BOWL

Notre Dame even over Colorado. It's deja vu all over again. Take the Irish.

SUGAR BOWL

Tennessee -5 1/2 over Virginia. The ACC just does not belong on New Year's Day. Give the points.

Sabha's picks this season:

NFL: 60-43-3
BEST BETS: 12-4
COLLEGE: 16-24

College Reacts to War in Gulf

By: Susie Mazzullo

The war in the Gulf is now nine days old. It brought with it many feelings, such as fear, anger and a renewed pride in our country. Most of all, however, the start of the war brought questions.

When classes first began in the fall, not much about the Persian Gulf crisis was heard except for the nightly news coverage and an occassional grumble or two about the drastically rising fuel prices. As the semester progressed,however, reminders of what was going on half way around the world gradually began to be seen more and more, in the way of news stories, yellow ribbons, and even more importantly the growing abundance of letters received from loved ones and friends who were experiencing the crisis that we, for the most part, weren't bothered by.

Then Thanksgiving and Christmas approached and many family members and friends were missing from the celebrations. This left a void in the hearts of many Americans, for this year they weren't going to see that "special someone". Feelings of dread also clouded the holidays as the January 15th deadline for Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait was fast approaching. Peace talks were not accomplishing much and all in all, there was just a feeling of helpless waiting that was felt throughout the country.

For the students of Washington College, returning to school following the holidays was not quite as easy as it had been in the fall. A sense of panic about the crisis in the Gulf and the impending deadline was felt all over campus. Many students had questions about the situation and nowhere to find the answers. A rally in the Norman James Theatre on January 15th provided some of the answers.

"The End of the World Party", as it was called, turned out to be the place to be on campus that night as Norman James was standing room only for the event. Dr. Kevin Brien, Associate Professor of Philosophy and Religion, and Dr. Peter Tapke, Professor of Philosophy and Religion both spoke on the subject of the crisis in the Middle East. Following that, the rally became a question and answer period for the students. One student described it as "having a bunch of friends over in your living room discussing a common problem".

The theme of the rally was in a sense "what can we do?" Washington College students wanted to do something but they didn't know what. Ideas were put forth to protest, write to senators and voice opinions, hold a blood drive, and to support the troops there with letters and packages. By the end of the meeting, the general consensus of the faculty and students in the room was that education was the key. Most of the participants felt that they needed to learn more about the whole situation before they could act in a proper way.

That night the students didn't know just what was going to happen. The very next night, however, on January 16th the feelings of anxiety and dread that the country had been feeling for so long, turned into feelings of outright fear, both for the troops stationed in the Middle East and for the families and friends that they left behind. The crisis, as it had been called for so long, had now turned into a war.

A second forum was held this past Monday night in the hopes that some of the ques-

Students plan campus activities

By: Clay Eichelberger

In the wake of the U.S. declaration of war on January 16th, many students have wondered how best to deal with the reality of war. Thanks to the efforts of several members of the student body, some campus activities are being planned to help in this matter.

One such activity has already taken place last Sunday January 20th, when dozens of students turned out for a candlelight march from the Elm to the waterfront. The march was not meant to be either in favor or in protest of the war, but rather in support of the U.S. troops in the Middle East, explained sophomore Tanya Cunic, who organized the march. "Whether you're pre-war or anti-war, nobody wants to see death and destruction," she said.

Cunic says she got the idea for the candlelight march from "a woman in New Hampshire who put a candle in her window at midnight" when the first U.S. troops were sent to the Middle East. "What I did was take the candle out of the window. I brought it one stop further, " Cunic Explained. she wanted to organize something because "I was confused, I was upset, I felt alone, and I needed to know that there was a community, both students and townspeople, who felt the same way. By building up our morale and building support, care, and love, we're going to be able to give all that back when the troops come home."

Freshmen Sara Hunt and Abrah Wilberding agree that student involvement is important, but feel that in light of the complicated background behind the situation in the Middle East, education is vital. To that end, they are organizing a "teach-in" to provide more information. Like the candlelight march, the teach-in will be impartial, concentrating not on pro or anti war sentiments, but on education. "All it's really meant to do is give the background on the Middle East," Hunt said. "You have to be educated on the subject before you can form an opinion," adds Wilberding, who wants the teach-in to "help students see both sides of the issue."

Both Hunt and Wilberding would like to see a series of talks and plan to invite both Washington College professors and speakers from outside the College. They hope to offer literature focussing on all sides of the conflict, including such diverse subjects as Middle Eastern religion and culture. Hunt feels it is important "to let the students know, before they jump to conclusions, that there are ways they can find things out."

No date has been set for the teach-in as of this writing, though Hunt expects to be able to announce a date within a week. Students who are interested in helping with the teach-in many contact either Hunt or Wilberding.

Letters from the desert

By: Laura Hopper

"This conflict started August 2nd when the dictator of Iraq invaded a small and helpless neighbor...five months ago Saddam Hussein started this war against Kuwait. Tonight, the battle is joined."

With those words, President Bush told the nation that we commenced air strikes against Iraq, ending five months of suspense over the invasion of Kuwait.

For the last five months, the students of Washington College, like Americans everywhere, have lived with the aftermath of Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait. The effects of the invasion were numerous. For some, it was higher gas prices. For others, it was watching loved ones ship out to defend Saudi Arabia in Operation Desert Shield.

Joan Browne of the Registrar's office has a son stationed in Saudi Arabia. In one of his letters to her he wrote, "Dear Mom: Just a few words to say thanks for the latest package that had the hard pretzels in it. I only shared a couple, the other items I shared with all the guys. Am staying pretty busy and staying healthy. Some of the guys are starting to break

They're in this for us

We grew up in a time of peace, and now come of age in a time of war. Most of us are too young to remember Viet Nam, although it has affected our lives. What we do remember is Ronald Reagan, the icon of the Eighties, Mr. Peace through Strength, Mr. Let's sell arms to Middle Eastern dictators.

The service people in the Gulf are our age. They are, in a way, fighting in place of us. Because they are in Saudi Arabia or the Persian Gulf enables us to be here, in Chestertown, perhaps the least likely target for a SCUD missile attack. The debt that we, as a generation, will owe them is immense.

These past weeks, the College and Chestertown community have gathered together to support our troops in the Middle East. Candlelight vigils and marches, blood drives, and letter writing campaigns, will all become part of our lives in the near future.

Although the war seems to be just a newsbreak during a soap opera or an extended World News Tonight with Peter Jennings, it is very real. The only thing we, safe from missiles and other weapons of death, can do is to support our troops.

In order to write "Letters from the desert" I read mail sent to Washington College student from service people in the Middle East. Many of the letters were sad or bitter. They expressed a desire to keep some form of contact with home. Some were afraid that they had lost the support of the "folks back home." It's time to show them we support them.

A little Saudi Arabian girl approached Andrew McDaniel, a member of the 82nd Airborne. She gave him a Saudi flag and a hug, and thanked him for protecting her country. That's what this war is about.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters must be signed. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Satirists beware

Dear Editor:

Although I've recently graduated and am no longer a part of college life per se, I still have an interest in what goes on at Washington College. So, I've found it difficult to ignore the recent rash of rebellions being launched at the school.

To what I'm referring is, of course, the "This-Is-Not-The-(place the noun of your choice here)-Syndrome." For example, we now have "This Is Not The Elm" and "This Is Not WacHappenings." Parenthetically, it would be nice if the editors of these publications could come up with names that carry with them a little more integrity and then let the reading masses figure out the rest. But, as a former professor said to me, satire is an enabling force of much literature, but not of all of it. Satirizing existing institutions is an age-old and valid form of art, but, at the same time, it is the easiest.

I feel the missing ingredient in this potpourri of disestablishmentarianism is RESPECT. In order for one to lose respect for someone or something, one must have had it in the first place. Aristotle obviously had great respect for Plato and learned much from him before going on to disagree completely with his point of view.

Contrary to how this may sound, I am not criticizing the actual work of said editors; this seems to be relatively organized and intelligent. What I am criticizing is the attitude, the spirit in which the work is done. The institutions they satirize seem to me to be taken for granted, providing a mere excuse for them to strut their journalistic stuff, so to speak. The depth and insight of their publications can only be as great as the creators' open-mindedness. And isn't one of the main points of a college education to open one's mind? In other words, for every action their is a reaction, but in this case, the reaction takes an unwarranted precedence. It becomes its own action, thereby negating its own raison d'etre.

One final word: as I understand it, the same people who edit "This Is Not The Elm/ WacHappenings" have inadvertently laid the groundwork for a counter-revolution, namely, "This Is Not The Writer's Union." When I came here as a freshman, the Writer's Union rebellion, just as, in its way, The Elm was. So, here emerges a warning to be heeded: beware the satirist, for he may be the next to be satirized.

Student questions relocation of Student Affairs

Dear Editor:

It has struck me in the still early days of the A.R.C. that Student Affairs is really out of place in the A.R.C. It is now far removed from the students and their daily routine. The best thing about Student Affairs in the past was how accessible it was to students and that it was no big deal to drop by to get things off your chest. Its new location is not convenient for those who want to clear their minds with the Dean's. If this building's purpose is for academic resources than why not put the Writing Lab in this building. The school has always prided itself on its writing reputation so this building would seem an ideal setting for such a program. In my years here I have used Student Affairs a few times and it has been a great help, but it is one of those facilities that's glory was in the ease with which one could go and chew the fat. Now, I feel awkward to drop by uninvited.

Sincerely,

Alumnus responds to editorial

Dear Editor:

Your recent editorial on the national debt, which took longer than usual to cross the Delaware, caught up with me in post-Christmas rumination.

I was surprised at your willingness to surrender to the belief that higher taxes are the way out of debt. We in New Jersey have just begun to feel the effects of the single largest State imposed tax increase in the history of the nation. Governor Florio's $2.8 billion increase was done to close a $600 million budget deficit. If the logic used in your editorial were correct, New Jersey would be in fat city. His plan, however, has had the opposite effect. It has caused another $600 million deficit and started a business exodus that will lead to even less tax revenues.

When you say that, "if the money must go somewhere, it might as well go to the government," you are wrong. Money is best left in the hands of the people who earned it, for they know best how to expend their income and produce economic growth at the same time.

Sincerely,
Glen Beebe '81

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: What is your opinion of anti-war protests? How much influence do think these protests have on policy makers, public opinion, our troops in the Gulf and others?

If they had a solution, it would be different...

Last week, despite all of the interest with which I had followed the Middle East Conflict, I was still quite shocked to hear the words - "America is at War." That was just not something that I thought that I would ever hear in my lifetime. Most of us were so young the last time America fought a war that we were either ambivalent to the facts or other things were more important to us. When I was two and three years old, I was most concerned with my toys, my parents and new little sister and what was going to happen the next day on Sesame Street. I was never acutely aware of the Viet Nam War. So last Wednesday, a part of my life changed, and admittedly, I cried - in fear and sadness for the inevitability of the deaths of many young American men and women.

Understandably, our involvement in the Middle East conflict has produced disagreement in our society. There are some who say that the war should have begun on August 2 and there are others who believe that the U.S. acted far too hastily in its decision to fight, not to mention the whole spectrum of beliefs in between. Perhaps because of the nature of Americans or the nature of our freedoms, many people have chosen to voice their support for or more often than not, their opposition to the Gulf War by having demonstrations.

I have been taught many things by my parents - much of which I respect and try to abide by. One of the things that has been important in my upbringing is the cliché that "You should stand for something or you will fall for anything." War demonstrators are standing up - or sitting down - for what they believe in. In that sense, I truly respect them. It takes courage and strength to put yourself on the line for others and such dedication is not always easy to come by.

While I admire the dedication of protestors, I have to return to some other of my parents' teachings in order to develop a clear opinion as to whether or not I should join them in their efforts.

I have been taught to love our country, right or wrong, because it is our country. (I'll admit, I tend to get a little teary eyed when the national anthem is played!) I have also been taught that if something is wrong, I should do my best to make it better, not through complaints and slander, but through honest hard work and love. The last of my childhood lessons that pertains to today's situation is that while the extreme may make a statement, logic and rationality usually make the difference.

Kyndra Ponder

After I have considered the advice of my parents and the way that following that advice until now has worked, I have decided that I can not protest the Gulf War at such an early phase of our involvement, nor can I truly regard the actions of war protestors with utmost respect.

The ideals which the protestors stand for are what I believe to be good ideals - peace and resolution as opposed to war and death. Yes, they are saying how they feel about our involvement in the Persian Gulf, but they have not - to my knowledge - offered any viable alternatives.

The protests are not solving anything - and in fact may be contributing to more prob-

I have two friends in Saudi Arabia and from contact with one of them I know the soldiers are not happy with the demonstrations back home. "I went to D.C. the other day and there were people who were protesting the war; interestingly enough I thought that there were more people there supporting the war. Some people had signs that said "Honk if you support our troops.""

"If you protest against the war you inadvertently lower the moral of the troops. I would like to sit down with each anti-war protester and ask him/her what he/she thinks are plausible alternatives to war, as I see it there are none; it is either fight now or fight later."

Pam Feeney
Junior
Crofton, MD

Here come the protesters! Here come the protesters!

You got it. With every war there must be a few good red-blooded liberals who are intent on utilizing their first amendment rights. This time however the 'Peace' protesters in Washington, D.C. are being anything but peaceful. Reports from the capital, substantiate that the protesters are attacking police, and have set a few police cars on fire. At this moment protesters somewhere are planning yet another anti-war rally to voice their opinions on the government. The theory behind these protests and their continual appearances in the major cities, is that during the Vietnam war the protesters of the Seventies were active for the whole war. The protests then were strong and they could not be ignored. But Bush already said that this is " Not another Vietnam." So onto our question. "What influence will the protesters of today have on the people and the government?"

The protests to this point have been a mixture of sizes and of points of view. The widely seen rallies have been anti-war rallies held in some of the nations major cities. But alongside those rallies were the anti-Bush and the rest of the government groups. With the protests so far we have seen some amounts of actual damage to properties. Here in Baltimore, for example, a building had it's front "redecorated". That is to say that a large group of protesters got onto the roof and dumped a few gallons of red paint down the face of the building. In San Francisco, protesters closed the Bay Bridge, due to the massive blocking of traffic. And in Boston, protesters were carried off to jail after blocking the entrances to many government office buildings. But here's the question of it all. WHY?

It's understood that the people have the right to express their differences with the world, and like Vietnam they can object to an aggressive manner of problem solving, but there's a new factor now. War has started. Like it or not. And unlike Vietnam, our troops who are there, are ALL VOLUNTEERS!

I'm sure that if you had signed up for one of the armed forces, you would have thought through the possibilities of war. However vague they may have seemed at the time of registering, the possibilities were there. Right now those men and women are over there fighting for America. Unlike Vietnam, there has not been a draft. No one has been forced out of their living rooms and into a tank. I don't doubt however, that many of those troops would like to be back on stateside. But they're there. Fighting for their pride in the ideals of our country. Instead of seeing reports that major cities back home are in chaos because of them, which is probably very unsettling, why not support their choice? The time for anti-war protests is over. It's time to support our volunteered troops. They don't need

Community gathers to celebrate King's Birthday

By: Laura Hopper

The Washington College and Chestertown community came together on Monday afternoon to celebrate the birthday of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. The program was organized by Ruth Shoge, the reference librarian at Miller Library.

Jacqueline Jefferson, Assistant Director of Buildings and Grounds at the College, welcomed the audience and introduced each speaker. The first speaker was Cynthia Fields-Bélanger who read from "A Time to Break Silence" by Dr. King. Delivered a year before his death, King spoke movingly about the Viet Nam war.

President Charles Trout read from "Letter from the Birmingham Jail" and called Dr King event making, and stated that "one day the nation will recognize its heroes." We mourn his loss, President Trout told the audience, but we celebrate his commitment.

The key address was delivered by Beatrice Fenner, Principal of the Henry Highland Garnett Elementary School in Chestertown. Ms Fenner outlined the background out of which Dr. King emerged to become the "dominant force in the civil rights movement." Ms. Fenner recalled her own involvement in the civil rights movement, and of being inspired by standing in Washington D.C. and hearing Dr. King tell the assembled that "I have dream." Ms. Fenner also spoke of her own desires for peace and the safe return of our troops in the Middle East.

Following Ms. Fenner's address, Dean Lucille Sansing spoke to the audience about Washington College's Committee on African-American History and Culture. The informal committee strives to acknowledge the contributions of "people of diversity" to American culture and history. The committee has arranged several upcoming events to meet this end including an exhibit of photographs from the early life of Frederick Douglas on the Eastern Shore, the new Spike Lee movie, and lectures by Elizabeth Clark Lewis, Daphne Duvall Harrison, and Brigadier General Clara Lewis.

Freshman class president Lionel Dyson read from "I See the Promised Land" which King delivered the day before his death on April 3, 1968. Karen Waters sang a spiritual, and the audience rose and sang "We shall overcome."

When asked about her participation in the program, Cynthia Fields-Bélanger said "every now and then, you look back in history and there's something there that makes you realize you're not alone." The passages she read from "A Time to break silence" dealt with the Viet Nam War and have a stark parallel today. Fields-Bélanger is very active in Amnesty International and finds Dr. King's work to be an important base, "new ideas have to come from someplace, what you need to find is a connection with the past."

SGA holds first meeting of the year

By: Laura Hopper

The Student Government Association of Washington College met held its first meeting of the semester on Tuesday, January 22. President Kevin Kelly called the meeting to order, and introduced Katie Simms as the second social chair. Simms had been abroad last semester.

Treasurer Brian Gimelson gave a summary of spending for last semester. The SGA spent $ 9105.73 in club funding and $ 7481.72 in social funding. He announced that the funding committee would meeting on Thursday from 2-7:30 P.M. Gimelson then proposed several allocations which the Senate passed. The first was $ 200 for the Christmas Dinner to go to the Dining Services. The Senate also approved $ 500 for Gene Hamilton to perform in the Coffee House on February 1. The SGA has been approached by the Wellness Awareness committee to sponsor a pick-pocket magician to perform in the Dining Hall and Coffee House next week, $ 400 were allocated; and finally, the Senate approved $ 100 for a full page ad in the spring Lacrosse book.

Social Chair Steve Heuttner reported that only 5 senators had returned their lists of bands from last semester. Of the bands listed, the Ramones appear to be the best choice since they are available and affordable. Several senators suggested other bands.

SCC chair Vicki Vahos reported that there are 6 cases waited to be heard by the SCC this semester. Secretary Jenny Albers reported that due to resignations, senators are needed to represent off campus and Cardinal.

Vice President Brooke Frank reported that Student Academic Board would be meeting soon, and would begin the preparation of State of the Major reports. Frank also gave the results of the recent All-Campus Judiciary hearing on Stuart Neiman. Neiman was suspended for the semester, and will be placed on disciplinary probation when he returns next semester.

President Kevin Kelly passed out a preliminary copy of the Cable T.V. survey. The survey inquires as to what the students would like to pay per room/per month, whether or not they feel that College should subsidize the costs and what the students would use Cable for most. Pending approval by Mariane Benninger, the students will be receiving the survey.

Kelly also nominated Debbie Smedhurst to replace R.J. Eldridge as head of the Conduct Screening Board. Smedhurst was approved by the Senate, and Jen del Niro was approved as Smedhurst's replacement as a member of the conduct screening board.

Finally, Kelly read two letters to the Senate. The first, from Dr. Susan Ross of Health Services, urged students to use the crosswalk when crossing 213 and to be careful. Ross wrote that she was concerned that students endanger their health by crossing in front of Minta Martin and the Literary House, and also by moving slowly in the crosswalk. The second letter, from President Trout, reinforced Ross's letter and stated that he too had seen students crossing 213 at the pace of a "lame snail."

Don't let Congress pull the plug on us as some are trying to do, we belong here to keep y'all safe."

In August, Susie Mazzullo received a letter from a friend stationed in Saudi Arabia. Andrew McDaniel is part of the 82nd Airborne Division. In August he wrote, "I can't wait to come home...Right now that seems a million miles away. I know that sounds sad but its true. I never thought I could feel this far from home with no end in sight. Right now they're saying six months if nothing happens. But if it does hit the fan it will happen quickly because people want to go kick his ass now and go home to the good ole U.S. of A. I know a lot of good men would be lost this way, but if we don't fight now, we will just have to do it later. And that will definitely cost us a whole lot more soldiers. It seems there's no real good solution to it. But I guess that's the way life is sometimes."

While the press and the "experts" debated what should be done about the situation in the Middle East, and while the United Nations passed resolution after resolution condemning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, life went on around here pretty much the way it always has.

The college went home for Christmas break. During the holidays, some members of the College community remembered our troops in the Persian Gulf and sent them Christmas cards. Freshman Susan Czechowski sent a Christmas card address to "Any Serviceperson" Lieutenant Corporal Lee Charpentier wrote back "You are absolutely right about how mail can cheer you up. I love getting mail, and you probably do too. Even when I was in the States, I was 850 miles from home. When I am 12,000 miles away, I can't even make a phone call. So mail is my only communication with home."

Senior English major Kyndra Ponder also sent Christmas cards to the Gulf. John Byrne serves on the Iwo Jima as a hospital corpsman. He wrote, "I've been in the Mid-East since August of last year. Things over here are going O.K. though it's very boring and nerve racking not knowing what's going to happen. The daily routine while at sea is never changing. We exercise in the morning and have combat readiness classes in the evening. Though no one wants war, we would like an end to the stalemate, one way or the other. At least then we would have set goals and priorities."

Many of the letters are sad or even bitter. They express a desire to come home, and frustration over many hours spent in a blazing desert 12,000 miles from home.

Our responsibility to act: war, community and commitment

By Erin Hodge-Williams and Erin Paige

We should be insulted our generation is nicknamed the "Lost Generation." The headlines we read are depressing and overwhelming: poverty, illiteracy, the homeless, drug abuse, violence, the environment, and now the war. Rather than choosing to sit at home and suffocate under a blanket of helplessness, many of today's college-age citizens are working to change what they can.

The sixties were thirty years ago. Announcing world problems or rallying is no longer a radical or effective movement. Instead, our generation has quietly propelled itself into motion. In soup kitchens, day-care centers, inner city schools, hospitals, drop-in centers, people of all ages are each volunteering as little as two hours a week, and making a difference. We should not tolerate being called "lost" merely because our voices are quiet. We operate individually, not as a collective mob, and consequently our efforts tend to be overlooked.

The war has shifted our attention away from issues here in the United States. Nobody wants to remember the elderly, or a recycling program when they can turn on the television and watch on-the-scene coverage of the Persian Gulf. Watching television can amplify feeling helpless and leave us all with the question, "what can I do here?" Other than joining the Red Cross, as one Washington College student considered, individual efforts might feel ineffective. They aren't. Individuals on campus are arranging debates, awareness meetings, teach-ins, a blood drive, vigils. If you choose not to participate, at least remain aware of these efforts. Other options are to write letters or mail packages to soldiers in the Gulf (to: Any Soldier / Operation Desert Shield / USCENTAF - IN / A PO NY 09852).

The war will end, and we need to by prepared. Until we learn to solve the problems among ourselves in this country, the problems we solve outside will mean less. If more of our peers involve themselves in their communities, our voice as a generation will be influential. Our educations cannot stop at the classroom door because "solutions" are not taught within those doors.

Hands Out is a new Washington College program designed to support individuals with an interest in their community. Hands Out wants to draw together all members of the college (students, faculty, staff, and organizations) into a collective organization. The program can inform students who don't know where their service is needed, offer support and generate enthusiasm for anyone who wants to organize a volunteer project, all in an effort to link the college to the Chestertown community. Anyone who is interested in the community, or volunteering, should realize they can play a significant role in directing the course of the Hands Out program. Career Development is temporarily serving as the base, and all are encouraged to stop by. In addition, Hands Out members will be at the Wellness Expo distributing pamphlets of local services needing volunteers.

What do you think of the anti-war protests?

"I believe that the people protesting are only looking out for human life. Our policy makers especially George Bush seem to feel that protest will have no effect. I think that anti-war protesters will be blamed as being unpatriotic when all the really want is peace. I think some people in the armed forces will be upset be the protests, but I think that others may feel the protesters are the only part of the American public looking out for them."

Suzanne Groner
Freshman
Baltimore, MD

"It's our generation that is going to die, I don't believe that my friends and other young men should have to go to war for economic reasons. It makes me cry when I see the coverage on television. It will certainly have a long lasting effect on the armed forces personnel serving in the Gulf. The loss of life could be so great, not just those people in the armed forces but also civilians."

Cindi DeWaters
Freshman
Kingsville, MD

"It's okay to be in favor of peace and to protest the war for the casualties, but I think that as Americans we should support our troops. Our troops are at the mercy of our government. I think they need to know that their lives are valued. Anti-war protesters are only stirring up bad feelings. There is a lot of talk about these protesters but we need to remember that they are only about one percent of the U. S. population. I do not think they have much of an effect on anything."

Anna M. Herrmann
Freshman
Kirkwood, PA

"At this point the protesting has been fairly low key. People are more concerned (and rightly so), with the safety of our troops than they are with ending the war. I think this will change when boys start coming home in body bags. Personally, I don't believe in this war. I can not support our justification for being over there. I feel it is important to let the troops know that being anti-war is not the same as being anti-soldier. I respect and pray for the troops and wish them a safe, quick return home.

Caitlin D. Bell-Hicken
Freshman
Baltimore, MD.

"I believe the protesting is absolutely ridiculous, not only will it have no effect on the decision-maker, but it also helps decrease the moral of those fighting the war. It has a terrible effect and it is only negative."

"I sympathize with the passion behind anti-war protests but what do they really accomplish ? The decision has been made for U.S. involvement by the President and by a majority vote in Congress. If you wanted to protest anything it should have been done beforehand. Now we have to support our troops because they want to come home just as badly as we want them to."

Poll Results:

Students support the military action in the Gulf

By: Susie Mazzullo

A poll in last Sunday's USA Today showed that 76% of all Americans support the President's decision to attack the Iraqis last Wednesday. 16% of all Americans oppose this decision. The poll that was published this past Sunday shows that support for the President is up 1% from before the decision to attack was made. Opposition to the President's Middle East policy is down 2%.

Tuesday evening, the Elm conducted their own poll to see how the college community compares to the rest of the nation in their reaction to the Persian Gulf Crisis/War. The poll was taken inside the dining hall during dinner hours. Results show that feelings here in Chestertown are the same as those of citizens all over the country. According to the poll, 76% of all Washington College students support the U.S military involvement in the Gulf and 24% do not. Some of the reasons that were stated as to why a student chose a particular side are as follows:

In support of military involvement-

"I support the U.S. involvement because part of living in the greatest contry on the planet is helping maintain order."

"People do not realize the important effort of our country for peace and what it represents."

"Ethically speaking, we couldn't do anything else."

"I think it is about time that the U.N. is given some real power so that in the future we can fight our wars in its chambers instead of in the field."

"How can you not support the soldiers when they are saving our lives?"

"Nuke 'em!"

"It's too late not to. Those men and women are in the midst of combat. Their safety is my only concern. The time for philosophizing is passed."

"Kuwait deserves freedom like ours."

"This is not Vietnem, this is a maniac on the loose that needs to be put in his place."

"I support it to the point that I will be going to fight with the Marines."

Against military involvement-

"There is no reason to donate blood of any nation, for oil of any nation."

"We have enough problems here at home. We cannot continue to solve everyone else's."

"I find it very interesting that the United States feels the need to protect the people (or

In the world: War in the Gulf; Crackdown in the Baltics

ISREAL:

A Scud missile hit a residential neighborhood in Tel Aviv killing 3 people and injuring 70 others. The Scud apparently missed being hit by two Patriot missiles fired to intercept it. Speculation has already begun as to why the Patriot missiles were unable to down the incoming Scud. Some reports said they were manned by Isreali military personnel still learining to use the equipment properly, while others maintain the Patriot fired was of the older variety, and not the new state of the art version.

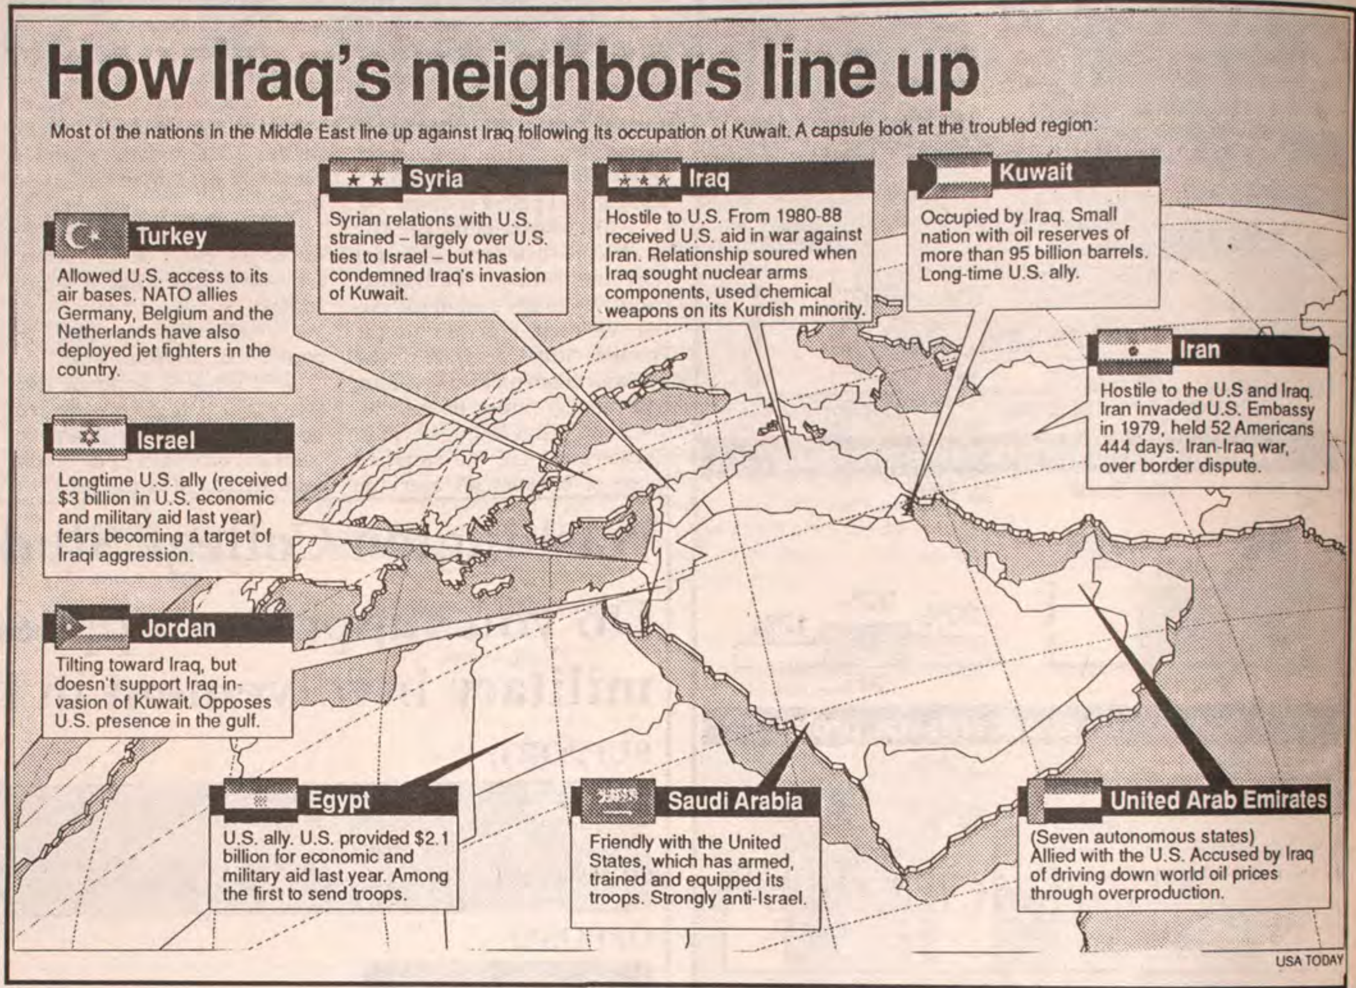
This latest attack is the third Iraqi attack on Isreal in a week. Tuesday searchers continued to dig trough debris for survivors. Although the goverment did not react immediately after the attack, the pressure for Isreali military reaction is mounting in a nation where military self-reliance is of extreme importance. Only discussions with the U.S. and the deployment of additional Patriot missiles convinced the Isrealis to refrain from retaliation after the first two attacks.

SAUDI ARABIA:

U.S. and Arab military officials have said that the Iraqis are preparing for a ground attack by Allied forces by repositioning their front line and setting Kuwaiti oil fields ablaze. Also, Iraqis Scud attacks on Dhahran and Riyadh, including the first daylight attack early Tuesday morning, continued. All the incoming missiles were shot down by Patriot missiles of fell harmlessly in unpopulated areas or the Persian Gulf. No one was reported injured, but a large piece of debris from an exploded missile fell on a street in Riyadh causing some damage. The threat of Iraqi Scud missiles has not yet been eliminated, but officials from both the U.S. and Saudi Arabia seem to believe that there are enough Patriot missiles to meet the threat.

SOVIET UNION:

Gorbachev denied Tuesday night that he ordered ttoop attacks in two Baltic capitals , and maintained he had not abandoned his move toward democracy, freedom of the press and a market economy. "Neither domestic nor foreign policy has undergone changes." Gorbachev said. He also siad that foreign criticism was "reminiscent of the ideological warfare of the the past," and based on a misunderstanding of Soviet policy. Gorbachev read a statement in which he declared: "the developments in Vilnius and Riga are by no means expressions of the policy of presidential power. Therefore I resolutely reject all suspicions and salnder on the score." He also said the attacks on the Lithuanian broadcast facilities on January 13 and the Latvian police headquarters a week later were not ther result of "mythical orders from higher authorities." In the meantime the Baltic statescontinue to ask the U.S. and the United Nations for assistence in dealing with what they perceive to be a communist crackdown.



How Iraq's neighbors line up

Most of the nations in the Middle East line up against Iraq following its occupation of Kuwait. A capsule look at the troubled region:

Turkey
Allowed U.S. access to its air bases. NATO allies Germany, Belgium and the Netherlands have also deployed jet fighters in the country.

Syria
Syrian relations with U.S. strained – largely over U.S. ties to Israel – but has condemned Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

Iraq
Hostile to U.S. From 1980-88 received U.S. aid in war against Iran. Relationship soured when Iraq sought nuclear arms components, used chemical weapons on its Kurdish minority.

Kuwait
Occupied by Iraq. Small nation with oil reserves of more than 95 billion barrels. Long-time U.S. ally.

Iran
Hostile to the U.S and Iraq. Iran invaded U.S. Embassy in 1979, held 52 Americans 444 days. Iran-Iraq war, over border dispute.

Israel
Longtime U.S. ally (received $3 billion in U.S. economic and military aid last year) fears becoming a target of Iraqi aggression.

Jordan
Tilting toward Iraq, but doesn't support Iraq invasion of Kuwait. Opposes U.S. presence in the gulf.

Egypt
U.S. ally. U.S. provided $2.1 billion for economic and military aid last year. Among the first to send troops.

Saudi Arabia
Friendly with the United States, which has armed, trained and equipped its troops. Strongly anti-Israel.

United Arab Emirates
(Seven autonomous states) Allied with the U.S. Accused by Iraq of driving down world oil prices through overproduction.

to hear that we hated their choice to serve our country. On the contrary, they need to hear that we SUPPORT their choice to defend the United States and all the peaceful ideals it holds. The anti-war protests have no doubt brought the attention of the governments of the war but I believe that it's Saddam Hussein who's happy to see it not Bush. George Bush and the troops need our support. Without it, well, what would you do if your country hated your being in a war zone. You'd be there to protect all the people who would be despising you. Point is they need our constant support. Ifd you agree with Bush or don't agree with him that's fine, everyone has the right to hold their own opinion. But by voicing it now when the countries' support is needed, will do anything but aid the situation. I think the Ohio State Students said it best, "USA ALL THE WAY".

These cities are having financial problems as it is, and don't need the extra strain of paying overtime to hundreds of extra officers to handle protestors. Drugs and crime are still problems in our cities and police presence should be "on the beat" helping to control violence instead of on the streets keeping protestors in check.

A comedy of errors in the Middle East (the fiction)

Phil "Slice"Macek

It's time once again for another thrilling episode of everybody's favorite Middle Eastern soap opera, The Edge of Wetness. In today's episode, we find our three main characters: the studly womanizer, George Bush; the ruthless, revenge seeking Saddam Hussein; and the penniless, vodka swilling Mikhail Gorbachev, on their way to a very crucial meeting to determine the fate of the free world.

If you'll remember from last week, we found out that George and Saddam, at birth, were really Siamese twins joined at the buttocks. Luckily, their mother, Margaret Thatcher, gave her approval for a risky operation to separate the two boys, and today they lead perfectly normal lives. Meanwhile, Gorbachev had recently returned from Hawaii, where he had ended his short-lived love affair with Corazon Aquino. She demanded that Mikhail have Raisa killed off by the world's most dangerous assassin, Dr. Gillin, so they can get married and live happily ever after. Finally, we find Dan Quayle suffering from the severe trauma of finding out that he is gay and desperately hoping that he can conceal his true tendencies, so that he can remain on the high school basketball team and still shower with the guys after practice. His ultimate dream is to be pinned to a sophomore named Chip.

We pick up today episode as the three leaders are sitting in a bar, discussing world events over pitchers of Schlitz beer.

Saddam: Comrade George, if you do not let me take Barbara to the Birthday Ball at Washington College I will uphold my promise to attack Israel.

George: But Saddam, she's my wife; and it wouldn't be prudent to let her go out with another man. But I think Millie is free that night.

Saddam: Shut up funny man! Or I will fire my Scud missiles where the sun don't shine.

Mikhail: Gentlemen please, stop all this arguing. We need more beer, and as you well know I have no money.

George: Relax fellas. This one's on me. Oh waiter, I want you to bring us a pitcher of beer every seven minutes until someone passes out, then bring one every ten minutes. O.K.? Here' s a little something for your trouble (hands a dime and a piece of paper saying in red letters "Bush for You in '92—reelect George." to the waiter).

Mikhail: But George, how much good is getting drunk going to do us?

George: I don't know about you Mikey, but I'm sick and tired of looking at that funky red tattoo on your head while I'm sober.

Mikhail: You insensitive boob! That is a birthmark and no fault of my own.

George: Pipe down Mikey, or I won't let you play Risk later with me and Saddam in the Oval office.

Mikhail: But you promised!

George: I know I did, but you promised me that we were gonna go see the Hunt for Red October and Rocky IV double feature at the Moscow drive-in last week. But no, you insisted on going sledding up at Camp David with Barbara. So why should I keep my promise, you potato eater?

Saddam: Please gentlemen, can we get back to the reason for this meeting?

George: Forget it Saddam, I'm not letting you go out with Barbara.

Saddam: No, the other reason

George: Oh that's right, the damn war.

Mikhail: What war?

Saddam: No concern of yours comrade

Mikhail: Oh well, in that case I'm gonna go throw some darts and chase some skirts. I'll see you mugs later.

George: Now look Saddam, it's about time we ended this little disagreement of ours, don't you think?

Saddam: Not until you hook me up with Barbara. What a woman! So firm, so round so fully packed!

George: Not gonna do it Saddam. And if you insist in occupying Kuwait I'll have my troops work up a number 6 on you.

Saddam: Number 6? I'm afraid I'm not familiar with that.

George: That's we go a ridin' into town, a whoppin' and a whumpin' every living thing that moves within an inch of its life. Except for the women folk of course.

Saddam: You spare the women folk?

George: No, we get them stinking drunk and then take them to the Number 6 dance later on that night. Come on Saddam, there has to be a way to end this stupid war. I've a sagging economy that needs attention and I can't afford to chase your narrow little butt all over the Middle East.

Saddam: Well, there might be one tiny way to make me forget about Kuwait.

George: Just name your price. Hey waiter! can I get a bourbon and water over here? my throat's a little parched.

Saddam: I want to see the great American game of football.

George: Is that it? You want to see some big overpaid dumb guys fight over an inflated piece of leather.

Saddam: More than anything in the world.

George: O.K. I've got the perfect game; we'll go see the New England PATRIOTS play. How does that sound?

Saddam: Patriots? No way George. If you're gonna be that way about it forget it. I go back to my original proposal— taking Barbara to the Birthday Ball.

George: No way, Can I get another hot dog over here please? And bring some extra nachos too.

Saddam: George, want to try some of my broccoli dip? It's really quite delicious.

George: Shut up fat man. Listen dummy, it's pretty obvious that we're getting nowhere with these talks. Let's get out of this hole and hunt down some action. I hear there's a party in Cardinal tonight.

Saddam: Hey look! Check out Mikhail busting a move on that chick over there.

George: That's what I mean Saddam, let's get out this creep joint and hit the party scene.

Saddam: You can go hit the scene George, I'll go keep Barbara warm; maybe give her a foot massage.

George: Come on Saddam, let's go play air hockey.

Saddam: No, I think I'm gonna go invade Turkey.

George: All right man, catch you later. Hey Mikhail! Wait up!

As the three leaders leave the bar, the world wonders what the outcome of the war will be. Stayed tuned next week, when we find Dan Quayle asking Saddam Hussein, "Won't you please fire your Scud missile at me?"

tions that have been going on in the last week from those opposed to the War, I have yet to hear any logical statement of what can be done to end it. If someone is so intent on making things better, protests just don't seem to be the most effective way of bringing about that change. If things are ever going to improve and this war is going to end, we need those people who stand for peace to work from the inside to change the system, or at least offer solutions to the problems instead of creating new ones.

The Anti-War demonstrators, while they may be "standing for something", and consequently be worthy of praise (at least according to the lessons that Mom and Dad have taught to me over the last 20 years), but in terms of offering any solutions or even presenting their arguments in rational ways, they have failed to earn my true respect or my support. Maybe Mom and Dad aren't right, but I think that there is a lot of merit in their conservative beliefs.

Hoops: Conference games bruise the Shoremen

by Matt Giller

The WAC started Conference play last week with losses to Johns Hopkins 74-65, Swarthmore 65-59, and Ursinus 69-66.

Last Wednesday night the Shoremen (4-11, 0-4) went on the road where they have yet to win to face the Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins.

During the first half of action, the Jays and the Sho'men virtually traded baskets the entire twenty minutes. The two teams went into the locker room with the Jays leading 34-33. At the mid-point, Sophomore pivotman Darren Vican and freshman guard Geoff Rupert led the WAC scoring with 10 and 12 points respectively.

In the second half, however, Hopkins controlled the action by scoring the first six points, increasing their lead to the largest of the game at that point to 40-34. The Blue Jays later stretched their lead to 46-35.

The two teams traded bucketsuntil, with the score 52-44, the WAC went on a small seven point scoring run. Sophomore captain Peter Basel scored five of those points to get them within one point of the Jays.

However, Hopkins matched the Shoremen streak to make the score 59-51 with 7:33 remaining in the show.

A Basel three-pointer with4:41 remaining cut the Hopkins lead to four, 63-59. But the more experienced Jays were able to fend off any Shoremen lat threats to pull out an important conference "W."

Vican led the way for the WAC scoring 18 points and pulling down seven rebounds. Guards Basel and Rupert had 15 and 14 points respectively, while junior Tim Liddy contributed with his usual consistent play and ten points.

Last Saturday night the WAC went on the road again to play a much-improved Swarthmore squad (10-7, 3-0).

This game had the same k as the Hopkins game as both teams traded baskets up until the halftime horn sounded. With the Sho'men leading 25-24 with 5:07 left in the first half, both teams put on their defensive shoes. Not a point was scored for the next 4:42 until Washington's floor general Allen Lester scored a layup with :25 remaining. Swarthmore knotted the score 27-27 by converting a three-point play with one tick left on the clock.

Swarthmore opened the second half with a layup to gain the lead and hold onto it for the remainder of the game. Swarthmore stretched their lead to fourteen, 48-34 with ten minutes left. They remained at least ten points ahead of the Sho'men for the next 6:30 until a Basel three-point bomb hit its target to trim the lead to 54-46.

While the home team was struggling to hold on to victory, the WAC scrapped to make it a six point contest with just 1:38 when Lester sank a lay up making the score 58-52 in Swarthmore's favor. However, the Shoremen were unable to scalpel into their lead any further.

Basel and Lester dominated the Sho'men scoring by pouring in 19 and 17 points respectively. Vican ripped down 15 boards while tallying 8 points.

The Shoremen hosted its first conference game of the season against Ursinus College Tuesday night in the "Cain Cave."

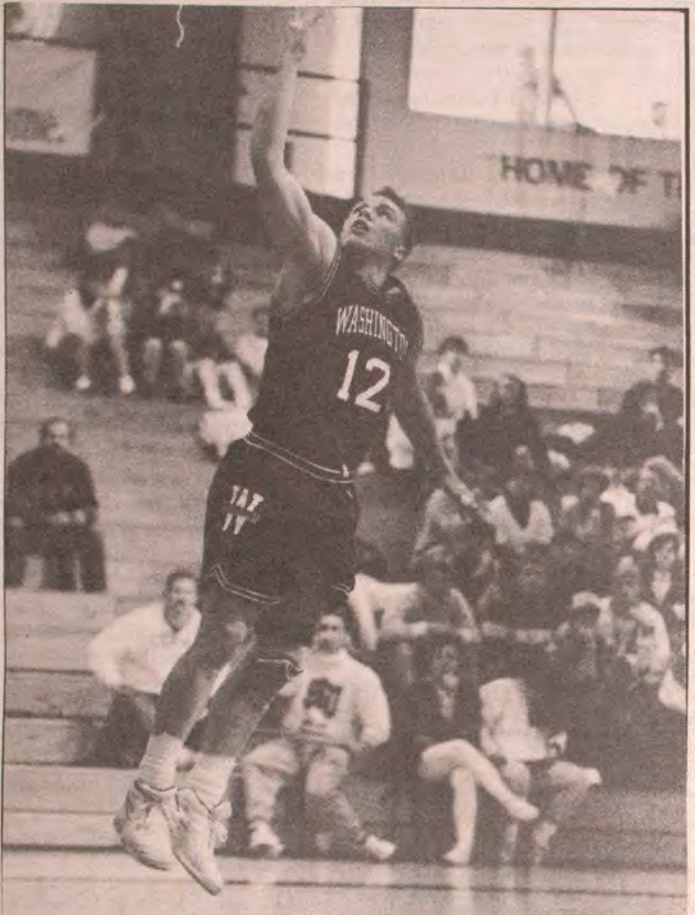
The WAC was not very hospitable early on as they took a 26-20 halftime lead. They increased their margin to ten, 39-29, five minutes into the second half.

However, with 1:43 left in the game, Ursinus took its first lead, 52-51 by Andy Lesher's one of six three-point shots. Vican's lay up put the WAC back on top with 1:17 left.

Ursinus had the ball, down 56-54 when William Briggs(no relation to W.C.'s outstanding math teacher) traveled with :25 remaining on the clock. Freshman Greg Rogers was sent to free-throw line where he made one of two to increase their lead to 57-54. Lesher(29 points) of Ursinus ruined the homecoming by sending the game into overtime with one of his many three-point bombs. Ursinus took advantage of their opportunity by pulling out a heartbreaking victory over the WAC.

Basel again led all WAC scorers with 19 points, while Vican contributed with 16 of his own and 11 rebounds.

The next home tip-off is this Saturday night at 7:30 against MAC Conference foe Haverford College.



With the Shoreman in the midst of a five game slump, Allen Lester looks to the heavens for answers. They will have a chance to get back on track tomorrow at 7:30 vs. Haverford in the Cain Gymnasium.

Swim team: women trimmed by Dickinson

Washington's women's swimteam lost a heartbreaker last weekend in their home natatorium by falling to a tough Dickinson College squad 105-99.

The W.C. women almost pulled off a major MAC upset against a team that finished last year's season ranked fifth in the conference.

The Shorewomen were up by as much as 15 points mid-way through the meet but couldn't hold off their strong competitor.

All-American Kasey Carroll led the group with three firsts. She broke her team record in the 200 IM and swam to two season best swims in the 500 and 1000 Freestyle. Co-captain Sam Streamer added important first and second place finishes in the 50 Freestyle and 100 Freestyle respectively.

Freshman Mimi Devlin continued to add valuable points by winning the 200 Butterfly and placing second in the 200 Freestyle.

Streamer and Devlin joined Jennifer Green and Leslie Newcomb for second place in the 400 Medley Relay. Green added second place points in the 200 Backstroke, while Newcomb contributed greatly with an impressive second place finish in the 200 Breastroke and third place in the 200 IM.

Freshman Magdalena Fuchs had her best meet of the season with MAC qualifying times in the 50 Freestyle and 100 Freestyle. The 100 Freestyle placed her fourth on the all-time W.C. list of official times. She joined Green, junior Karen "Boom Boom" Brady and Kristen Callazzo for a second place finish in the 400 Freestyle relay. Callazzo also had season bests in the 50 and 100 Freestyle while qualifying for the MACs in the 50 Free.

Other good swims were turned in by Brady in the 500 and 1000 Freestyle. Senior Vickie Vahos turned in quality times in the 200 Backstroke and 00 Freestyle. Ramsey Bingham(200 Freestyle), Kelly Loftus(200 Breastroke), Karen Prendergast(200 IM) and Joan Colton(200 Butterfly) all performed well for the WAC.

Coach Kim Lessard was extremely pleased with the effort of her young team. "It was a very exciting meet," Lessard commented after. "I never expected us to be ahead by as much as fifteen points after the 200 Butterfly. The girls swam extremely well and have proven they will be in the pack at the MAC championships in February!"

The women's next home meet is tomorrow afternoon at 1:00 against Hood College.

WC sponsors Wellness Awareness Week

Washington College's Presidential Advisory Council on Lifetime Fitness will sponsor its second annual Wellness Awareness Week, January 27 - February 1, 1991. Designed to focus awareness on physical and mental health and well-being among students, faculty and employees as well as for the community, Wellness Awareness Week will include lectures, presentations, displays, and a popular, day-long Wellness Expo Wednesday, January 30.

The week of the events begins Sunday, January 27 with a 3-kilometer "Frostbite Run" organized by the recreational sports department. The run is set for 1 p.m. starting at the front of the Cain Gymnasium. On Monday, January 28, the college's Health Services Department will sponsor a lecture on relationships, "Love Entanglements," by psychologist Bruce Hutchinson, at 4 p.m. in the New Casey Academic Center.

Tuesday, January 29 has been designated "Nutrition Awareness Day," and information about nutrition and eating habits will be displayed in the college's dining hall. On Wednesday, January 30, the Wellness Expo will be set up in the college's Hynson Lounge. A popular event last year, the Expo will once again feature displays and handouts, mental and physical health assessments and evaluations, and scientific analysis of body composition and nutrition. The Expo will be held from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. January 30.

Thursday, January 31 will be "Substance Free Day." At 9 p.m., following a talk on the outlook for the economy by columnist Julius Westheimer, the Student Center in the Dining Hall will sponsor a special performance of "The Magic Comedy Pickpocket Show" by magician John Frajance. There will also be a Yoga workshop at 2:30 p.m. in Cain Gymnasium, and the college's Christian Fellowship will hold an open house at 7 p.m. in the Caroline Dormitory.

Wellness Awareness Week ends on Friday, February 1 with a workshop on "Exercises and Care for the Lower Back," at noon in the Casey Academic Center, and a "Walk Off the Job" health walk for all college employees at 2 p.m. In addition to scheduled events, there will be video and computer programs on nutrition, birth control and AIDS, all week long in the dining center and Cain Gymnasium, and the Washington College Rowing Teams will be rowing around the clock in an effort to beat the World Rowing Record in the Hall of Fame Room in the Cain Gymnasium.

All events are free and the public is encouraged to attend. For information about any of the events during Wellness Awareness Week, phone the college at (301) 778-2800, ext. 231 or ext. 402.

Travelling with the Blues Traveller

by Raphael Koster

Blues Traveler, "Blues Traveler". A & M Records. Produced by Justin Niebank

In beginning this review, let's get the superlatives out of the way early: Amazing. Brilliant. Incredible, fantastic, magical. Virtuoso. All these can describe the harmonica playing of John Popper, the front man for Blues Traveler. Unless you have heard the album, or the first single, "But Anyway," you have no idea just how good this man is on his chosen instrument. But now that these adjectives are out of the way, let's look at the virtues of the band that calls itself Blues Traveler.

The reason for the name is immediately evident. This group can be described as a garage rock band with blues licks in guitar and harmonica grafted on. The most clearly blues-influenced song is "Warmer Days," which sounds much like the kind of blues you rarely hear anymore: the instrumental pauses reminiscent of Bo Diddley, the piano with its Ray Charles licks, the classic blues ending, and of course Popper's harmonica taking over what would ordinarily be a guitar solo. This is a band much given to three-minute instrumental interludes, to improvisatory solos.

Given the rough and ready approach the band has to their music, the comparison with your typical roots rock band is inevitable. When the harmonica is absent, that is what Blues Traveler sounds like; the actual musical sensibility of the group seems not to be rooted as firmly in the blues as they would like to have us believe. Not a single song is in a traditional blues format. The music is refreshing, driving enough to satisfy those who want grittier rock than the glam-rock bands produce. The producer, Justin Niebank, wisely stays away from over-production, and as a result, not a synth is heard on the whole album. The list of guests is likewise minimal, including only a piano on one song, a sax on another, and some backing vocals.

Lyrically, the songs display a marked pessimism, in fact a cynicism that fits the musical style of the band. Take the first verse of "Gotta Get Mean," by three of the band members: "In this vale of toil and sin/ You're stuck in a race that you just can't win/ Take a look around and it's so obscene/ But's that's the way it is". The songs tackle existential fatalism, as in the song "100 Years"- tions raised at the previous meeting could be answered. Approximately fifty students attended, along with some members of the faculty and also the President and Mrs. Trout. The panel consisted of four faculty members: Dr. Tahir Shad, Dr. Edward Weissman, Mr. Kenneth Wantling, and Dr. Stephen Cades. Dr. George Shivers, Professor of Spanish, organized the forum so that the professors on the panel could share their knowledge with those present and hopefully clear up some of the questions that students have concerning the Middle East situation.

Dr. Cades, Associate Professor of Sociology, began by introducing the members of the panel and explaining the purpose of the forum. He said that he hoped the panel would answer any questions that the students had and in particular the questions why we were there in the first place and why war was the only way out for us.

Dr. Weissman, Associate Professor of Political Science, spoke next on the colonial history of the Middle East. It is necessary to understand the history, he explained, as it is the key to understanding what is now happening there.

Dr. Weissman gave a short history lesson on the Middle East from the end of World War I when the area was undergoing a major change. The Ottoman Empire was at the end of its reign, as it had backed the wrong side in the war, and the countries that used to be under its rule were now British mandates. Dr. Weissman gave an account of the history up until Saddam Hussein's rise to power.

Dr. Shad who is a specialist on Middle Eastern affairs, spoke next and in his presentation he covered the Pan Arab Movement, the economic trouble of Iraq following their war with Iran and he then gave a few prediction of his own on post war Persian Gulf. His presentation differed from that of Dr. Weissman in that he viewed more on the country of Iraq and Saddam Hussein and the problems he has encountered recently. Dr. Shad also tried to explain why Hussein believes the way he does. According to Shad, it is a result of political socialization and the kind of political world that surrounded him as he was growing up and maturing.

Shad's post war predictions included that there would be military presence in the Middle East for a while to come, whether it be the United States or another nation. His reason for this was that when Hussein is defeated, there won't be a powerful leader in the area such as Hussein has been. Military power will be needed in order to maintain order. Shad also predicted that the war would only last approximately five weeks if the allied troops didn't move into Iraq, once liberating Kuwait.

Dr. Cades then spoke about the Jews and the Arabs and Palestine and Israel and the conflicts that they share. He also attempted to explain why Hussein wanted to bring Israel into the war and how that intervention could harm the coalition forces.

Mr. Wantling, Assistant Professor of Math and Sciences, spoke last. Although Mr. Wantling isn't a specialist on Middle East affairs, he does know quite a bit about the region, mostly from personal experience. He spent his high school years in Beirut, Lebanon and therefore gave a westerner's point of view on the war. His main point was that it was important to understand the culture and the interrelationships of the area in order to understand the politics. He recommended that if further interested, those attending the forum should read the novel, From Beirut to Jerusalem as "it gives the best perspective on how Palestinians and Arabs think".

Once each professor completed his initial presentation, the floor was opened up for questions. Most of the questions centered around the topic of why are we there and what possibly would have happened if the United Stated had failed to get involved. The members of the panel answered questions as long as there were any. Not every question could be answered but at least those present left with a greater understanding of the situation.

Although not as many people attended the forum held this past Monday as did the first one, many questions were asked and an abundance of information was given. No one can say what the future will bring, but at least with forums and discussions such as these we can begin to understand what is going on in the world around us and maybe one day prevent a similar crisis from happening, like the one in the Middle East.

Blues

a list of daily occurrences that "won't mean a thing in 100 years...", and the simple crudity of human nature ("Sweet Talking Hippie"). If these songs had been recorded by a different group, there would be no trouble is accepting them as part of the punk movement's lyrical anarchy.

The album clocks in at just short of an hour, which is rare in these days of the 46 minute LP. If you want to just sit and marvel at instrumental brilliance, then John Popper's harmonica is definitely for you. If this man had done this on guitar, we would be hailing him as the next wizard. Instead, his guitar playing, and that of the lead guitarist, Chan Kinchla, is workmanlike, and often influenced by speed metal's frantic playing of simple riffs. This is definitely not an album for the R&B ballad fans, unless they enjoy catching a glimpse of what their favorite music originally came from.

All in all, Blues Traveler needs to show some growth before they fulfill the potential of their style and most particularly their harmonica player. Maybe if the bassist, Bobby Sheehan, had something to do, and if the musicians learned to ignore a few of the more commercial influences (the hard rock sound just doesn't fit the music), they'd have really hit on something magical. Give them a few years, and they could be the next Allman Brothers: a successful reworking of blues and roots rock motifs for the 90's.

SGA gives spring funding

By: Susie Mazzullo

This past Monday, the SGA held its weekly meeting. The subject of this meeting was spring funding. A total of $20, 185. 00 was requested by various clubs and organizations. The SGA awarded a total of $15, 950.00. The following received funding:

Amnesty International- $500, Campus Christian Fellowship- $200, Chess Club- $300, Cooking Club- $600, French Club- $300, German Club- $700, Hands Out Program- $100, Historical Society- $500, International House- $1250, International Relations- $800, Mystic Harold- $100, Newman- $400, Otherworlds & Tranations Magazine- $250, Phi Delta Theta- $1250, Omicron Delta Kappa- $250, Phi Sigma Tau- $1000, Psychology Club- $450, Roll Playing Club- $100, Rugby- $1000, Sailing Team- $900, Sigma Delta Pi- $550, Society of 12- $300, Society of the Sciences- $550, Spanish Club- $650, Visual Artists' Union- $700, Wac Happenings- $500, and the Young Democrats- $500.

Treasurer, Brian Gimelson commented on the funding meeting. "I'm happy with the results of the funding meeting. We got requests for over $20,000.00 in organizational funding with less then $13,000.00 to spend. Considering that clubs on average spend only 2/3 of their funds, the Student Government Association will be in good shape for next year."

The Cable questionaire was also distributed at the meeting.

SCC holds hearings on theft

By: Laura Hopper

The Student Conduct Council of Washington College met on Wednesday night, January 30 in the Academic Resource Center. The SCC heard five cases involving students of Washington College.

The first case involved a student charged with attempted theft from the snack bar. The student was accused of attempting to leave the snack bar without paying for the food ordered. The student was found not responsible because of lack of evidence.

The second and third cases involved students who failed to complete twenty hours of community service as assigned by the SCC last semester. The students, Joseph Cronin and Janiero Hernandez were both assigned additional hours of community service to be administered under the auspices of Student Affairs, and will remain on Disciplinary Probation pending the comple-

Flato's "Quick and dirty interviewing techniques"

By: Kevin Decker and Susie Mazzullo

"Quick and dirty interview techniques" was the topic of conversation at a lecture hosted by the Center for Career Development.

Mr. John Flato was the guest speaker for the evening and gave some timely advice for Seniors and students seeking a summer internship. Mr. Flato is a graduate of Washington College ('69) and is currently Manager, Employee Relations for Allied Corporation, where he regularly interviews perspective employees. He graduated from W.C. with a B.A. in sociology. He then went on to get his masters in higher education from Catholic University in D.C. and his MBA from Loyola College in Baltimore. He also lectures in Personnel Management at Johns Hopkins.

Mr. Flato began his speech by warning those who will be out in the working field very soon that times are tough. "Cherish every moment you have in college," he says. As one reads headlines "Fewer Jobs for College Grads" and regularly reads of lay-offs, mergers, and shutdowns, one is haunted by feelings of uncertainty and anxiety. It is even more important, according to Flato, that all of those going into the job market today be practiced in the art of interviewing. "It's all a matter of preparation."

Even when the job market is good, being prepared for an interview is very important. Mr. Flato quoted that most people change jobs approximately ten times during their lives and that they change careers three to five times.

Interviews are generally a scanning device used to follow up on the information in the resume. According to Flato, who does most of the hiring for his company, the interviewer looks for three things when he is interviewing a potential employee. These are, can that person do the job, will they have the motivation to do the job, and will that person fit in the organization and style of the company.

To help those going out into the job market achieve what is necessary to have a successful interview, Flato described his fifteen "quick and dirty" interviewing techniques. They are as follows:

1. Research the company. Plato says that you should always have a general understanding of the company before you go to the interview. Interviewers don't want to have to explain the nature of the business to you, you should be aware of the nature of the company; what it does, subsidiaries, etc.

2. Research the profession. Know about the profession you are being interviewed for. The applicant should try to get some idea of the position from occupation handbooks or other sources. Interviewers are usually more impressed with someone who has taken the time to find this background information.

3. Sell accomplishments and skills. "Sell yourself," he said. The worst thing that could happen, he said, was when you left an interview wishing that the interviewer had only asked you about that one thing you are really good at. Mr. Flato said that you must take the initiative to describe what you have done over and above average. Don't wait to be asked.

4. Know what you want to do and set realistic goals. "You must be focused," he said. Sending long distance resumes are not necessary. It isn't any more successful to send resumes haphazardly. He calls this the "shot gun approach" and warns against it. He also warns against getting pushed into a direction that you don't necessarily want to go. There are tests available at the Career Center on campus that can reveal talents and capabilities. Knowing what appeals to you in terms of careers and also what doesn't is very important.

5. Practice possible questions and answers. Practice with your roommates or anyone you can find. Mr. Flato also told of software that is now available for this purpose. "Know thyself," he said. He stressed that it is necessary to know your strengths and weaknesses but when telling about the weaknesses, turn them to a positive statement such as, "but I'm working on that." Don't ever by negative. "People don't want to hear other people's problems."

6. Be observant about company culture. During your time at the interview, observe the attire in the company, whether they are friendly or not, the cafeteria, if cars are there past closing and anything else you can. Mentioning these during the interview will show that you are interested in the company and will also let you get a feel for whether you will indeed fit in at this company. "Be a sponge," he said.

7. Find hot buttons. "If there are a few pictures of sailboats and a sailboat model on the desk, chances are the guy likes sailboats." Plato says that a good ice-breaker would be to mention sailboats if you know anything about them but he warns against getting in over your head. "Don't look stupid and you must be genuine." He also said that putting hobbies and activities on the resume is a good idea. "It's all part of the entire consciousness."

8. How to handle salaries and benefits properly. "It's not ever a good idea to ask 'how many sick days are given the first year' as your first question, " Mr. Plato warns. This could make the interviewer think that you used them frequently. Salary is an important subject because most benefits are based on your range of salary. Going into an interview it is important to know the range that you would like to see your salary in. The College Placement Council produces a paper quarterly that surveys various industries and will contain current salary levels. The Career Center has a copy of this. Discussing salary is a delicate subject and the best way to get around it, said Plato, is to put the salary determination back on the interviewer.

9. Dress appropriately. "Dress for the profession." This doesn't always mean wearing a suit but looking nice is always a must according to Plato.

10. Maintain eye contact and use proper body language. Always look eye to eye when answering questions. Looking down shows that there isn't any confidence in the answer, said Flato. The way you sit is also important. Plato recommends sitting back with your hands

Lend a helping hand to the community

There is a new organization on campus that deserves whole hearted student support. It was introduced in last week's Elm. The organization is Hands Out.

Hands Out offers students the chance to make a difference in someone else's life through volunteerism. Volunteerism was one of the subjects that President Bush touched on in his State of the Union address. The president proposed that some of the ill of society could be eased if people reached out to each other. He cited the example of literacy volunteers helping to teach other Americans how to read.

In the Chestertown area, Hands Out will be able to make a difference in the lives of many people. But it can only reach out to them if the organization has students willing to take time and help others. The organizers will be publishing a directory of agencies and organizations in the Chestertown area that welcome student volunteers. Far too often, the only image of the College in the town is a bunch of spoiled, rich kids who have nothing better to do than get drunk. An organization such as Hands Out offers Washington College the opportunity to give back to the community, and improve its image at the same time.

The Garnett Community Playground offered the town and College a glimpse of what a motivated student body could achieve. Don't default on that promise. Support Hands Out, and help yourself and the College.

Letters to the Editor

Protestors are anti-war, not anti-troops

Last Friday I came into the dining hall to eat my lunch. I also picked up a copy of The Elm, as is my usual practice. While reading our school paper I was outraged by the protester-bashing that was evident in much of what I read. It is amazing to me how much of this campus is misinformed or has misjudged the feelings and views of the majority of people who are against the war in the Gulf. Comments such as, "Anti-war protesters are like going to the opera: a bunch of people yelling about stuff no one can understand anyway, and you fall asleep after the first ten minutes.", "But by voicing it [the opinion that the war is wrong] now when the country's support is needed, will do anything but aid the situation", or "I believe the protesting is absolutely ridiculous, not only will it have no effect on the decision-maker. . . " These are only a few of the statements that shocked and appalled me.

First, let us look at the definition of protest according to The American Heritage Dictionary ; "A formal declaration of disapproval or objection issued by a concerned party." This definition says nothing indicating that protesters are against all the people of their country. It simply says that someone is voicing their opinion against a policy or the policies of a group of people. We must also look back to our forefathers who founded this great nation, including our college's namesake. Our nation was formed by a group of protesters. They were protesting the policies of their mother-country, England. The important thing that one must remember is that our forefathers were against the actions of the government of England, not the people of England. In fact England was their homeland and I am sure that the separation from England was extremely painful to our founding fathers. Yet they felt that they had to stand up for what they believed in. That is exactly the way the majority of protesters feel today, and it is extremely painful for us to be called "anti-Americans." We expect you to hear our opinions, but you do not necessarily have to agree with them.

I am concerned with the fact that people are comparing the Gulf War protesters to the protesters of the Vietnam War and saying that therefore we do not support our troops. But as the President said, this is not the Vietnam War. I have always thought that the Vietnam War was wrong, but I also thought the protesters of the Vietnam War were wrong to condemn the troops fighting the war. I do not think it is the fault of the troops when we are at war, but it is the fault of the members of the government that send them there. I have spoken to many people who are against this war and am proud to say that no one has said anything derogatory concerning our troops. Everyone of them is in full support of our troops in the Gulf. In fact that is why we are protesting, we do not feel that the situation in the Gulf is worth their deaths.

I attended the rally in Washington D.C. on Saturday, January 26th with over 300,000 other people. Among these 300,000 people were a vast variety of Americans. There were many different organizations as well as individuals. Organizations participating in the rally consisted of: The Gray Panthers, Greenpeace, N.O.W., The Communist Party, the Mennonites, Anarchists, students and faculty from colleges all over the country, Veterans, homosexual organizations, Grandparents for Peace, and many more. Several of the people were parents with their children, who I believe had some of the most touching signs and sentiments. There was one woman there who carried a sign stating "I'll Give Up My Car Before I Give Up My Son;" the bottom was lined with pictures of her son. A nine year old girl held a sign that said simply "We Want Our Moms Back." A tear was seen in many eyes when a three or four year old boy on his father's shoulders lead the cry of "Peace Now!" Many signs were in support of the troops, my favorite being, "Pro-Troops, Pro-U.S.A., Anti-War." In fact the majority of the signs were in support of our troops and revealed our desire to have them home and alive. I did not hear one person utter a single syllable against the troops stationed in the Gulf. The people on this campus and around this country who say that the supporters of peace are anti-American and hurting our troops are obviously misinformed and confused and should understand the peace movement better before condemning it. The best way to show support for our troops is to keep them alive and bring them home.

Dear Editor:

I have found Mr, Macek's homosexual "jokes" in his article "A comedy of errors in the Middle East (the fiction)" to be extremely offensive. In these times of AIDS and anti-gay hysteria, I feel that such "humor" only tends to stir the pot. Perhaps Mr. Macek needs to open his mind to new ideas and lifestyles that are different than his own and stop picking on such groups as women, blacks and gays. Before someone fires a SCUD missile at him, that is.

Student responds to Ponder

Editor of the Elm:

I am writing in response to Ms. Kyndra Ponder's article in last week's Elm regarding the protesting of the Middle Eastern war. Ms. Ponder makes some statements that lead me to think that either she is incredibly naive, or else she hasn't thought things out properly.

The first of these is her assertion that she loves our country, right or wrong, simply because it is our country. This statement is misleading in its implicit claim that with this love must also come support for our country, "right or wrong." This is a trap into which blind patriotism has led many people; the tendency is to say that it doesn't matter whether a given national policy (in this case, war) is right or wrong— if it's the U.S. policy, then allllll riiiiiiight! Loving our country is well and good, particularly in light of the need to show our troops a unified home front; but make sure after you wipe those national anthem-inspired crocodile tears from your eyes that you take a good long look at the country you love, and make certain that you respect it. Respecting something is an important part of loving it, and in 1991 blind respect and blind faith— in your leaders, or in anything— can get you killed.

I am also troubled by Ms. Ponder's assertion that the protests in major American cities should stop because of the strain on the budget caused by the need to pay police officers overtime to handle protestors. Oh, come on. Granted there are some arguments against protesting that may be valid, but saying that we should knock it off because we can't afford to pay the police is a bit miserly.

Ms. Ponder also states that "for all the shouting and sit-ins and other demonstrations...I have yet to hear any logical statement of what can be done" as an alternative to war, and that therefore the protestors should stop their activities. I agree with part of this; I haven't heard any viable suggestions for alternatives either, and that saddens me deeply. But to suggest that the protestors just go home and sit on their hands is folly. President Bush has got to be made known that there are people who don't agree with him, and the troops don't nec-

Issue: Do you think the President will reinstate the draft?

All hell would break loose

Since the war in the Middle East began two weeks ago, it has remained uppermost on the minds of American citizens everywhere, especially on those with family or friends stationed in the thick of it. It would be hard to imagine anyone who has not felt the fear of losing someone they love because of the war; indeed, this is a fear many of us at Washington College have come to know well. But there is another fear on the minds of many people our age, a fear that grows greater the longer the war stretches on: "Am I going to be drafted?"

It has been theorized that George Bush would rather do anything than reinstate the draft at this time; indeed, to some, such a move would seem political suicide with another election year only a year away. But just for the moment, let's consider what would happen if George Bush were to come on the news tonight— no, not even tonight. What would happen if George Bush came on TV and radio everywhere *right now*and announced that the draft was on?

Well, all hell would break loose, that's what would happen. I won't debate the moral question of the government's right to force its citizens to fight in a war some of them do not believe in, but if anyone thinks Washington, D.C. is crowded with protesters now, they should try to imagine the pandemonium that would ensue if the draft were activated. Consider: one of the major differences between this war and Viet Nam, as far as we at home are concerned, is that currently, all our troops are over there of their own free will, at least as much as free will exists within the military. No one is being forced to serve, no one is being forced to fight in a war they don't believe in; and those troops over there who do oppose the war do so knowing that they agreed to military enlistment knowing that war was at least a possibility.

Clay Eichelberger

All this has worked to Bush's advantage. Polls aside, there are enough people our age in this country who oppose the war that if a mandatory draft was enstated, the Bush administration would be inundated with petitions, letters, protests, and more cries of "Hell no! We won't go!" than Jimmy Carter had teeth in his big, smiling face.

People everywhere, including President Bush, have said repeatedly, "This is not another Viet Nam," and they're right. But reinstating the draft would be the first step in ensuring that the Middle Eastern War becomes as long and as vicious as Viet Nam ever was, here on the home front. And lastly, to set the record straight, hell no, I don't intend to go.

Clay Eichelberger is a senior who hopes the war will end soon.

"I think they will consider it. It would effect me personally, I know a lot of people, family and friends, who would probably be drafted. It would probably be harder for the American public to support the war when they have family over there fighting."

Jessica Hall
Freshman
Ellicott City, MD

"I personally feel that the President and/or Congress will use the draft as a last resort; considering the fact that we have enough forces in Saudi Arabia as part of "Desert Storm" to not warrant the use of a draft. Also with the implementation of an additional 180 day period for reservists this will maintain our forces in the Gulf. But on the other hand if we implement a ground attack and suffer an enormous casualty rate, I think it will be another Vietnam and the draft will be a necessity !"

Christopher Spezio
Sophomore
Rockville Centre, NY

"I think that they will consider it. I really wouldn't like it because I would not want to have my family or friends go off to war. It would be harder for America to support the troops if many of them were forced to go."

Ivette Gormaz
Freshman
Venice, CA

"I think the president would as a last resort, he would certainly wait as long as possible before doing it. Actually I think the American people would be on both sides, both for and against the decision. There are several ways of looking at this; people would be concerned if they had family or friends drafted into service, but you could use the logic that a larger force would end the conflict sooner."

Lynn Massicott
Junior
Owing Mills, MD

"I don't think that Bush would consider the draft because of what happened in Vietnam, because too many people in the country would be against it, and Bush would loss a lot of public support for the war. I would be very concerned if there was ever the possibility of a draft because so many of my friends are draft age."

Cindy Young
Freshman
Westford, MA

"After listening to Dr Shad at the evening conference the other night, I was convinced that President Bush and Congress would consider recalling the draft as a last resort. A draft would be politically damaging to say the least. Plus there are many partially trained reservists and recently retired fully trained personnel which would be called first. I doubt a draft will be called."

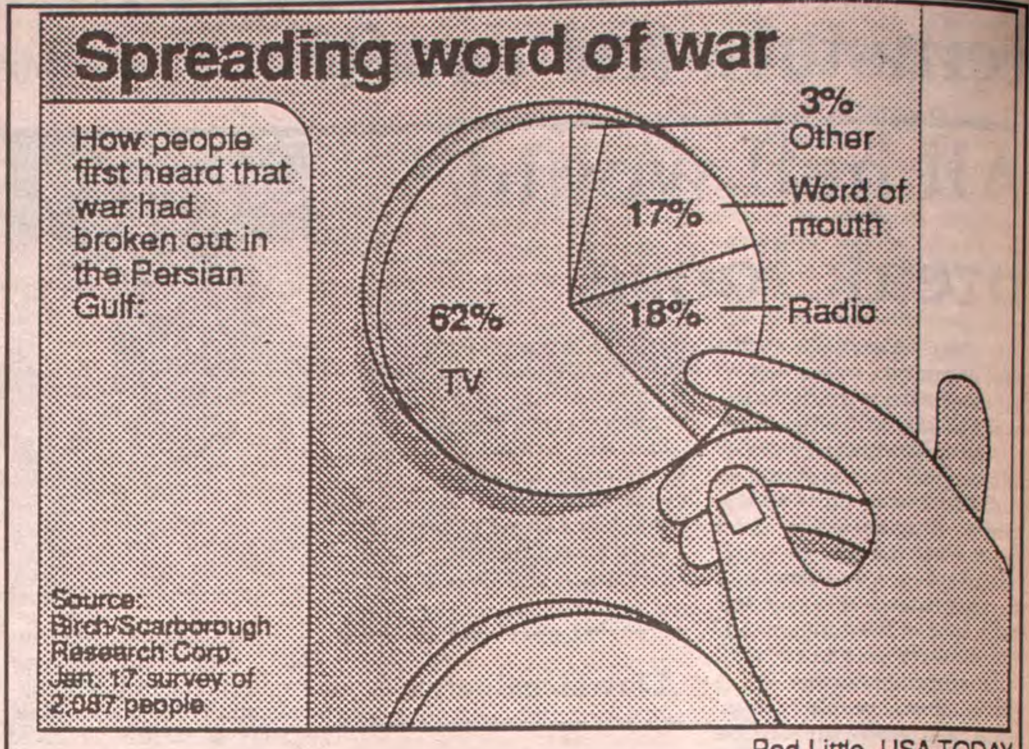
OUTLOOK

In the world: Bush delivers State of the Union address



Rod Little, USA TODAY

UNITED STATES:

Secretary of State, James Baker III and Soviet Foreign Minister Alexander Bessmertnykh issued a joint statement concerning the situation in the middle east Tuesday night after a lengthy meeting. In the statement, the United States and the Soviet Union told Iraq that hostilities could be halted if Iraq made "an unequivocal commitment to withdraw from Kuwait" followed by "immediate, concrete steps leading to full compliance with Security Council resolutions". The two countries also agreed to become partners in the promotion Arab-Israeli peace talks once the war ends to help stabilize the region. This joint statement marked the acceptance the Soviet Union's role in the Middle East by the United States, and a relaxation of the U.S.'s tough stance on ending the war. The statement went on to say that the establishment of enduring stabilty and peace as high on the agenda for both the Soviet Union and the United States.

Tuesday night the President gave the annual State of the Union Address. Instead of outlining the state of the nation, Bush talked at length about what it means to be an american and praised the people in the U.S. armed forces for doing the "hard work of freedom". Half of his speech was devoted to the Persian Gulf war. The problems facing Americans at home were also mentioned, as Bush said the "hard work of freedom" requires the same commitment as the war effort to make the most of America.

Among President Bush's proposals are: a comprehensive national energy stategy combining conservation, development and alternative fuels; Record federal investment and a permament tax credit to strenghthen private research and development; blueprint for a new national highway system; refocusing the Strategic Defense Initiative; and introducing tax-free family saving accounts and penalty-free IRA withdrawals for first-time homebuyers.

SOVIET UNION:

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev ignored protests against a plan for military patrols, and personally reaffirmed the order of his ministers of defense and internal affairs to begin such patrols today. With this decree, Gorbachev sent a message that the new hard-line policy is not just that of generals and police officers, it is the policy of the president. The decree came a day after the postponement of a Soviet-U.S. conference, which officially was postponed because of the war, but more likely because of the growing U.S. criticism for the events in the Soviet republics. With this decree Gorbachev find himself again at odds with Boris Yeltsin, the popular leader of the Russian Federation; as well as with leaders in Moscow, Leningrad and several other Soviet republics who oppose the use of military patrols in Soviet cities.

PERSIAN GULF:

Overnight on Wednesday, U.S. marine jets surprised and Iraqui armoured column crossing the Kuwaiti desert. 24 tanks, armoured personnel carriers, and supply vehicles were destroyed. As the war entered its third week, the number of U.S. troops in the region was 490,000. That number is significantly higher than the 430,000 the administration said would be the upper limit.

Iraqi officials said today that on of the allied pilots held prisoner as a "human shield" was during an allied bombing raid in Baghdad. The name of the alleged victim was not given ans the Pentagon could not confirm the report.

Iran offered new assurances that it will continue to impound any Iraqi planes that land within it's borders until the hostilities come to an end. U.S. officials speculate that the 90 planes flown to Iran have been so to protect them from destruction in allied attacks. States Department spokesperson Margaret Tutwiler said that the president and the administration believe that Iran will keep the Iraqi planes out of the war.

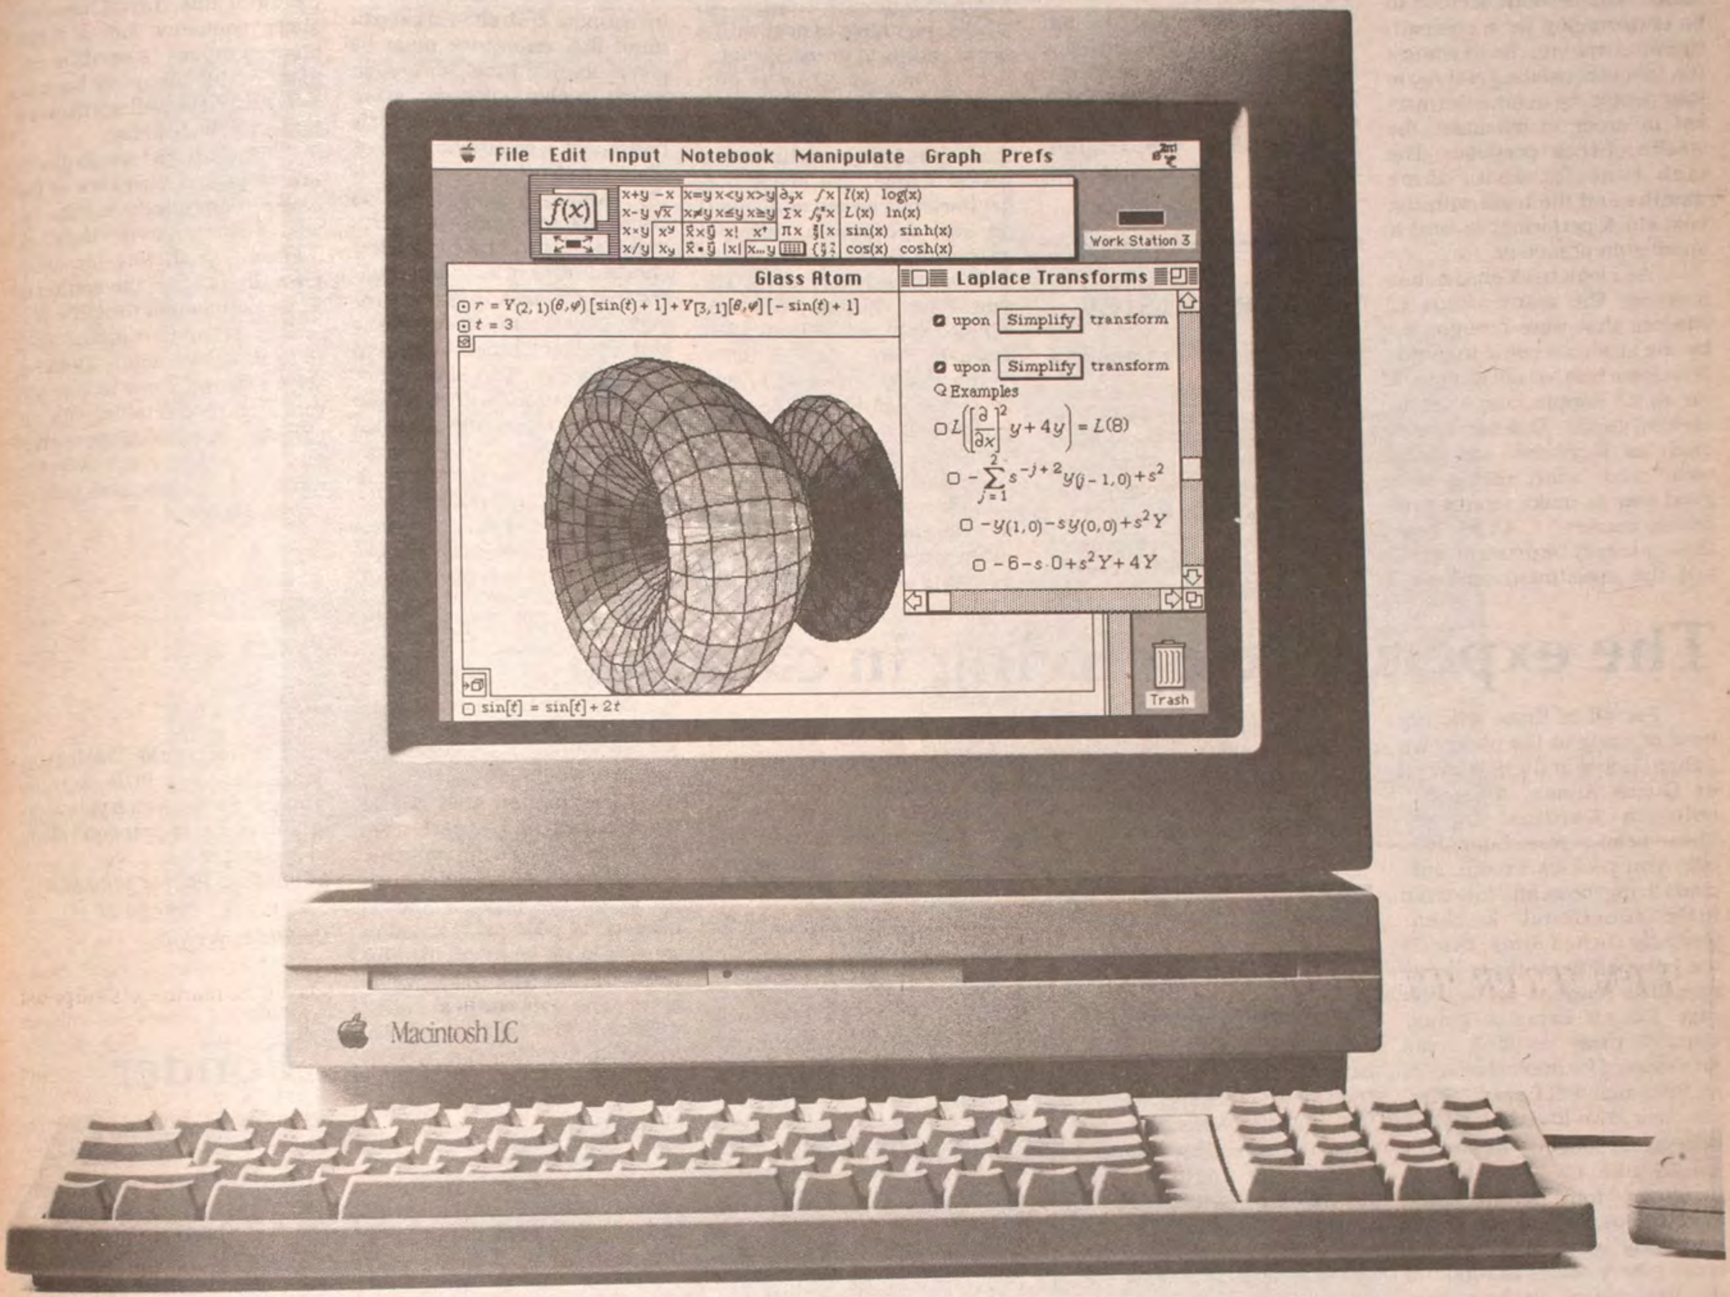
Now you can afford to dream in color.



Apple introduces the Macintosh LC.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Fun with the W.C. investment club

Steve Pursley

The Washington College investment club had its first meeting on Tuesday, January 22nd. The turnout seemed to be encouraging for a competitive atmosphere. Each semester, teams consisting of three to four people try to time the market in order to maximize the wealth of their portfolio. The club runs for about three months and the team with the best stock performance wins a small sum of money.

As I look back on the first meeting, the many words of wisdom that were brought up by the students come to mind. Words such as "do not buy stock on tips," "Apple computer is looking good," "Defense stocks such as Raytheon are doing well," and "short selling is a good way to make money in a falling market." All of these thoughts may be prudent ones, but the investment club and many other investors have seemed to overlook the more important points to investing in the stock market.

First, let's clear the air. There is no such thing as a hereditary knack for picking a profitable stock. The market is not as esoteric as one may think. It is personal preparation, knowledge, and research that distinguishes the successful stock picker from the bone headed nerd who throws darts at the Dow Jones stock listings. The impetuous stock picker should forget Wall Street all together and take the money to Bermuda, California, or even the Village Tavern. At least when you lose a sum of money betting on a pool game, Nick will compensate your loss with a shot of Sambuca. However, in stocks, you have to deal with a tax accountant every Spring.

To me, investing is putting your money someplace where you can expect to find that it has kept its value over a period of time. The stock market itself has grown at an average rate approaching 10% per year, with dividends reinvested and compounded annually. The Dow Jones climbed an astonishing 2,000 points from 1982 through 1989. Stocks delivered a yearly return of 17.4%. This rate would double your money every four years. I am not saying that stocks are not risky. Nowhere is it written that a stock owes you money, but over the long haul you can reduce your risk in the market.

One of the problems with the investment club that misleads the participating students is the short term results that are expected. Members of the investment club should keep in mind that enterprise must be given longer time frames in which to plan, succeed, or fail than quarterly or even yearly bottom line calculations usually permit.

Although Wall Street is often blamed for short term success, the stock market cheers future oriented managers and rewards them accordingly. To the members of the club the stock market ought to be irrelevant. You should not concern yourself with what the Dow Jones closed at today, tomorrow, or even in a month from now. If you don't believe me, believe Warren Buffett, who said, "As far as I am concerned the stock market does not exist. It is there only as a reference to see if anybody is offering to do anything foolish." Warren Buffett, one of the great investors of all time, turned his seven share company into a 6,825 share company. A small investment in his company back in 1960 would be well worth over a million dollars today.

The advice I would give to investors and members of the college community is this: invest in companies not the stock market. Predicting the short term direction of the market is futile. Remember the GE's, Wal Marts, and Apple computers did not get big overnight. The long term returns from stocks are relatively predictable. As an investor, take advantage of what you know and don't overestimate the wisdom and skill of professionals.

The experience of living in cardinal

Phil "Slice" Macek

For all of those who are tired of living in the pit known as Kent House or the hole known as Queen Anne's, there is a solution--Cardinal Dorms. These semi-private bungalows offer you your own room, spacious living room, and full-sized fully functional kitchen. Quaintly tucked away behind the baseball field, these separate little heavens are all the rage for on campus living. Usually, these dwelling areas are reserved for upperclassmen, so freshmen will have to tolerate their cave like rooms for a little while longer. Anyway, I would like to give you an imaginary tour of one these sanctuaries, so you can get in line early when the time for room lottery comes around. In the first place, please excuse that all the houses are the same dull shade of gray. If you can past this little inconveinence then it's smooth sailing. Oh imagine that! As we walk up the sidewalk we find ourselves at the threshold of Cardinal F. The porch, boldly decorated with empty bottles of some strange beverage called beer, and empty twelve pack boxes seems to carry that homey "Sanford and Son" look, don't you agree?. Anyway, moving past the traffic pylon, the rolled up garden hose, the folded up beach chair, some strange magazine called Hustler,? some dirty towels, some ancient Procolino's pizza boxes, four socks without mates, and some rusty mousetraps. This symphony for the eyes must have taken weeks even months to accumulate. It really whets the appetite to see what's inside. Opening the door, we find the epitome of a bachelor's paradise. Below the T.V. and VCR lies the item most responsible for numbing the brain--NINTENDO. This is especially true of the fine residents of Cardinal F. The Nintendo component is always hot to the touch, and so far three games have simply melted from over use.

The movie library of these fine, upstanding youths contains all the classics: Caddyshack, Animal House, Dirty Harry, The Naked Gun, 15 Years of Saturday Night LIve, Rocky III, Airplane, Blazing Saddles, and A Nightmare on Elm Street. However, don't think that these students waste all their time on escapist fantasy, they also have all 11 hours of the Civil War documentary.

In terms of decorations, Cardinal F takes a backseat to nobody. Amongst the Budweiser posters, the ad for Meyer's Rum, the Michael Jordan poster, and the banner advertising 99 cent Big Macs, lies a Blues Brothers poster that will rock your world. One can see how much meticulous preparation went into the decorating of this suite.

The kitchen area is just what one would expect from some college loving youths. While it is not quite clean enough to eat off the floor, it should manage to pass an inspection by the local board of health; provided that the inspector is blind. The cupboards are filled with only the most nutritous foods: Spam, Chef Boy Ardee's Mini Ravioli, and a big bag of Cheeto's. In a similar way, the refrigerator is stocked so as to keep these growing boys fit and trim. There are individual pan pizzas, bottles of rum, and week old entrees from the China House.

While our dream tour is now almost complete, let me mention some of the drawbacks to living in Washington College's version of Oz. First off, the laundry facilities are outside in a common shack-not exactly a conveinence. One should also know that the walk to class is a little longer, this should bother everyone except those who cut class on a regular basis.

Finally, just let me say that living in Cardinal, if you get the chance, should be the summit of your college career. After all, when living on campus , this is the closest you can get to the real world. This hereby concludes our little tour of heaven. Please watch your step as you leave, so you don't stick to the carpet.

essarily have to be condemned for him to be made aware of that. Likewise, to use Ms. Ponder's argument against her, what is her alternative to protesting? Doing nothing? Since before this country was founded, the American people have been notoriously bad at keeping their mouths shut when they aren't happy about something. Protesting the actions of a government with which the public disagrees is an American tradition older than the flag many people have been waving about. Most anti-war protestors with level heads don't deny those who are in favor of the war to show their support; let's see the same courtesy from the other side.

Finally, I'm glad Ms. Ponder thinks there is "a lot of merit" in the conservative beliefs of her Mom and Dad. I'm sure they think so too. It is obvious that she has spent a lot of time thinking about these issues. I hope that she is able to allow those who do not support the conservative beliefs of Mom and Dad to state their side of it.

Colonel Sanders, the ghost of Birthday Balls past

by Brett Lankford

Hello, my children! This is Colonel Sanders, the Ghost of Washington College Birthday Balls Past. Not many people know that I claimed this job after going to that great Tub O' Chicken in the sky. Even so, I'm here to tell you all a story about one of the memorable moments in Birthday Ball history. No, not that time Dean Maxcy had one too many spritzers and asked Clint Baer's beard to sleep with him. No, not that time that Dr. Gottfried Baumann escorted a tall Nordic woman named Inga to the Ball before accidentally hanging her on a coat rack and causing her severe spinal injury. Those were wonderful times, rating up there with the invention of the ball peen hammer among the most memorable moments of my days. Still, this tale has a moral much like one of those silly Aesop's Fables, if you will. I hope you become a wiser person as a result of this story.

Once upon a time there was a guy named Arvid. This was the least of his problems, ranking just behind his tendency to blurt "I wanna fondle some hot little number RIGHT NOW" at extremely inappropriate times. As one might expect, Arvid was without a date for the Birthday Ball.

It wasn't that he hadn't asked enough women - heavens, no. It's just that no woman wanted to be seen with him. An attractive female named Becky chose to date a three-legged dachshund named "Petey" rather than be seen with Arvid. When his mother turned him down, claiming to have fallen victim to a touch of mange, Arvid decided to take drastic measures. He called on me.

I was busy inventing the KFC Skinless Boneless Chicken Meal at the time, but any man named Arvid is a friend of mine, so I took the time to help him. I set him up in a leisure suit, gave him some platform shoes and gave him a position in the Bee Gees. Well, the rest is history. He first broke onto the charts with "How Can You Mend A Broken Heart", and "Jive Talkin'" made him a permanent fixture in the Top 40 for many a year. Arvid was known as "the silent Bee Gee", but his triangle-playing prowess made him an important member of the Bee Gee circle. His career ended suddenly, however, when he finally lost his temper with his bandmates. Arvid sealed his own fate when he called Barry a pantywaist and tied the gold medallions of Robin and Maurice together. His career was over.

The roller coaster ride of fame convinced Arvid that getting turned down to the Birthday Ball was no big deal. In reality, Arvid became the hit of the Ball when he and his date Carol Channing began slamdancing to "You Make Me So Very Happy". This form of dancing allowed Arvid to release his frustrations while Ms. Channing suffered several facial lacerations and basically ruined her career except for occasional appearances on "The Love Boat" as Doc's love interest.

The moral of this story? Please don't wear plaid to the Birthday Ball, otherwise people will be forced to laugh at you. Have a good time at the Birthday Ball, folks, and dance the Funky Chicken once for me, O.K?

Slice's not-so-perfect Birthday Ball evening

Now is the time of year when the collective minds of Washington College turns towards flowery dreams of the ideal Birthday Ball. All the campus Romeos get gussied up in their rented tuxedos and seek the hand of some stunning school Juliet angelically decked out in a flowing silk gown. Well this scene has been replayed over and over every year here at W.C., so rather than bore you with the typical mumbo-jumbo that surrounds these gala events, I would like to present to you a scene which would be, at least to me, the not-quite-perfect Birthday Ball.

On the one hand, we have Dexter Long, our gallant and dashing stud. Luckily, Dex was charming enough to entice the lovely fair maiden, "Jersey" Jean Alcott, to accompany him to the royal ball. After a romantic dinner for two at Hardee's, at which our hero and heroine were entertained by the birthday party of little Ritchie Wadsworth in the adjacent corner booth, we find our two love birds to be going their separate ways so as to prepare themselves for the ball. Dex retired to his luxurious flat in Kent House, where he proceeded to join his friends for a few cans of beer and some shots of cheap tequila; all the while singing the praises of the love of his life, "Jersey" Jean. After showering and shaving (and waiting for the cuts to stop bleeding), Dex donned his bodacious polyester, yellow plaid tuxedo, complete with shark-skin collar. Yes, Mr. Long was a true sight as he slipped on his thick gray hiking socks and finally his camouflauge colored Chuck Taylor canvas high tops. Just before leaving to pick up his date, Dex slapped on a few splashes of his favorite aftershave, "Aquavelva." After this, Dex was on his way to the best night of his life.

We find "Jersey" Jean stepping out of her bathrobe and into a royal purple gown of sheer brilliance. She dabs herself with a few precious drops of that new Joan Collins perfume, "REALLY OLD SPICE" and then settles down to wait for her Prince Charming. While peering out the window of her condominium-like suite in Minta Martin and seeing how the stars kiss the sky, she wonders if tonight will be all that she hopes. Finally, she hears a knock on her chamber door, and upon opening it sees the dashing Dexter Long in all his glory.

"My dear, you look simply radiant tonight."

"Oh Dexter", says "Jersey" Jean weakly. "Give me a kiss."

After gagging on her totally nasty, putrid perfume, Dex finally manages to give her a peck on her cheek. "Jersey" Jean withdraws with her hand clasped over her cheek like she wouldn't want anything to remove it. However, this is not the case. We find her covering her mouth and mumbling under her breath, "What a heinous cologne this dork is sportin' tonight. He could have at least popped the granddaddy of zits he has on his forehead."

Thus, with love in their eyes, a song in their hearts, and at least two pints of Suds 'n' Soda vodka stashed on their persons they head off to the Ball.

They wander into the Cain Athletic center and check out the Hall of Fame room. Finally, ready to make their grand entrance, they step through the heavy smell of sweat wafting up from the locker rooms and make their way onto the scene. Their ears are greeted by the opening song of the night's entertainment, Alice Cooper, as he tears into the opening riffs of "Welcome To My Nightmare."

Tragically, that was the last happy moment that the two of them shared. Later on, after killing all the booze they had brought in, the two got into a major fight about the other person's minor.

"Dex, you're a sociology major, why on earth would you want to be an art minor?"

"Jean, you stupid witch. Don't you know anything.? I want to be able to draw groups

BIRTHDAY BALL

Dressing the part

With the arrival of the Birthday ball as an actual date and time on everyone's calender, there pops up the perennial question: what to wear?

For the men, the answer seems simple—a tuxedo or a very nice suit. For those who own neither tuxedo nor car, Brambles on High Street is the local distributor of mens' finery although Lucinda and Company, also on High Street also carries dinner jackets. For those who do have transportation, both the Dover and Annapolis malls have branches of the large mens' formal wear (Small's Formalwear and Gingiss Formalwear, for example) which have fairly large inventories. Men are usually able to rent everything from the jacket, to ties and cummerbunds, to tuxedo shirts at one location.

For the women, the options are a bit more staggering. There are many colors and styles to chose from, and the first consideration should be; how dressed up do you feel like getting?

The best rule of thumb to apply to the Birthday Ball is to wear what you will feel comfortable in and what you feel flatters you. If you don't feel like getting dressed up in a floor-length evening gown with matching wrap and elbow length gloves, then don't.

Its always a good idea to keep in mind the season. February on the eastern shore can be anywhere from balmy to sub-arctic cold. Also, it has been four to five months since most of us had any long term exposure to the sun, so last springs lovely pale blue or pink full length taffeta gown will not look quite so sensational, while the same gown in black or a dark color will be show stopping. (For those who feel the need to pursue a golden tan, Chestertown does have its fair share of tanning salon. A wellness note however, the UV rays in tanning booths can cause premature aging.) Darker colors such as forest green, navy blue, burgundy and the ever popular black look good on almost everyone and accent the delicate winter pallor so many of us sport right now. Another overlooked color is gold.

The length of the dress is entirely dictated by taste. Remember the rule of thumb and wear what feels comfortable. Floor, ankle, three-quarter, below and above the knees lengths have all made appearances at the Birthday Ball.

For those who want to attend the Ball, and don't have a gown, Lucinda and Company on High Street offers a selection of gowns in many different styles from many different decades. The gowns are reasonably priced and in good condition, most need only to be dry cleaned. Lucinda and Company also offers a selection of evening wraps and gloves to complement your gown, as well as a wide variety of vintage and costume jewelry. Macy's at the Christiana Mall and the Hero Group Outlet at Chesapeake Village always carry a wide selection of formalwear no matter what the season.

Accessories are an often overlooked area. Jewelry, gloves, evening wraps and bags, nylons or stockings, and shoes are all important. Most department stores such as Macy's and Strawbridge and Clothier at Christiana, and Hetch's at the Annapolis Mall carry these small but invaluable items. The malls also have branch stores of the accessory chains such as Claire's and Accessory Lady. Victoria's Secret at Christiana carries a wide selection of nylons and stocking in many different colors and patterns as do the Parklane Hosiery stores in both the Dover and Annapolis Malls.

Shoes are a final consideration. and can either be dyed to match your gown or just basic black pumps. Again, wear what you will feel comfortable in, and remember that spiked heels look great, but are almost impossible to dance in.

The Chestertown dining experience

So, now that you've found a date and purchased your ticket, it's time to think about the other elements in the Birthday Ball equation— flowers, food and finery.

Dining in and around Chestertown can be an experience. Local restaurants run the gamut from very formal to very informal and relaxed. For those who feel the immediate area lacking in their particular culinary requirements, there are some excellent restaurants located in nearby Georgetown, Chesapeake City, and Rock Hall. For the more adventurous, Annapolis is 45 minutes away, and Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington D.C. a mere two hours. So whatever your poison, you can certainly find something to your liking.

In Chestertown:

The Imperial Hotel
208 High Street
Chestertown
778-5000

Arguably Chestertown's finest restaurant, the Imperial offers a rare treat. The cuisine, featuring such entrees as Norwegian salmon and filet mignon, would be hard to match in a major city. The surroundings complement the menu excellently. The Imperial is located within walking distance of the College, making it an ideal choice for those without cars who want to dine in style. The Imperial does not accept credit cards, and reservations should be made as soon as possible. (The Imperial will be offering special dinners for college students, so keep it mind if you want to take someone special to a unique place.)

The Ironstone Cafe
236 Cannon Street
Chestertown
778-0188

An intimate and charming restaurant, the Ironstone offers a wide variety of entrees. Its small size and excellent food guarantee a crowd of diners on Birthday Ball night, so make reservations early.

The Old Wharf Inn
Cannon Street
Chestertown
778-3566

Located on the Chester River, the Old Wharf is a perennial favorite among students, parents and faculty. Despite its familiarity, the Old Wharf should not be overlooked for the Birthday Ball. They serve a creamy Crab bisque that is unmatched. Reservations are only needed for large groups, but expect the Old Wharf to be crowded the night of the Birthday Ball.

China House
Kent Plaza
Chestertown
778-3939 or 778-3999

Chestertown's newest addition to the dining scene is the much awaited Chinese restaurant. While diners have praised the cuisine, they suggest ordering take-out for the night of the Ball, and eating in a more romantic setting. China House offers a full range of traditional favorites, including Sweet and Sour Pork and Chicken with Broccoli.

Nearby:

Kitty Knight House
Route 213
Georgetown
648-5305

Located just off 213 in Georgetown, the Kitty Knight House is situated on the Sassafras River and offers a wide selection of beef and seafood entrees. Reservations are required.

The Granary
Route 213
Georgetown
648-5566

Across the river from the Kitty Knight House is the Granary. The Granary specializes in Eastern shore seafood, but also features non-seafood on the menu. Reservations need to be made early, especially for large groups.

The Fin, Fur and Feather Inn
424 Bayside Ave
Rock Hall
639-7454

For the hunting and fishing enthusiasts, the Fin, Fur, and Feather Inn is a must. The restaurant offers a unique charm that surely will appeal to these individuals. The entrees are priced slightly less than the Old Wharf, and the setting is informal and very relaxed.

Schaefer's Canal House
Chesapeake City
885-2200

Schaefer's Canal House is just across the bridge in Chesapeake City and offers a panoramic view of the C&D Canal. The menu includes prime rib, duck and shrimp almondine. Reservations are required.

The Baynard House
11 Bohemia Ave, S.
Chesapeake City
885-5040

Located in Chesapeake City's historic district, the Baynard House offers unique entrees such as braised pheasant with plums and lobster thermadore. Reservations are required. To get to Baynard House, watch for signs for the historic district before the bridge.

It's a good idea to make reservations as soon as possible. Many of these restaurants shortly will be booked solid for the night of the Birthday Ball. For those without the financial wherewithal for dining out, trust our own WCDS to pull out all the stops on Birthday Ball night.

"Yeah, well good luck you stupid moron."

"Me a moron? You're the one who wants to draw groups of people for childrens' books."

"Not childrens' books you idiot, college text books."

"What's the difference?"

"Damn Jean, I have no clue why I thought I would have fun with you tonight. You're a mindless, heartless, selfish shell of a person, and I never want to see you again."

"Oh is that so Dex? Well the same goes for me. Goodnight."

As the two lovers make their separate exits, one can help but ponder the enchanting effect the Birthday Ball has of turning friendship into love. Here's hoping that this year's ball is just as exciting and wonderful for some lucky couple out there. Hope to see you all there!!!

Basketball swept by Swarthmore, romps Haverford

By Matt Giller

The Shoremen (5-12) last Saturday night halted the longest losing streak in recent memory - six games - by pummelling the hapless Fords of Haverford 88-39. But before that, however, the WAC lost to Swarthmore last Thursday 87-73.

With the Shoremen losing to Swarthmore on the road just five days prior, the loss was extremely vivid in the WAC's mind as they entered the Cain Cave.

The Shoremen demonstrated excellent "D" as they allowed Swarthmore to hit only 35% from the field in the first half. However, the visitors went into the half leading the WAC 35-33.

Although Washington improved from 43% field goal shooting in the first half to 50% in the second frame, the Main Line Marauders upped their shooting clip to an impressive 56%. Swarthmore, combining hot shooting and 26 more total free throws than the Sho'men, was able to seal a season sweep of the WAC. One of the shining performances of the game was that of freshman Greg Rogers. The rookie guard poured in 11 points and snared five rebounds. Other stars were guard Allen Lester and Darren Vican, who scored 16 and 14 points respectively.

While Swarthmore was an extremely stingy foe, Haverford did not rank as such(although they were rank). As the alumni played a game on the same court just prior to the Ford/Sho'men battle they apparently brought with them the legacy of a final four appearence in the NCAA's and numerous MAC championships. The Shoremen, who may have been fighting these ghosts all season, had these ghosts on their team that night. The WAC, playing some of their best team basketball of the season thus far spooked Haverford enough that the Fords hid under their bed until the ghosts were gone and the final buzzer sounded.

Before the cheerleaders could do their first human pyramid (which, by the way, will be dedicated at the game Saturday night to the men and women fighting in the Middle East), the WAC had shot out to a 20-2 lead to open the game. The Fords went over seven minutes before Russell "Yellow Belly" Coward, although out of his range, was able to sink a layup to trim the Shoreman lead to 20-4.

The WAC then went on an eleven point sprint capped off by an off-balance, no look, fadeaway 3-pointer by Billy "B.B." Baldwin(5 points, 4 assists). The Fords threatened with a run of their own - 4 points - before Mike "Hungry Man" Swanson(9 points, 12 rebounds) scored a layup while two Haverford players tried to hold his feet on the floor, one other Ford held on to his shooting arm, and the other two Ford players - one on top of each other like they were about to start a chicken fight - stood between Swanson and the net.

Inspired by Hungry Man's individual effort, the last two minutes of the first half were dominated by the Shoremen, who went on a 10-0 run to give them a commanding 43-10 lead.

Haverford came out the second half and tried to make a legitimate attempt to scare the Shoremen as they outscored the hosts 10-9 during the first seven minutes. However, the WAC shifted up a gear and cruised until the end of the game not allowing the Fords to come within 34 points.

The Shormen defense tamed the Ford sharpshooters to 26% field goal shooting causing them to miss all 14 three-point bombs.

A strong 34 point contribution by the bench and balance starting scoring was an asset to the team's smooth performance; a style that, if maintained consistently throughout the season should guarantee some "W's" for the WAC.

Junior co-captain Tim Liddy paced the scoring with 16 points. Lester and sophomore co-captain contributed with ten each. Other impressive performances included Darren Vican(9 points, 11 rebounds, 4 steals), Geoff Rupert(9 pts, 9 rebs.), Bill "Charlotte's" Weber(7 points), Greg "Get out of my neighborhood" Rogers(5 points), Kris Murphy(4 points) and Joey "You poked my" Eineker(4 points, 66% FG)

Asked if pleased about the performance of his team, especially the bench, Peter Basel said profoundly, "yes, I am."

The WAC is scheduled to play York College Saturday night; tip off: 7:30.

Women's swimming trounces

Washington College Women's swim team improved their record to 7-2 with a win over Hood College 152-83 last Saturday afternoon.

Freshman sensation Mimi Devlin made impressive waves by leading the team with two new school records while junior Kasey Carroll qualified for the NCAA National Championships for her third straight time.

Carroll only competed in one event but it was good enough to qualify her for the NCAA's in Atlanta(the site of the 1996 Summer Olympics) March 13-16. Kasey almost brought the house down as she raced to an unbelievable 18:12 in the 1650 yard Freestyle(the mile) five seconds below the national standard.

Devlin shined as well as she recorded school records in the 50 Butterfly(29.8) and the 100 IM(1:08.2) and won the 50 Butterfly impressively. The Frosh joined seniors Vickie Vahos and Sam Streamer and other rookie star Magdalena Fuchs to win the 200 Medley Relay.

Five other WAC women recorded a first place finish. Most of them came from the swimmers off the juggermaut 200 Medley Relay squad. Streamer added firsts in the 100 and 200 Freestyle events, while Fuchs placed second in both those events and finished first in the 50 Freestyle. While Vahos fell to second in the 100 Backstroke, the wiley veteran came back to lead the way in the 50 Backstroke.

Garden State native Junior Leslie Newcomb thrilled the rambunctious capacity crowd when she won the 1000 Freestyle with a season best time (12:16) and then, obviously weary, returned to place second in both the 500 Freestyle and the 100 IM.

Junior Karen Brady won the 100 Breastroke by a bunch and later returned to place second in the 100 Butterfly. Brady joined Kristen Callazzo, Ramsey Bingham and Vahos to place second in the Free Relay.

Joan Colton had a great afternoon by taking second place in the 100 Breastroke and third in the 50 Breastroke and 100 Butterfly. Kelly Loftus got into the act as well pulling off a third place finish in the 100 Backstroke and fourth in the 500 Freestyle.

Another Shorewomen, Karen Prendergast, qualified for the MAC's this weekend by swimming an impressive time in the 200 Backstroke. Prendergast didn't leave the pool until she added a fourth in the highly competitive 50 Butterfly and a second place finish in the 50 Backstroke and third in the 100 IM.

The speed disease spread to Ramsey Bingham as well as she raced to season best times in the 50 and 100 Freestyles while placing third and fourth in the respective events. Senior Callazzo rounded out the group with a fourth in the 200 Freestyle and 50 Backstroke.

This Saturday will be the last home meet of the season for the Shorewomen. They host Lebanon Valley; opening gun: 1:00.

Croot directs The Maids

by Timothy Madison

Jean Genet's Les Bonnes (The Maids) opens in Tawes Theater on Thursday, February 7 and runs through Saturday, February 9. Genet, a French dramatist and novelist, is best known as standing alongside Samuel Beckett Eugene Ionesco as a major figure of the theater of the absurd.

Presented by the Washington College Drama department, The Maids is directed by senior Cynthia Croot. This is the second production Croot has directec at Washington College, the first being David Campton's one-act Then..., in the spring of last year.

The Maids focuses on the relationship between two sisters, Claire and Solange, and their mistress Madame. The play illustrates several themes of primary interest to Genet: the mutability of himan identity and the inversion of traditional moral values. Croot also describes the play as being about "escape- escape from oppression through a number of means: sexual fantasy, role playing, power struggle, romanticization, and a kind of emotional intoxication".

As a director, Croot was originally attracted to the play because of Genet's poetry and the unique relationshpi between the two sisters, a relationship she describes as "mystifying...almost mystical". As the rehersal process began, Croot became more and more interested in the nature of oppression in the play and Genet's exploration of the way a human life can become "subordinate to another's vision".

The Maids probes the very nature of unfulfilled desires and the fantasy world that frustration can create. Lisa Woodcock, who portrays Claire, says "the role allows me the opportunity to test my reality and to explore the other side of my sexuality".

Felicia Shakman portrays Solange and Carey Smith portrays Madame. In addition to directing, Croot is also the production's set designer. The production crew consists of Jason West as Technical Director, Shan Driscoll as Lighting Designer, Deidre Reigel as Stage Manager and Jacqueline Collins as Assistant Stage Manager.

The Maids will be presented at 8 p.m. on February 7, 8, and 9 in Tawes Theater. Admission is free and no reservations are required.

Timothy Madison is majoring in Drama and minoring in English.

Dr. Alban Urbanas to speak on Deconstruction

"Deconstruction, Poetic License, and Playful Metaphysics" will be the topic at Washington College's William James Forum on Monday evening, February 4. The meeting, open to all without charge, begins in the new Academic Resource Center at 7:30 p.m.

The speaker will be Dr. Alban Urbanas, a Baltimore native who holds three earned degrees in philosophy from the University of Paris-Sorbonne. Dr. Urbanas is currently Assistant Professor of Philosophy and French at Wesley College in Dover.

"Deconstruction" is an influential movement in current continental philosophy that has important implications for literature as well. According to Dr. Thomas Cousineau of the Washington College English Department, deconstruction is "an attack on the Western metaphysical tradition going all the way back to Plato".

Dr. Urbanas has taught English at the University of Paris and French at Franklin College in Lugano, Switzerland. Since returning to America he has held teaching posts at Georgetown, George Washington, and New York Universities and at Colby College in Maine. His current research concerns contemporary continental interpretations of Greek theories of justice.

Stricker discusses Awakenings

Parkinson's Encephalitis, the subject of the current film Awakenings, and other neurological diseases will be discussed in the lecture "Behavioral Neuroscience: Advances in the Study of Brain Function and Neurological Disease," given by Edward Stricker, chair of the Behavioral Neuroscience at the University of Pittsburgh, Tuesday, February 5 in the Dunning Lecture Hall at Washington College. Admission is free and the lecture is open to the public.

Awakenings, which has focused public attention on neurological disorders, tells the story of Parkinson's patients whom after long periods of being comatose, are awakened by the use of the drug L-dopa. The film stars Robert DeNiro as a patient and Robin Williams as a character modeled on Dr. Oliver Sacks, author of several pioneering books on neurological diseases, including Awakenings and The Man Who Mistook His Wife For a Hat.

In his lecture at Washington College, Edward Stricker will talk about advances in neuroscience that have occurred in the past 25 years, focusing on studies of brain function as they relate to the central control of motivated behavior and the biological bases of Parkinson's disease.

Guitarist and Flutist to perform at W.C.

Guitarist Peter Segal and flutist Harold Jones will perform works by Bach, Guiliani and Ravel at Washington College on Monday, February 18, at 8 p.m. Part of the Washington College Concert Series, the performance will be held in Tawes Theater on the Chestertown campus.

Segal, a distinguished soloist, has performed throughout the United States with various orchestras and chamber ensembles from Wyoming to New York. His repertoire encompasses solo works from the baroque through 19th century masters such as Sor and Guiliani, to contemporary composers such as Villa-Lobos, Rodrigo and Britten.

Segal has collaborated with other artists in ensembles such as guitar and harpsichord, guitar and strings, guitar and voice, and even guitar with narrator and mime. In the early 1970s he formed a notable association with flutist Janet Ketchum and the two developed an extensive repertoire for flute and guitar.

Recently he has toured with a new piece called "To Life," which was written especially for him by Michael White.

Jones, who earned the "Outstanding Woodwind Player" award at the Juilliard School of Music, now teaches at the Westchester Conservatory of Music, Manhattan School of Music and the Manhattanville College of Brooklyn College. He has been first flutist and soloist with several orchestras, including The Bach Aria Orchestra, the American Symphony Orchestra, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic.

Jones' recent recording on Performance Records brought this comment from the New York Times: "Among today's legion of distinguished flutists, Mr. Jones has little to fear from being compared to the very best in crossed on your lap. To achieve this Flato suggested videotaping yourself in a interviewing situation. He described the experience as a real "eye opener" because you are the most critical of yourself. The Career Center has this service available for students.

11. Arrive on time. "There are no excuses for lateness." If it takes going the day before to find the right building then that is what you should do, said Flato. Being too early isn't good either. He recommends that you should arrive at an interview approximately fifteen minutes ahead. Being on time says something about commitment and your personal habits. One way to avoid missing an interview is to confirm by writing or by phone the day and time of your appointment. This will clear up any confusion that might result.

12. Indicate how you can be reached on your resume. A phone number is very important as is a place where messages may be left. Messages are critical because if you don't get them then you won't get the job. Flato recommends getting an answering machine because companies won't call back.

13. Ask revelant questions. "The questions that you ask are just as revealing as the answers that you give," said Flato. Asking questions shows that you have an interest in the company. He also recommended taking notes during your visit with the company. Write down names of those you talked to for later reference.

14. Show your personality. Show enthusiasm for the job and show that you want the job. "You wouldn't be there if the company didn't want to hire you- they called you for a reason." Initial first impressions are important such as the handshake and eye contact. Flato suggests finding the bathroom upon your arrival and there making sure that everything is in order.

15. Follow up the interview with a letter of a phone call. This is just a short acknowledgement of thanks to the interviewer for taking time to talk to you. Letters should always be signed personally.

Following the fifteen pointers Mr. Flato just mentioned a few other miscellaneous pointers such a always turning down a cigarette if offered to you, and warning that drug screening is becoming more prevalently required in businesses.

The main point stressed throughout the lecture was that being prepared is the most important thing. Have a list of references and phone numbers with you, along with a pay stub from your current job, and even an unofficial transcript from college. Most interviewers require these to be sent upon completion of the interview

Flato says the key to an interview is being one step above the interviewer.

Mr. Flato suggested that you should go to an interview even if you are not especially interested in the job because like with anything else, practice will probably help. The Center fro Career Development in Spanish House is also prepared to help with books, computer software, workshops, and other services to help make interviewing and job hunting easier.

tion of their community service work.

The fourth case involved a student charged with theft and fraud. The student, Mike Johnson. Johnson pleaded responsible. The SCC ordered Johnson to complete 100 hours of community service, 50 of which must be completed during the spring of 1991. Johnson must also participate in freshman orientation next fall and speak to the incoming freshman on the Honor Code. The SCC also ordered Johnson to move from his current residence hall by Sunday, February 3.

The fifth case involved a student charged with trespassing and unlawful use of college property. The student, Henry Miller, was found responsible for conduct unbecoming a Washington College student and ordered to perform 10 hours of community service. Miller also received a formal college warning.

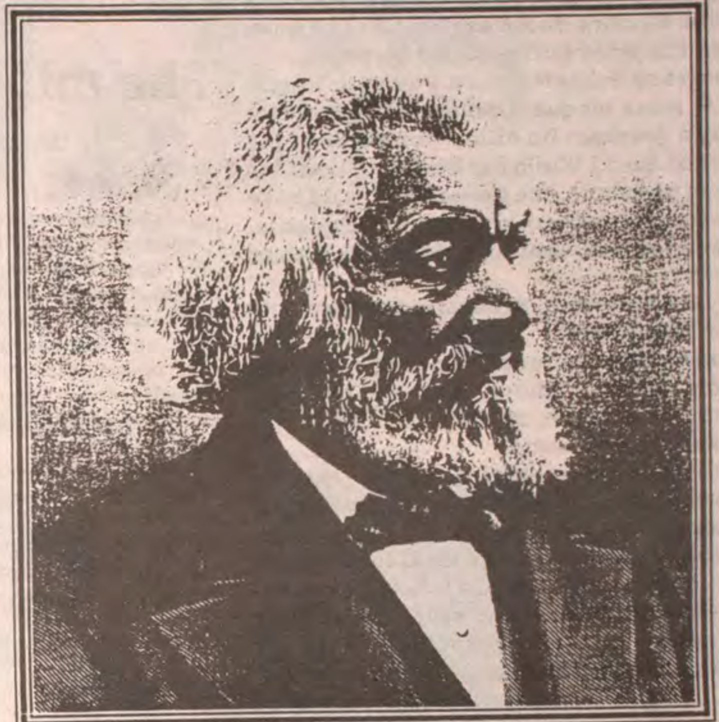
McFeely to attend Convocation Ceremony



Frederick Douglass, pictured here, will be the topic for discussion at the Convocation ceremony, featuring William McFeely as its keynote speaker.

Washington College's celebration of George Washington's Birthday will begin with Convocation at 2:00 PM in the Gibson Fine Arts Gallery. William McFeely will be the keynote speaker for this event. At the Convocation ceremonies McFeely will receive Washington College's honorary doctor of letters degree.

William McFeely is a distinguished Civil War scholar. His talk for convocation will be "Frederick Douglass and the Eastern Shore". Frederick Douglass was a slave on a Talbot County plantation. Through hard work he learned to read and write and eventually escaped to the north using this knowledge. After setting up residence in the north, Douglass earned enough money to buy his freedom and became one of the leading abolitionists of the civil war era.

McFeely is the author of a newly published biography of Frederick Douglass and contributor to several other historical volumes, including The Black Experience in America, Key Issues in the Afro-American Experience, Region, Race and Reconstruction, and The National Experience. He also wrote the introductions to the memoirs of Grant and General William T. Sherman and also to the novel The Negro in the Civil War. Frederick Douglass, his latest book, was billed as "a full length portrait of this slave turned abolitionist [that] also contributes to our understanding of Douglass' America- North, South, free and slave."

McFeely is a Pulitzer Prize winner for his biography of Ulysses S. Grant and the Richard B. Russell Professor of American History at the University of Georgia.

Alonzo G. Decker, Jr. and W. James Price will also be honored at the Convocation ceremonies for their role in the College's Campaign for Excellence which has recently been completed. Price is managing director of Alex Brown & Sons, Inc. and Decker is the retired chief executive officer of Black & Decker. The Campaign raised a record $43.7 million during the past five years.

At approximately 3:30 PM, following the ceremonies, an Open Forum will Dr. McFeely and President Charles H. Trout will be held in the forum room of the Casey Academic Center.

To end the ceremonies for the day, the annual Birthday Ball will be held. Festivities will be held at 9:00 PM in the gymnasium and those that attend will be entertained by the sounds of Zim Zemarel. The cost is $50 per couple at the door.

All are invited and encouraged to attend the festivities of the day.

SGA announces elections to be held at the end of February

By: Laura Hopper

The Student Government Association of Washington College met on Tuesday, February 5 in the Sophie Kerr room of Miller Library. SGA president, Kevin Kelly announced two new senators, one for Cardinal and one for off-campus. The two senators were sworn in by parliamentarian Gordy Scherer.

Kelly asked the senate to collect and return the cable surveys given out earlier in the semester. Vice President Brook Frank needs to collate the data for Student Academic Council.

Social chair Katie Simms reported on the efforts of the SGA to get a big name band this semester. The Ramones, she reported to the Senate, have decided not to tour this spring. The SGA is now trying to contact Blues Traveler and They might be giants to play at the College this spring. Simms also thanked Senator Whitney Mieurs for helping with clean up after Gene Hamilton

SGA Treasurer Brian Gimelson presented two requests for funding. The senate approved $ 1500 for the William James Forum, and $ 400 for the Blackhearts Committee. The Blackhearts Committee, Brett Lankford and Felicia Shakman, are bringing back the Blackhearts Ball, an all-campus party held in Phoebe's the night before the Birthday Ball. The senate approved $ 210 to help with the Pan-hell Bid NIght Party.

Vice president Brook Frank reported that Student Academic Board (SAB) would be meeting within the next few weeks to discuss major surveys. The surveys ask majors to evaluate their fields and propose changes. Frank urged the major representatives to encourage students to fill out and return the surveys. Frank also said he would be meeting with the Registrar, Dr. Hamilton, to discuss possible changes to Arena Registration. Frank asked the Senate for suggestions.

The Executive Council announced that elections for SGA officers would be held on February 28. Candidates may give speeches on the preceding Monday in Hynson Lounge. Elections chairperson Kristin Kujowski asked for volunteers to help with the polls and counting the ballots. She also announced that she will be posting the announcements about elections and drawing up the petitions for candidates within the next few weeks. Under the current SGA constitution, the new Executive Committee will meet after spring break.

The SGA had received complaints about the $ 1250 allocated to the Phi Delta Theta fraternity at last weeks' funding meeting. Kelly said he approached Phi Delta Theta about the complaints. Phi Delta Theta agreed to change the $ 1250 allocation and $ 1250 loan to a $ 2500 loan to be repaid over three years. The Senate approved the change and Kelly thanked Phi Delta Theta, stating that the fraternity could have refused to make the change.

Crack Magazine asked the Senate for funding to put out a 25th anniversary issue. Crack has 15 confirmed authors and plans to interview several famous authors including Kurt Vonnegut. The current plans for production include newsprint pages with a 3 or 4 color cover. The goal of this issue is to give Crack Magazine a "reputation it doesn't have." The Senate allocated $ 1400 for Crack magazine. Crack Magazine received $ 1750 last semster, but did not put out an issue.

When governors go astray

Politicians have a funny way of sticking their feet in their mouths. From town dog catchers to presidents, sooner or later the opportunity presents itself, and darn it, they get that old foot stuck in their mouth so tightly it'd take a tractor to pull it out.

The most recent gaffe was that of the beloved governor of Maryland, William Donald Schaefer who chose to alienate roughly half of the state by referring to the Eastern Shore as a...well...the news programs use the word outhouse, to be polite.

Yes, Governor Schaefer has a way with words, to be sure. A more eloquent statement has never been heard by a governor (in office, but for how long one can never be sure.) While the Eastern Shore has its fair share of problems, the Governor should have taken more care with the phrasing of comments, since one never knows what an aide might leak to the press.

Thank you, Governor Schaefer, for insulting the home of Washington College. Or were you simply not thinking? Not every student here lives on Maryland's western shore, and we consider Chestertown to be a home, of sorts. So thank you again, for insulting our home.

Perhaps, since your opinion of the eastern shore is so low, you might consider a bill that would give the eastern shore to Delaware. Or perhaps we, on the less favored shore, are the ideal location for a Palestinian homeland. Wouldn't that be convenient, killing two birds with one stone; you might even get your photo on the cover of Time. Wouldn't that be the crowning achievement in your career.

Billy Don needs a spanking

Dear Editor,

In regards to the hate mail Governor Billy-Don Schafer is apparently famous for, are not his actions similiar to those of former President Richard Nixon before the Watergate scandal when Nixon kept an "enemies" list? Has anyone informed him that the tracing of a license plate for purely selfish purposes is illegal? And where is Billy-Don's mother when he needs a good spanking for his childish behavior? I hope the Maryland state legislature will deal effectively and appropriately with this immature, vengeful behavior.

Very Truly Yours,

The mind is the stuff of immortality

Walking through this campus, I can't help but notice the plethora of moss covered plaques entangled in old tree roots. What a wonderful thing this is. Here I am, years later, looking at the names of ancient alumni. Donate a tree, a building, a million dollar floor, and serve yourself a small slice of immortality, your name carved in stone, cast in bronze, left for thousands of future scholars to ponder upon.

The more I wonder about these names, tastefully plastered about the campus, the more I realize that is exactly what they are, just names, not people, not ideas, in no way influencing me, just names.

After I graduate, I plan on possessing obscene amounts of money. Naturally, this will assure me an annual Christmas card from the alumni association. When I'm old and start to scribble my name at the bottom of the check, no doubt I will think about the things for which I would like to earmark my million dollar donation. Something permanent would be nice, something grandiose, something becoming my obvious significance to world events. A plaque, perhaps? A building? A new lifetime fitness center!

But what was it about Washington College that left a lasting impression on me? Was it the plaques, the buildings, the new racing shells? Was it the people, the professors, the books I read? If I build a new building, I will live forever as a faceless name carved above the doorway. If I endow a scholarship, a faculty position, the newspaper, the library, won't my money influence the thoughts of future students for decades? Plaques are pieces of metal buried in the dirt. The mind is the stuff of immortality.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Issue: How long to do think the war in the Gulf will last? What are the possible outcomes?

Entities of war

I, like 99% of the students here and all around this great nation have experienced war in an extremely detached sense. We have, of course, all grown up in our educational systems, discussing and learning through history books, old newspapers and periodicals, and professors that there were wars. The first half of the of this century, wars dominated international affairs. The threat of war and its effect on the existence of mankind dominated the next four decades.

However, unfortunately, today war is no longer isolated to stories told by old, grey-haired vets and unglorified Vietnam GIs. Today's War in the Gulf allows us to see war and its effects the day it happened, and if we're lucky we see it live. We who have never seen war are thrown into the Gulf Crisis at a personal level like being blindfolded and pushed off a plank; while we fall we have hopes and doubts; the sea that awaits our fall is filled with countless possibilities.

Some experience this crisis at a more personal level, however. As we watch this struggle come alive on CNN, etc., the missiles cross their preplanned airspace and arrive at their preplanned destination faster than our soldiers can open a letter from a loved one. I have no friends or relatives fighting in the war or who live there, hence I consider myself extremely lucky. Those who do, however, are put in a most unenviable situation. Day after excruciating day, night after night, their emotions go round and round like anti-aircraft radar. Their war is completely different from mine. While I sometimes superficially and pragmatically view winning and losing quantitatively, their war is one of writing letters, looking at old photos, comforting friends and growing more fearful of bad news. While I am comfortable with headlines like, "Iraqi Planes Shot Down," or "Iraqi Tanks Destroyed in Desert," I am aware that there are those who carry the war more intimately are only soothed when their loved-ones are home safely.

Whether we are "Protesting for Peace," and/or supporting the troops, just place somewhere in your mind that all of us are in the learning to walk stage when it comes to dealing with the many entities of war.

Matt Giller

The war in the Gulf could not be avoided. We as a country did everything possible in the name of peace. It will probably be a long war. As a solution, Hussein should get out.
Karyn Iacangelo

The war's length will depend on Saddam Hussein's ability to endure. The longer he lasts, the greater the leader he will appear to be. The Iraqis are use to hardship after an eight year war with Iran. I believe this war will last until fall.
John Goebel

Church Hill, MD

I really can't say how long the war will last, so many things could happen. I don't see how anyone could predict when it will end.
Cheryl Rinehart

The war will probably last about seven months with the outcome being Hussein's withdrawl from Kuwait— which would be the only solution to the conflict.
Kris Wallenberg

I quite honestly don't know how long the war will last. We really don't know how long the ground war will take since the liberation of Kuwait will have to include the occupation of Baghdad. I do think military victory will belong to the Allied forces, but assuredly, Saddam Hussein will also claim a victory over the infidels.

Academics versus athletics?

By Penny Fall

It keeps running through my mind. Why are athletics and academics at crossed swords? Why at Washington College, a Division III school, which means that there are no athletic scholarships, is there this antagonism between two of the most important segments of the college experience?

Being both a professor and a coach I fail to see any real difference in our basic mission which is to educate the young people who chose Washington College. Chose is the operative word here. It is a very personal, hopefully informed decision made by young people at a crucial time in their lives. Admissions and the athletic department understand that sports can have a tremendous impact on that choice. And whether we feel it is wise or not, over three hundred members of our present student body would not be here if the athletic program did not exist.

I think the faculty knows this. I am not sure how much impact this has on the negative attitude many of my colleagues seem to harbor towards athletics. They seem to feel that "student-athlete" is an oxymoron. I have often wondered if it is an attitude of superiority or inferiority - psuedointellectualism, or envy. Whether it is the "dumb jock" syndrome or students choosing an away game over class, it is a divisive, unproductive negative which does not have a place at Washington College.

Such an atmosphere can poison the admissions process. Most liberal arts colleges offer approximately the same curricular choices, consequently other variables such as size, location, etc. are given added weight. For many of the "best and the brightest" the sports, the coaches, the facilities, and the playing schedule become the deciding factors. A number of our sports are the direct result of requests from admissions, so that they can compete with other similar colleges. The institutional attitude towards athletics, as perceived by the prospective student-athlete, will have a profound effect on where they choose to go.

The "oxymoron" tag is an insult to our kids. No question that we have students on teams that struggle academically, but we also have non athletes who are not making the grade. Statistically there is no significant difference between the GPAs of the athletes and the student body. Actually a number of athletes achieve grades well above the average and they do it during their competitive season. They have a tendency to organize and utilize their time better.

When students add athletics to their college lives it is a given that they will miss some classes, particularly if it is an outdoor sport. This is not an indictment of the professor or the course, but is a product of a number of variables including point/time constraints, warm up, day light savings time, team structure, and travel. The latter is probably our biggest problem. We are "2 hours away from anything." Also Washington College is on the geographic perimeter in the MAC, which means that if we are to meet our NCAA and conference requirements we must spend a lot of time in vans.

Coaching on the Division III level is far from a glamorous profession. It is an educational process as much as any lecture or lab. Not only must a coach teach the skills and strategies of the particular activity to 14-40 individuals in motion and try to put together a coherent whole, but a coach has the questionable privilege of being graded and second-guessed afterwards in public print. I would hazard a guess that there are few, if any, professors who would like to have their course evaluations made public. Also there is the matter of recruiting . . . the most distasteful aspect of an already pressure-packed profession.

Why coach? First of all you must enjoy working with young people. You are with them more and probably get to know them better than any other segment of the college community. The metamorphosis most of them go through during their 4 years is exciting to witness, but frequently taxing to deal with. Secondly, there is the "thrill of victory and the agony of defeat," which adds a certain spice to life, but it is a double edged sword. As an educator I try to keep their focus on the learning process and the quality of the experience, when everyone else is riveted on the won-lost record. To maintain this perspective against the public's fascination with winning is a constant battle.

The imperative, however, is an intense belief in the personal attributes that can be gained from participating in the athletic experience. Not just learning how to win or lose gracefully, but also how to depersonalize it. How to accept responsibility for your actions and reactions and understand how they effect others. How to challenge yourself to fulfill your potential and then accept your shortcomings. How to come out of yourself subjugating your feelings and problems, no matter how bad the day, for the betterment of the team. Also, it's fun.

Why am I flailing away at ivy covered windmills at this point in time? Because I am tired of bucking the old stereotypes and prejudices as witnessed at last year's faculty meetings. I am tired of defending my profession to people who, for whatever reason, seem to feel threatened by what I do. But more importantly I am fed up with our student-athletes becoming upset because they are, in most cases, undeservedly caught in the middle of the "academic/athletic battle." Fortunately the number of professors who feel this way is small, but it is not insignificant when it generates such profound unhappiness in our students.

Athletics within the college milieu reminds me of a local news broadcast. We have no illusions about being "hard news;" i.e. academics. But we are not a "fluff piece" either. Athletics does have a place, a different but important place, if the broadcast; i.e. the total college experience, is to be complete.

In the world:

UNITED STATES:

President Bush acknowledged yesterday that he is skeptical that air power alone can win the Persian Gulf war. He also announced that he will send Defense Secretary Richard Cheney and Gen. Colin powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Saudi Arabia to asess the progress of the conflict. The purpose of the trip is "to take a final look...[at] when a ground attack should begin," accordin to a senior White House official. At a news conference, Bush remained tough and uncompromising and deflected questions concerning the timing of the ground war. He emphasized that the air assault on Iraq and occupied Kuwait will continue. Bush also said that a cease-fire could not be considered without "a credible, visible, totally convincing withdrawal." A remark made by Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Belonogov, in which he asserted that the war in the Persian Gulf is "getting out of control" and causing "irreparable harm" to the Iraqi people, was indirectly disputed by the President during the news conference. Belonogov was not directly referred to, but Bush again stressed that the U.S. had gone to "extraordinary lengths" to spare civilians non-military targets. Said Bush: "We are not trying to systematically destroy...Iraq."

Hamilton: the doctor is in, the word is out

Phil "Slice" Macek

I don't know about the rest of you but now I know why I came to this school. I thought it was for the peaceful, rustic setting conducive to an invigorating small-college liberal arts education; but I was wrong. I thought it was for the personalized attention and the 13:1 teacher to student ratio; but I was mistaken. I thought it would be for the delicious, award-winning dining hall food and the incomparable experience of living in Kent House; but I erred in my judgment. Dammit, to put it bluntly, I came to Washington College to see and hear Eugene Hamilton pump up the volume at the Coffee House. And this past weekend did not disappoint me. After weeks of agonizing anticipation and monumental hype for "Mean" Gene's show at the C-House, the night had finally arrived. I kicked off the weekend's festivities with a jumping cocktail party as thrown by Don Steele and Co. on Somerset's fourth floor. As fine a party as this was, the time had come for the main event.

I was glad that I had brought my dancin' shoes as I entered the concert hall to the pounding sounds of Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Gimme Three Steps." The air was charged with electricity as I pumped my fist to the jack-hammer beat and heard the vicious hooks rumbling like a funky earthquake. The audience came to rock and rock they did. "Mean" Gene was the captain of this musical odyssey and as an experienced performer he wasn't about to let his legion of fans down. In short, "Mean" Gene the rapping machine whipped the crowd into a frenzy, feeding off the crushing bass lines of hits like "Funky Cold Medina" and the theme to "The Beverly Hillbillies." Make no mistake about it, this was music that made no compromises and went straight for the guts. In the midst of this "bop til you drop" atmosphere was Gene himself, standing confidently behind the keyboards and almost defying the audience not to have a good time.

His musical wizardry coupled with his bold reinterpreting of several time tested rock classics, transcended all boundaries of time and carried the crowd back in time to an era when the music was all that mattered. His virtuoso rendition of Led Zeppelin's immortal epic, "Stairway to Heaven," left his army of admirers free-floating in a rock-n-roll paradise and proved Gene's performance to be one of the most liberating forces in American rock-n-roll history. His cover of the Doors' anthem, "Light My Fire," conveyed all the sexual urgency of the original as done by a wailing Jim Morrison and his fellow bandmates. Gene's voice on "Dancin on the Ceiling" was so over the top that you just couldn't help but believe him. Hell, he seemed to be singing from his sweat glands. Indeed, my experience of this song was further enhanced when I was turned upside-down and hoisted up so I could in fact dance on the ceiling. At this point of the evening I was literally flying high.

There was a desperate manic energy to Gene's version of "Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band," that made me wonder what on earth was preventing a Beatles' reunion. It seemed painfully obvious to me that Gene was surely the heir apparent to the legacy that was and still is the spirit of John Lennon.

Long one of rock's best kept secrets, Gene Hamilton is a true star and he proved his staying power on such "balls to the wall" versions of "Jump" and "Like a Surgeon." At this point, Gene was playing with such raw energy, such inarticulate passion, and such unbridled abandon that it seemed like he might have exploded at any minute. His stunning, hypnotic Beach Boys medley very nearly summed up 25 years of rock-n-roll greatness in about seven minutes and prepared the audience for both the wild charge of "Ramblin' Man" and the psychedelic thrust of "Funky Town."

Although the evening as a whole was pretty hazy for me, I do recall shaking my groove thing to "The Hustle" and complementing my boogie-woogie free for all with a few stage dives to the driving beat that was the foundation for "Sweet Home Alabama." All in all, Gene "the doctor who has his Ph.D. in soulful funkmanship" Hamilton proved himself worthy of the title, "The Hardest Working Man in Show Biz." Ever the craftsman, Gene gave a show that will likely influence an entire population for years to come. His extraordinary gift for touching the very soul of every person in the house clearly labels him as the next rock icon of a lost generation. His impeccable infusion of rock, soul, rap, country, and disco left me dazed and weak in the knees. Looking around me, I clearly saw a few people shed a tear and make no attempt to hide it when Gene played the final note of the evening. Indeed, one misty-eyed senior, Matt Woolston, was so overcome with emotion that all he could say the whole night was, "Where'd he get all the neat stuff?"

Of course, I would have loved to hear such favorites as "Purple Haze," "Highway to Hell," and "One Bourbon, One Scotch, One Beer" and hopefully Gene will consider working these tunes into his playlist for the next show.

Finally, after a physically draining danceathon, the evening of liberation came to an end. While for one night Gene made damn sure that no one would complain about Washington College being dull and boring, one has to wonder when his next rock extravaganza will take place. Lastly, as the curtain came down on the greatest show on earth, I tried to give the rest of my evening some measure of fulfillment. Alas, all I remember is being really drunk and trying to reenact the Battle of Waterloo with a stray cat I had found acting as Napoleon. So, here's hoping that "Mean" Gene plays the C-House again soon and that other colleges don't get wind of his talent. For if this terrible tragedy transpires, W.C. might lose Gene forever to the world of million dollar record contracts and year-long marathon world tours. Long live Gene! Long live rock

Slice has labelled Gene's performance as this generation's Woodstock. He also hopes that someday Gene will play at his wedding.

Living my life in line at the dining hall down under

Phil Macek and Matthew Woolston

We don't even know where to begin. We'ew standing in line trying to get a candy bar before class. Luckily, we got to the snackbar a hour before class so we might just make it. So while standing in line we struck up a conversation.

Matt: Hey Slice, remember the days when you could just walk in here, throw your money on the counter, get your food, and roll?

Phil: Yeah, those days are long gone on the wind. Hell, it's taking me an hour just to get a three minute egg. By the way Stone, I'm looking around and I don't see Miss D anywhere, what's up with that?

Matt: I heard she's vacitioning in Centreville with all the money she got from selling her franchise. By the way did you get that fifteen page manual that tells you how to get around this place?

Phil: I don't think they have one out.

Matt: Well they should.

Phil: Hey Stone, are we still going to play basketball today?

Matt: Don't have to. I got my exercise taking my order over to the register and then coming back to the counter for my food. I guess they got this new computer system to save money rather than save time.

Phil: Save money? Have you gone stupid? This is Washington College, we don't save money here. By the way, don't we get to charge fifty dollars worth of food anymore?

Matt: Got me hoss. I think it's another one of those ploys they use to help us deal with life after college. And even if we can stll charge, I wish they would go back to those green and yellow "D dollars."

Phil: Look man, I think that's your food over there. Why don't you go get it then we can do some extra studying before class?

Matt: That would be nice, but I have to stay in this line so I can pay for it. And if I leave this line we'll certainly be late for class.

Phil: This new system is really beat, I got a cup of milk once and by the timeI had paid for it and picked it up the milk had turned to butter.

Matt: Here comes our already paid for food. Let's get out of here and never come back.

Phil: O.K. we still have five minutes to class. We'll have just enough time for the walk over there. Bring back MIss D! Please!

Crew team shatters world record

by Matt Giller

Last Friday night the Washington College men's and women's crew team rowed their way into the record books by out-erging the globe.

As the sun was setting on the Hall of Fame room in the Cain Gymnasium the crew team completed its 130 hour odyssey, and left the old British record of 120 hours eating their wake.

President Trout christened the voyage with the first 400 meters. Following the prez were the 47 dedicated men and women of the WAC crew team who took shifts all week to sustain the erging. Philosophy pundit Dr. Peter Tapke garciously sweated for the record as well.

The idea of erging for consecutive hours was originated by the ergometer company, Concept II. As a cure for boredom, employees of the company would row on the ergometer. It became so popular within the company that they rowed consecutively for 80 hours. W.C. crew coach Davenport helped his Albany University brake the record with 96 straight hours of erging.

That record was broken twice more - by New Zealand(110 hours) and a team from Great Britain(120 hours).

New coach Davenport was extremely impressed with the team's effort, "the dedication of the kids is inspiring to see."

He stressed the importance of the effort and not the actual record, "although the record is something to be incredibly proud of, the kids shouldn't lose sight of the fact that an indelible lesson was learned last week. The lesson that with hard work and dedication, anything can be accomplished."

Women's swim team trounces once again

The day started with the relaye team of Jennifer Green, Mimi Devlin, Sam Streamer and Karen Brady winning. Placing second right behind them was the relay team of Vickie Vahos, Joan Colton, Karen Prendergast and Ramsey Bingham giving the WAC an early fifteen point lead.

Junior phenom Kasey Carroll continues to be undefeated this season winning the 500 and 1000 Freestyle.

Carroll also broke her own team record in the 200 Butterfly with a scorching time of 2:16.9.

Leslie Newcomb had two season best swims in the 1000 Freestyle and 100 Breastroke. Green broke her best time in the 100 Backstroke. Her time was the third best all-time at Washington College.

Bingham also had her best swim of the season qualifying her for the MACs in the 50 Freestyle.

Devlin and Kelly Loftus added first place turns in the 200 IM and 100 Breastroke respectively.

Colton, Brady, Kristen Callazzo, Vahos, and Prendergast added the final team points for the impressive victory.

This Wednesday they have a meet against Western Maryland at 6:00. The meet will end the regular season for the WAC before the Conference championships.

Basketball crushes York and Haverford

By Matt Giller

While the war in the Gulf continues, the WAC took no prisoners back home while they trounced York College, 73-57 and the Fords of Haverford, 94-63.

Last Thursay night the Sho'men hosted York and played an outstanding second half en route to a huge margin of victory.

Riding on the coattails of guard allen Lester's 11 points(15 total points), the WAC went into the lockerroom with a very precarious 4 point lead, 33-29.

However, freshman Geoff Rupert(17 points, 12 rebounds) scored eight of the Shoremen's first ten points of the second half spreading the WAC lead to 43-35.

York crawled back to make it a 51-47 game in favor of the WAC. However, freshman Greg Rogers9 points, 3 assists) hit a three-pointer and a layup and sophomre Darren Vican(14 points) slammed an alleyoop down to give the WAC an irreversible lead.

Junior co-captain Tim Liddy paced the Shoremen with his 24 points and 12 rebounds as they romped Haverford for the second time this year. Lester, Rupert and Peter Basel each had 14 points. The team shot an amazing 55% from the field. The victory raised the Shoremen's record to 6-13.

Sting sails on Soul Cages

by Raphael Koster

Sting
The Soul Cages
Produced by Hugh Padgham and Sting

Sting's long awaited follow-up to ...Nothing Like the Sun is perhaps his most ambitious and personal work to date. It is his attempt to deal with the pain of the deaths of his parents, the pain of the deaths of his co-workers in the recent staging of Threepenny Opera, and to deal with how personal faith affects one's methods of dealing with grief. The album is dedicated to his father, Ethyl Eichelberger, and John Dexter (the latter two were his co-star and director for Threepenny Opera, and both passed away soon after the run ended).

Sting fans will be glad to know that both Branford Marsalis' sleek saxophone and Kenny Kirkland's stunning keyboard wizardry are back with him on this outing, but do not expect the kind of flashy jazz-inflected rock that was so prevalent on the previous solo albums. Instead, the album opens with the haunting sound of Northumbrian pipes, played by Kathryn Tickell, setting the stage for a song cycle of somber intensity. Musically, the album lacks as many hooks as Sting's earlier work- most of the songs are not catchy; instead, we get great stylistic cohesiveness and dramatic moments.

More than once Padgham (producer for, among others, Suzanne Vega, Phil Collins, Genesis, and the Dream Academy) manages to evoke the Phil Spector "Wall of Sound" with the extensive use of synthesized strings. This is a very lush sounding album, perhaps a tad too lush- some of the instrumental flourishes get lost in the shuffle. The constant background of strings sliding along at a steady tempo reminds me of Sinead O'Connor, but the synths here do not usually get the interesting part to play.

This is a carefully integrated album, musically speaking: the melodies and orchestrations of previous songs return whenever a theme is touched upon in a later track. It also features Sting's first instrumental work ("St. Agnes and the Burning Train") since "The Dream of the Blue Turtles." In summary, the sound that Sting was going for on ...Nothing Like the Sun but didn't quite reach is exactly what he has achieved with The Soul Cages.

Lyrically, this album is excellent, and among the best efforts of recent years. The very personal response to his parents' deaths is explored in a carefully conceived song cycle. The songs are primarily narrative ones, and are often centered around a nautical motif.

The first track, "Island of Souls," is about his childhood and the life of a family in a shipbuilding town that offers no hope for its working class. In the song, the narrator's father dies. This is followed by "All This Time," which is about the failure of organized religion to provide comfort to the bereaved. Speaking of two priests, Sting says, "One to learn, one to teach/ Which way the cold wind blows/ Fussing and flapping in priestly black/ Like a murder of crows." Never mind the fact that this is a bouncy song and the first single- it is a bitter condemnation of an institution by a man who found no surcease from grief. "Men go crazy in congregations," Sting sings, "But they only get better one by one..."

That is far from being the only lyrical gem on the album, but the thing to keep in mind here is the way everything is interconnected. We follow with songs about the obsession of love ("Mad About You", also pervaded with religious imagery), the problem of guilt and failure to express love to one's parents ("Why Should I Cry for You?"), about a completely cynical view of the world belied by its own refrain about guilt ("Jeremiah Blues, Part 1"), and finally, two more songs that return to the narrator of the first song: "Soul Cages" and "The Wild Wild Sea."

The latter of these is about a dream, in which the narrator finds himself aboard a ship steered by ghosts- and the ship, on the verge of foundering, is saved by the captain, who wears his father's face. The song ends, "If a prayer today is spoken/ Please offer it for me/ When the bridge to Heaven in broken/ And you're lost on the wild wild sea..." We follow right into a recap of sorts of "Island of Souls"- the title track, in which the boy of the first song saves his father's soul through a wager with the King of the Sea. The last verse is identical to the last verse of the earlier song, and we see that redemption is achieved.

The final song on the album, "When The Angels Fall," offers a recapitulation, a short odyssey of guilt, fear, mortality, and love. In it, churches fall as one man takes his father's cross from the wall- men with no roots wander graveyards in search of meaning, and find none. The album ends with a demand: "Bring down the angels/ Cast them from my sight/ I never want to see/ A million suns at midnight.../ You can't control us anymore/ When the angels fall." The album therefore stands as a sort of reply to Paul Simon's Rhythm of the Saints, in that Simon's work is about a discovery of spirituality, whereas Sting is seeking a sort of human faith rather than a holy one.

The Soul Cages is definitely not for everyone. The bounciest tunes are in fact quite depressing. But it is a very thoughtful work, and a remarkable artistic achievement: one to be appreciated emotionally and aesthetically, and not as casually as the typical rock album. It is interesting to see today's most talented songwriters edging away from rock and into more experimental territory without sacrificing accessibility. Sting with this album has experienced his cathartic moment, and thanks to his talent and musical skill, we as listeners are permitted to experience it with him. But it demands a careful, attentive ear, and a willingness to meet the artist halfway. For those who want more than a rhythm to tap to, the sound of angels falling is to be heralded as the first great album of 1991.

Sting will kick off his American tour soon and will play the Capital Center in the first week of March. He will be touring with a stripped down band that includes Kirkland.

Harrison's Black Pearls

The great women blues singers of this century will be the subject of a lecture at Washington College February 13, 1991 in honor of Black History Month. "Black Pearls: Women's Contributions to the Blues" will be given by Dr. Daphne Duval Harrison, chair of the Department of African American Studies at the University of Maryland Baltimore County. The lecture is set for Wednesday, Feb 13. at 8 p.m. in Washington College's Casey Academic Center. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Dr. Harrison, who is chair of the Maryland Commission on African American Culture, is a specialist in jazz and blues music and musicians with a master's degree in music from Northwestern University and a doctorate in education from the University of Miami. She is the author of Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s, a study of the influential blues singers Sippie Wallace, Edith Wilson, Victoria Spivey and Alberta Hunter. Using recordings and photographs to augment her lecture, Dr. Harrison will discuss these and other women who have made lasting contributions to the history of the blues in America.

"Black Pearls" is presented by the Washington College Committee on African American History and Culture. For more information call the college at (301) 778-2800, ext. 402.

PERSIAN GULF:

Since the war in the Gulf began three weeks ago, some 47,000 sorties have been flown by aircraft from six nations. The allies have dropped everything from laser-guided missiles to leaflets urging immediate surrender and suggesting how that might be done. By all accounts, official or unofficial, the "success" of the war is impressive. All of Iraq's biological, nuclear and chemical capabilities are said to eliminated; command and control centers crippled. Many Scud missile sites, airfields, ammo and fuel dumps, and countless defense industries ahve been virtually destroyed. These results, however, will not determine when and if there will be a ground war. That decision will be made after allied war planes have had a chance to destroy Iraq's 50,000 man army, with it's 4,000 tanks and 2,500 armoured personnel carriers. The immense army mostly entrenched behind elaborate fortifications in Kuwait and southern Iraq. The allied assault on the Iraqi army began in earnest last week.

SOVIET UNION:

A republic-wide nonbinding ballot on independence that Lithuania plans to hold Saturday was declared invalid Tuesday by Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. Gorbachev said the poll is "without legal foundation" and is an attempt by Lithuania's leaders "to generate support for their separatist aims. This latest incident is sure to intensify the confrontation between Moscow and the pro-independance government in Lithuania. The decree by Gorbachev voiding the ballot was rejected by Lithuanian President Vytaustas Landsbergis saying: "it reflects an old tradition of the Soviet Union, according to which law and government arise not from the will of the people, expressd by a free vote, but are formed instead by the decrees of autocratic rulers." He went on to say that any action to prevent the poll would constitute "impermissable political interference in the matters of the sovereign Lithuanian state." Although the decree referred vaguely to preventing the poll, there was no indication whether Moscow plans to block it. Landsbergis also rejected Gorbachev's demand that a referendum be held in order to begin legal secession proceedings, saying that the Soviet Union illegally annexed the baltic states in 1940 and the declaration of independence made by Lithuania's parliament last March is legally binding.

The families involved in every instance play an active role. They participate in every aspect of the renovations. They work right along side the volunteers.

Habitat makes these houses available to low income families by granting no interest loans. The loan money paid back is what the organization uses to fund their next project.

Chester Valley Habitat is the local branch of Habitat International and is new to the area. They are currently starting their first project and need the help of the Kent County community and the Washington College community. This project involves a house that the organization moved from High Street to outside of Georgetown. On February 23rd, help is needed to prepare the foundation. No special skills are required. Volunteers should wear old clothes. Shovels, hoes, and five gallon buckets are needed so please bring any to the site if they are available to you. Lunch will be served to all those helping. The rain date is set for March 3rd.

Those interested should telephone 778-2977 for more information and directions to the house.

Aids on college campuses nationwide

By: Renee Guckert

Last spring, like many college students, a young girl of twenty scampered off to Ft. Lauderdale for warm, sunny beaches and lots of uninhibited fun. While there, she met a guy, and a week later they began sleeping together. When she returned home to Baltimore, she explained to her mother about the fabulous man she'd fallen madly in love with. Her excitement, however, was short-lived. Days later, a small package arrived in the mail– contained in brown paper wrapping was a small coffin with a message that read "Welcome to the world of AIDS." Her fate had been sealed for she soon was found to be HIV positive.

This girl's story, although tragic and frightening, contains a message to be learned by all: AIDS doesn't discriminate– anyone can be infected. According to the United States Public Health Service, as of April 30 of last year, over 80,000 Americans had died of AIDS, and over 1 million are currently infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). More and more, the disease is spreading throughout all college campuses infecting individuals even after just a single "one night stand." Due to the obligation of maintaining confidentiality, Washington College Health Services was unable to confirm whether or not there are students here who are presently infected with AIDS. They did, however, explain that 1 out of every 1,000 college students nationwide is currently HIV positive. A health service representative commented that "college students still think that 'it can't happen here,' but statistics say it surely can."

One of the factors aiding the continual spread of the virus is ignorance. It may simply be that everyone is just sick and tired of hearing that it can happen to them and that they need to take precautions. The fact of the matter is that individuals, especially those on college campuses, still insist on practicing unsafe sex. Forget about the birth control pill– it may protect against pregnancy but it's not going to protect you against death. Believe all the pamphlets you read and all the specialists you hear who constantly nag you that when you have sex with someone, you have sex with every person they've slept with because it's the absolute truth. Many individuals don't even show signs of the virus for years but simply carry it, consequently passing it on to others, perhaps without even knowing it. When someone does begin to acquire symptoms of the HIV or AIDS, the pattern is a slow, agonizing death including ailments such as Kaposi's sarcoma, a form of skin cancer which leaves painful, bruise-like lesions on the body, pneumocystis (AIDS related pneumonia), muscle and brain deterioration, loss of eyesight, and countless other problems. Knowing all this, why would anyone possibly risk being infected for one night or even countless nights of uninhibited, unsafe sex? Unfortunately, there are those who still do.

The key, then, is to educate ourselves and others and to continue to remain educated in order to fight ignorance. More current information becomes available every day as research slowly, but surely progresses with hints to possible cures and vacines. Frequent misconceptions about AIDS include the following:

1. You can contract the disease by using facilities previously used by an infected individual such as water fountains and toilet seats.

FACT: although you can expect to catch crabs from a contaminated toilet seat, there has been no documented evidence that you can catch AIDS from one.

2. You can contract AIDS by kissing, hugging, or touching someone who is infected.

FACT: The truth remains that the virus is only transmitted through the interaction of bodily fluids such as blood, vaginal discharge, and semen. Casual contact is not a risky activity and should not be eliminated because someone you know is sick.

3. AIDS patients obviously lead dangerous lifestyles and therefore, they deserve what they're getting.

FACT: AIDS patients like the rest of us are human beings whether they're children, homosexuals, women, men, or i.v. drug users. Ignorance of this type continues to be the most nauseating of all. This stereotype, the one that claims AIDS patients are to blame for the disease they are plagued with, is the very thing that staps ugly prejudices in the minds of many Americans; this kind of ignorance must be stopped if we are to combat this deadly predator.

With these few concepts in mind, it's time that college students across the country as well as all members of this society stop pointing fingers of blame and start educating

Amendments to SGA constituion proposed at meeting

The Student Government Association of Washington College met in the Sophie Kerr room of Miller Library on Tuesday, February 12. SGA President Kevin Kelly called the meeting to order, and after roll call, Vice President Brook Frank swore in the new off-campus senator, Chris Deri.

Social Chair Katie Simms reported that the band Blues Traveler has been tentatively scheduled to perform at the College on April 5. The executive council is continuing its efforts to bring the band They might be Giants to campus this spring as well.

The Senate approved $ 100 to help funding Brook Frank's trip to Rollins College. Frank is attempting to help set up an exchange program between small colleges in different regions of the country. Frank will meet with the Board of Visitors and Governors of Rollins College. Rollins is a small, liberal arts college located near Orlando, Florida. If implemented, the exchange program would allow eligible Washington College students the chance to attend a similarly sized college in different parts of the country. Frank's trip is also being funded by the Office of Student Affairs.

Frank reported on the recent meetings of the Academic Council. During the meeting,

Hands Out needs help

By: Jen Del Nero

Hands Out, WC's newly formed volunteer operation, is sponsoring an open house for students to meet and talk with representatives of various community groups about positions available to which students can donate time. The event, which will be on Wednesday, February 20 from 10-4 in the lobby of the Casey Academic Resource Center also promotes the student/faculty directory Hands Out recently published.

One of the focal groups that will be represented is Big Brothers/Big Sisters, an organization that matches kids from ages 6-16 with an adult of the same gender.

According to Lee Peterson of the program, volunteers are often instrumental in the development of those children, who frequently are from single parent homes, by offering attention and support which in turn increases the youngsters' self-esteem and outlook on life. Peterson adds that these pairings afford an opportunity for the child and the family as a whole since the intervention of another adult can release some of the parent's burden.

Volunteers for Big Brothers/Big Sisters are asked to devote several hours a week to their match, yet other arrangements are possible that do not demand as great a time com-

Honor, honor

The Washington College Honor Code needs help. The obvious kind of help is student involvement, reporting cheating incidents, vandalism etc...but that doesn't seem to happen very often around here. The other kind of help is tightening up punishment, in short, stricter enforcement of the Honor Code.

For starters, change the language of the Honor Code. Get rid of the mights, the woulds, the coulds, and substitute will. You will get kicked off your team for cheating. You will be expelled. You will get a fair hearing, and a just punishment if you are guilty.

Next, professors should change their exams, and not give the same exam year in and year out. Don't leave exams unproctored. In short, don't trust the students taking the exam. Sounds pretty harsh, doesn't it?

The reality of the situation is that every time someone cheats on an exam, everyone else loses. If the person doesn't get caught, they destroy the curve. They make the time the other students spent on studying worthless. They make our degree from Washington College worthless, because they are getting off without putting the time in that everyone else did.

There is very little actually wrong with our Honor Code. What makes Washington College's Honor Code different from the Honor Code at Washington and Lee is that Washington and Lee uses strict enforcement and sure punishment to reinforce its honor code.

Yes, Washington College students should be adults, and should abide by the rules of the Honor Code without threat of punishment. We should be able to leave dorm room doors unlocked, or our book bags outside the Dining Hall, because we should be able to trust our peers. The problem is that we can't. Maybe an Honor Code can't change human nature, but a strcitly enforced one can set examples.

Woops, we goofed...

In the SGA article in last week's issue of the Elm, we mistakenly referred to the Blackheart's Ball as an open all-campus party. It is not. The Balckheart's Ball is by invitation only. The Elm regrets the error.

Also, the campus voices photos of Chris Wallenburg and Karyn Iacangelo were switched. Again, the Elm regrets the error.

Habitat for Humanity needs College assistance

By James Plaskitt

During lunch and dinner next week, there will be a sign-up booth in the Dining Hall manned by members of the newly organized Hands Out programs of Washington College. Hands Out is asking for student contributions of time and materials for the Habitat for Humanity program. Habitat will be helping to dig and level a foundation for a house in Georgetown on Saturday, February 23. They have asked the College for volunteers through the Hands Out program.

Students and faculty are encouraged to sign up for the project. No experience is necessary, just the desire to help others through this community project. Volunteers are asked to wear sensible shoes and clothing they won't mind getting dirty. Faculty members who would like to help, but won't be able to participate, are asked to bring shovels, hoes, picks, and barrels, with their names on them, and put them in a box in the Faculty Mailroom. People with cars who are willing to carpool would be greatly appreciated. Two caravans will be leaving from the William Smith Parking Lot at 9 A.M. and 1 P.M. There will be returning trips at 12 noon and 5 P.M. Volunteers will be fed lunch at a church near the homesite, and help is also needed with lunch.

The Hands Out program is a new campus organization based on the idea of volunteerism. The memory of the Garnett School playground project is not so distant, and Hands Out hopes to keep that spirit of college involvement alive and growing as a way to strengthen town and gown ties. Hands Out has created a directory of volunteer programs that is available at the Career Development Office. The directory lists organizations in the community that range from teaching handicapped children to ride to programs for the elderly to environmental and recycling campaigns. All organizations will appreciate student support be it by individuals, fraternities or teams.

Hands Out offers students the opportunity to take a break from school work and contribute something positive to the Chestertown community. By helping others, the Washington College community of faculty and students get to experience the joy and satisfaction of giving. All members of the College community are invited to take advantage of what Hands Out has to offer.

the council discussed the possibility of a math requirement at the College, as well as curricular changes including new courses in the Math, Business, and Political Science departments. Frank also reported on his recent meeting with the Registrar, Dr Hamilton. The format of registration will be changed by next fall.

The executive council formally presented an amendment to the constitution that announces the creation of the Charles Hathaway Trout Council on Undergraduate Research. According to the proposed amendment, the purposed of the council is to "review all requests submitted to the council for funding on the undergraduate Academic level [and] decide whether the requests are valid" based upon six criteria including academic standing of said students, need and possible benefit, significance to course of study, favorable exposure for Washington College, alternative resources available, and the availability of council funds.

A second amendment to the constitution was submitted concerning elections. The proposed amendment sets the dates for executive council, class officers, Academic Board, and dorm senator elections. It also would change the date when the new executive council would take over, pushing it back to the next to last Senate meeting. Executive Council-elect members would be required to attend all Executive Council, and senate meetings between the election and taking office but would have no voting rights. The proposed amendment also fixes the location for SGA and class officer elections. Both amendments will be voted on at

In the world: Soviet Union sends envoy to Baghdad

IRAQ:

Allied bombardments of Baghdad continued yesterday damaging two government ministries, while President Saddam Hussein met with a Soviet envoy whom he reportedly told that he is "prepared to extend cooperation" in efforts to end the Gulf war. The statement to Soviet emissary Yevgeny Primakov that Saddam is willing to help the Soviet Union and other nations find a peaceful settlement to the crisis drew skepticism from the Bush administration. However, Saddam also condemned the actions of the United States and vowed that Iraq would make "the sacrifices needed until the aggression and the aggressors are beaten back."

Baghdad radio, monitored Tuesday night from Cyprus, said that Primakov had delivered a private message from Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev to Saddam. The braodcast went on to say that Saddam was willing to cooperate with other nations in the interest of finding a peaceful, equitable, and honorable solution to the situation in the Middle East. U.S. administration officials noted that the broadcast and the earlier statement by Saddam failed to mention Iraq's occupation of Kuwait and appeared to tie peace in the region to other problems such as the Palestinian issue. This "linkage" has been repeatedly rejected by the U.S.

SOVIET UNION:

A plan involving unnamed Western and Soviet banks to overthrow President Mikhail Gorbatchev and restore capitalism has been thwarted, claims Soviet Prime Minister Valentin Pavlov. In an interview, Pavlov said that those involved had hoped to create a "financial catastrophe" by flooding the country with worthless rubles. He said "advocates of instant privatization" would have seized the opportunity to sell the country out to the West. "Such operations are conducted in many regions of the world when someone wants to change the political system or overthrow unwanted leaders. Someone simply decided that President Gorbachev had become a nuisance and had to be removed," Pavlov said. He added that the plan had not been successful because of his controversial decision last month to remove high-denomination ruble notes from circulation. Pavlov provided no evidence to back up his allegations, which are much like those of the communist controlled sections of the media. Pavlov said he was obliged to keep certain details quiet and added that the "fiancial war" against the Soviet Union continues.

CHINA:

Two Chinese democracy advocates were sentenced Tuesday to 13 years in prison for theis role as major figures behind the Tiananmen Square protest in 1989 by Chinese Communist Authorities in Beijing. The courts sentences, which accused economist Chen Ziming and journalist Wang Juntao of subverting the socialist system, were the most severe since the current round of prosecutions began in late 1990. Along with government subversion, the two men were also convicted of organizing illegal groups and directing "attacks against the armed forces" while under martial law. Chen has been on a hunger strike since February 7th in an attempt tp postpone his trial.

The official New China News Agency said "the pair committed very serious crimes but have so far shown no willingness to repent." Another man, researcher Liu Gang, worked closely with Chen and helped organize protesters during the 1989 uprising. He was also convicted of government subversion, but because he acknowledged his crimes and demonstrated a willingness to "repent" he recieved only a 6 year sentence.

The debut of the Washington College dating game

Hello I am your host, Jason Mason, and I would like to welcome you to the latest greatest game show to hit W.C. since groinecology. This is the dating game, where today a lovely bachelorette where take her pick from three strapping young studs for a dream date in south Jersey. So let's not waste anymore time and get right to the action.

Our lucky bachelors are screened off, so before we bring out the lucky lady let's take a moment to meet our three dashing he-men.

Jason: Bachelor #1, would you please introduce yourself?

Bach.#1: Hello Jason. My name is Omar Toolwanker, I'm a triple major in Spanish, French, and German, I like all dining hall food and my G.P.A. is a 4.3.

Jason: Well it sounds like you would have alot to offer to our young lady Omar, but let's move on shall we? Bachelor #2, would you please say a few words.

Bach.#2: A few words.

Jason: Please don't be that literal #2.

Bach.#2: Sorry Jason. Well my name is Garth, I like drinking beer, pounding beer, and chugging beer. I don't have a major, but I do have two minors in history and english. I'm a senior who wants to be a professional arm wrestler like Stallone in "Over the Top" and my G.P.A. is .02. Oh wait a minute, that was the result of my last breat test on the way to the studio. Gosh Jason, I can't remember my G.P.A.

Jason: That's O.K. I had the opportunity of speaking with your parole officer and he tells me it's a 0.6.

Garth: Good thing that wasn't my breath test result, or I'd be in jail.

Jason: Yeah, good thing Garth. Let's move on to #3. Hello, #3, are you there?

Bach.#3: Hello Jason, my name is Biff Carlin. I'm an extremely conceited senior majoring in Business. I just know I'm destined for greatness and my hobbies include looking at myself in the mirror and badgering people into telling me how great I am. Don't you think so?

Jason: Of course Biff. But let's bring out our young bachelorette and see what she thinks of you guys. Now remember guys, she's going to ask a series of questions and then, based on your answers, she's going to pick her dream date for that all expenses paid fantasy vacation in south Jersey. Are you ready? Well good luck. And now I'd like to bring out our young contestant. She's a senior at W.C. majoring in both astrophysics and paleontology. She hails from Rubberneck, Iowa; would you please give a warm welcome to Miss Rosie Palmer.

Jason: Hello Rosie, it's really great to have you on your show.

Phil "Slice" Macek

Rosie: Thank you Jason, it's a great thrill. All my life, I've wanted to be on the Dating Game. You know, most girls dream of being Miss America or guests on the Oprah show, but not me; I wanted to be on a cheesy show like this and pick some poor sap to abuse and destroy.

Jason: Well isn't that a lovely sentiment. Let's get started shall we? Rosie if you'll take your seat and commence with the questioning.

Rosie: O.K. Bachelor #1, If I were a kind of Deli meat I'd be imported ham because I'm fat and greasy. What kind of meat would you be and why?

Bach.#1: I think I would be German bologna because I'm a German major and my father is part German.

Rosie: That's a good answer. Bachelor#2, what kind of meat would you be?

Bach.#2: I think that I would be a big hunk of Jewish salami because it goes so well with beer. And Rosie, I like beer.

Rosie: That's funny #2, I'm a big fan of salami myself. Bachelor#3, what kind of meat would you be?

Bach.#3: I 'd probably be the most expensive kind Rosie, because I'm the greatest. Hell, the Deli owner would probably put me on my own shelf away from those other kinds of inferior meats.

Rosie: Well, I see that we're not exactly lacking in self confidence, are we #3?

Bach.#3: Not me toots.

Rosie: Next question. Bachelor #1, my dad is pretty old-fashioned when it comes to my dating. If you came to the house to take me out one day and he said that I had to be back by 9:15, what would your reply be?

Bach.#1: I would say it's no problem because I have to be in bed by 9:30 myself. Except on weekends when my Mom let's me stay up til eleven, and sometimes she doesn't even make me take a bath.

Rosie: Aren't you a lucky guy. Bachelor#2, what would you say if my Dad said to have me back by 9:15?

Bach.#2: I would say, "You want her back by the middle of September? That's no problem at all."

Rosie: Good answer #2, I don't know how much my Dad would have liked it, but I thought it was cute.

Bach.#2: Hey Jason, do you mind if I pop a brew? It's the last one of this six pack.

Jason: I'm sorry #2, but I really can't. Rosie would you please continue?

Rosie: Sure Jason. Bachelor #3, what would you say to my dad?

Bach.#3: I would tell him that he is inferior to me and that I will decide what time your curfew should be.

Rosie: I don't think he would like that very much.

Bach#3: Yeah, well if I couldn't be me either I wouldn't like it too much.

Rosie: O.K. last question. Bachelor#1, if there's one word in the English language that describes me it's the word "Nasty." What one word sums up your total personality?

Bach.#1: I would have to say that the word that perfectly describes me is "Sissy." I've always been a mama's boy for as long as I can remember and my one goal in life is to live at home until I'm at least 42.

Rosie: Well isn't that nice. Bachelor #3, I think I can already guess this, but what's the one word that sums up your personality?

Bach.#3: Obviously, that word is "Perfect." I knew from a very young age that I was flawless. I've always been the best at everything I do and I will continue to dominate people forever.

Jason: O.K. Rosie, it's time to pick your escort. Will it be the homely Omar, the burnt out Garth, or the high and mighty Biff? Rosie, the choice is yours.

Rosie: I want to go with you Jason. You're the one I really care about. Come on, let's steal away forever and live at the beach and listen to Christopher Cross albums all day.

Jason: I think I'm gonna throw up. Well everone this is the W.C. dating gameand I'm Jason Mason, Goodnight.

Men's swim team WINS!

By Matt Giller

Merely a tune up for the 1992 Olympic Games in Barcelona for the Shoremen swim team?

No, just victory number #1 for the fledgling WAC water juggernauts.

The team battled but lost their first five meets. However, the Sho'men looked as if they were web-footed in their meet against Lebanon Valley.

The WAC handidly defeated LBC 86-66 last Saturday, however were defeated by Western Maryland Wednesday night 91-55 in their last meet of their inaugural season finishing at 1-6. The Sho'men team members, however, exhibited extraordinaoved times in both meets.

In the victory aginst Lebanon Valley, the WAC shot out to an 11-0 lead when Davis Bright, Todd Deitelbaum, captain Troy Petenbrink and Alex Nasjletti cruised to victory in the 200 medley relay.

Mike Frey stroked his way to a personal best time in the 1000 freestyle.

Brian Basso later shettered the school record books with outstanding times in the 500 free and the 200 IM.

Later Basso teamed up with Marc Brewen to give the WAC a one-two punch in the 500 free and give the Sho'men a 73-55 lead that they would never relinquish.

Going into the last meet of a season swimming purists would rather forget, the Sho'men, fueled by their recent triumph, shattered more records - some personal as well as school.

Although they lost to stingy Western Maryland, the WAC members unbelievably improved and excelled in almost every event.

David Bright continues to improve in the 200 and 100 free.

Nasjletti had personal bests in all of the free events, while Frey had personal bests in the 50 and 100 free.

Petenbrick had a personal best in the 200 IM, while first time swimmer, Deitelbaum, a senior, had personal bests in the his last three events (50 free, 100 breastroke, and the 50 free leg in the relay).

The biggest story of the day was in the 100 butterfly, where the much anticipated "grudge match" between Basso and Wunderlich. Basso held the school record for the first half of the season, while Wunderlich reigned in the second half.

No one knew how this one would unfold, but one thing for certain, there were going to be some waves made.

As the two touched the walls Wunderlich matched the school record; however, Basso trimmed it by an incredible two seconds.

When the meet ended, the first men's swim season came to a close. This was not a season, of course, to judge by wins and losses, but by spirit. A quality that, through the upstarts of several fledgling sports teams(i.e. the men's rugby club), maybe should be more appreciated than win-loss records. Congrats.

Terps hand netters first loss

By Fred Wyman

The Washington College men's tennis team played their first match of the soring season on Sunday at College Park, Md. The reason for such an early start was the opportunity to get a shot at an "elusive" University of Maryland team.

Sunday's match between the Terps and the Sho'men was a classic "David and Goliath" confrontation as the tiny Division III school squared off against Division I and ACC power U of M.

Unlike the biblical story, however, the Shorenetters came up ne "stone" short of toppling the giant university.

Playing in Maryland's three urt bubble, doubles were played first. The Terps jumped out a 2-0 lead taking #1 and #2 doubles in straight sets.

Scott Read and Irakli Metrevelli fell 6-4, 6-2 at #1 doubles, while Alberto Diaz and Andy Bohutinsky bowed 6-2, 6-3 at #2 doubles.

W.C.'s Carlos Nuno and Trevor Hurd rallied from a set down to nip Jamie Ashworth and Adam Pratt, 2-6, 6-4, 7-5, preventing Washington from being blanked in doubles.

The Terps' Marco Turra stopped Read 6-3, 6-3 to give Maryland a 3-1 advantage. Maryland enjoyed leads of 3-2 and 4-2, then Hurd and Emilio Bogado notched back to back victories at #4 and #5 singles respectively. Hurd edged Jaun Coto 6-4, 6-4 and Bogado oulasted Mark Ortiz 6-4, 3-6, 6-3 to even the count at 4-4.

The upset minded Shoremen fell when freshman Nuno tried valiantly to secure the triumph for Washington; however, he succumbed in 3 hard fought sets - 6-2, 3-6, 6-2.

Junior transfer Irakli Metreveli had the other victory for the Shoremen. Metreveli whipped Greg O'Connor 7-5, 6-2.

The Sho'men netters are off two weeks before they travel to Charlottesville, Va to face another ACC foe in the Wahoos of Virginia.

Women's swim team: another day at the office

Matt Giller

The Shorewomen finished up the regular season with an amazing 9-2 record by drubbing Western Maryland 117-54 last Saturday.

The meet also culminated one of the finest seasons ever for the young squad as evidenced by the fact that they are sending an unprecedented 12 swimmers to compete in the Middle Atlantic Conference Championships.

The 200 free relay team of Megdalena Fuchs, Sam Streamer, Mimi Devlin and Kasey Carroll set a new school record.

Coach Kim Lessard said these were the fastest four freestyles to swim together in W.C. history and they proved it by lowering the school record by over a second. Lessard commented, "they are going to surprise some people at the MAC's next week."

The 200 medley relay team of Jennifer Green, Leslie Newcomb, Mimi Devlin and Sam Streamer won the opening race with a season best time.

Streamer added two firsts in the 100 and 200 free. Fuchs had a season best time in the 50 free to win.

Carroll added, as usual, first place times in the 400 IM and 500 free.

Newcomb won the 100 breastroke, while Devlin cruised to victory in the 100 butterfly.

Karen Prendergast(who was celebrating her birthday) had a season best time in the 100 backstroke for a second and Kelly Loftus qualified for the MAC's while finishing third.

Other important place finishes included Kristen Callazzo (second in the 50 free), Ramsey Bingham (fourth in the 50 free), Karen Brady (second in the 100 fly), Joan Colton (fifth in the 100 fly), Green (third in the 100 and 200 freestyle events).

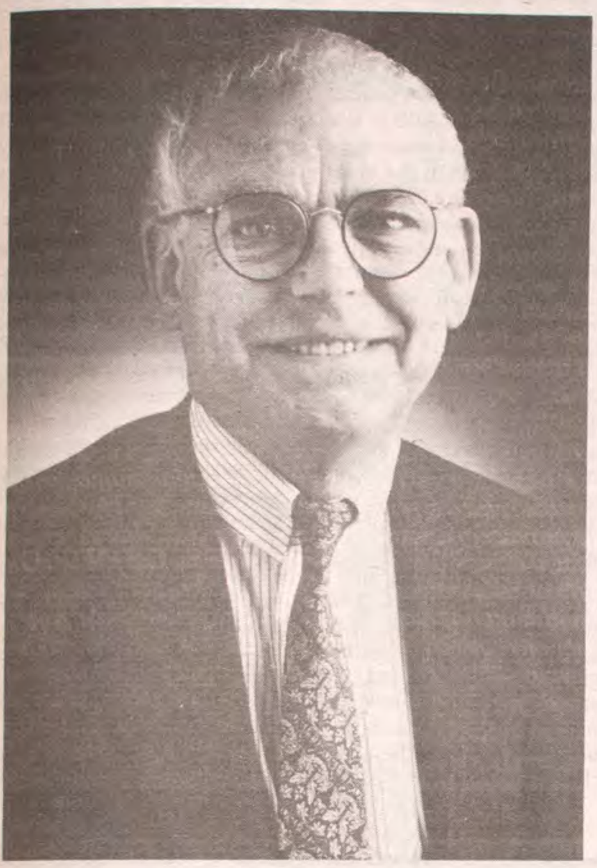
McFeely speaks at W.C.



As a reminder: William S. McFeely, a professor of American History at the University of Georgia and a Civil War scholar will be speaking for Convocation tomorrow on "Frederick Douglass and the Eastern Shore". McFeely won a Pulizer Prize for his biography of Ulysses S. Grant. His latest book, Frederick Douglass, was billed as "a full-length portrait of this slave-turned-abolitionist [that] also contributes to our understanding of Douglass' America - North, South, free and slave." Douglass was born a slave on an Eastern Shore plantation. He escaped in 1838 to the North and became a powerful figure in the abolitionist movement.

McFeely also contributed to several historical volumes and wrote introductions to the memoirs of Grant and General William T. Sherman.

Convocation begins at 2 p.m. in the Gibson Fine Arts Center. Immediately afterwards, at approximately 3:30 p.m., the College will host an Open Forum with Dr. McFeely and President Charles H. Trout in the forum room of the Casey Academic Center.

Tilghman reads from In a Father's Place

Christopher Tilghman, an author with long family ties to Maryland's Eastern Shore, will read from his fiction at Washington College Tuesday, February 19 at 4 p.m. The reading, which is free and open to the public, will be in the Norman James Theater of William Smith Hall.

Christopher Tilghman is the author of In a Father's Place, a book of short stories published in 1990. His stories have appeared in The New Yorker, The Boston Globe Magazine, the Virginia Quarterly Review, and The Best Short Stories 1990. A number of Tilghman's stories are set in Queen Anne's County, where his family still maintains a home.

In a Father's Place received considerable critical praise when it was published. Jonathan Yardley of The Washington Post wrote, "Tilghman celebrates life with a kind of joy rarely encountered in American writing these days...this is writing of exceptional strength, beauty, clarity and resonance...a genuinely remarkable book." In The New York Times Book Review Tilghman's stories are described as "variations on the theme of the powers of the family...a beautiful book, making emotions as vivid and rich in perspective as a loved landscape."

Roger & Me: not just documentary

Michael Moore's film, Roger & Me, will be shown in the Norman James Theater in William Smith Hall on Friday, February 15 at 7:30 p.m. as well as on Sunday and Monday at the same time. The film is a documentary based on Moore's efforts as a journalist to interview General Motors chairman Roger Smith in reference to the closing of auto-plants in Moore's hometown of Flint, Michigan.

Roger & Me is known for its deliberate mockery of corporate greed and challenging venture into a tender subject (GM laid off approximately 30,000). However, this film is not to be dismissed as a mundane documentary: it is informative, fierce and entertaining. Admission is 1$ for students, 2$ for the public.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC. If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Finally, the Senate debated proposed changes in the Honor Code. The Honor Code Committee had reviewed the honor code as stated in the Student Handbook and formulated possible changes. These changes, if implemented, would include; expansion of Honor Code violations to include willfully allowing another student to copy answers during a test, discussing the content of an exam prior to another section of the class taking the exam. The committee sees the basic problem with the Honor Code as a failure of proper enforcement. The committee suggests that penalization be expanded to include; public apology, either verbal or written, and visible public service. The committee also proposed strengthening the language of the Honor Code to eliminate possible areas of vagueness.

mitment. Such activities are with groups outings and are referred to as cores. Applicants for the program must undergo an interview, an extensive background check, and submit four references, in addition to a psychological profile and finger printing process. On the average, applications are processed in 6-8 weeks, and Peterson says that depending upon time during the open house, representatives of the program may begin interviewing interested students.

Another organization highlighting the open house is Fairlee Manor, a facility of the Easter Seals Society where mentally and physically disabled kids can attend a ten week recreational summer camp.

Fairlee Manor, located about eight miles from Chestertown, is open to 265 kids and has adaptive facilities in order that campers can participate in activities such as swimming, hiking, canoeing, tennis and wilderness camping. Facility director John Furtenbaugh explains that volunteers are needed to assist the campers, aiding them in "overcoming their disabilities to the greatest extent."

While the camp hopes to eventually operate in the spring and fall, currently it is available only during the summer, and Furtenbaugh says that the program is interested in hiring as many as 30 people for counselor positions with a salary of $1300 plus free room and board. It is a possibility still under discussion whether a job as a counselor could be transferred as academic credit in certain departments. Applications for Fairlee Manor will be available through Nancy Jones at the open house.

Other organizations that will be represented include the Cub Scouts, which is advertising for two positions: Assistant Cubmaster and Assistant Webelos Den Leader.

Students interested in discussing community volunteer and job opportunities should visit the lobby of the ARC on Wednesday between 10am and 4pm.

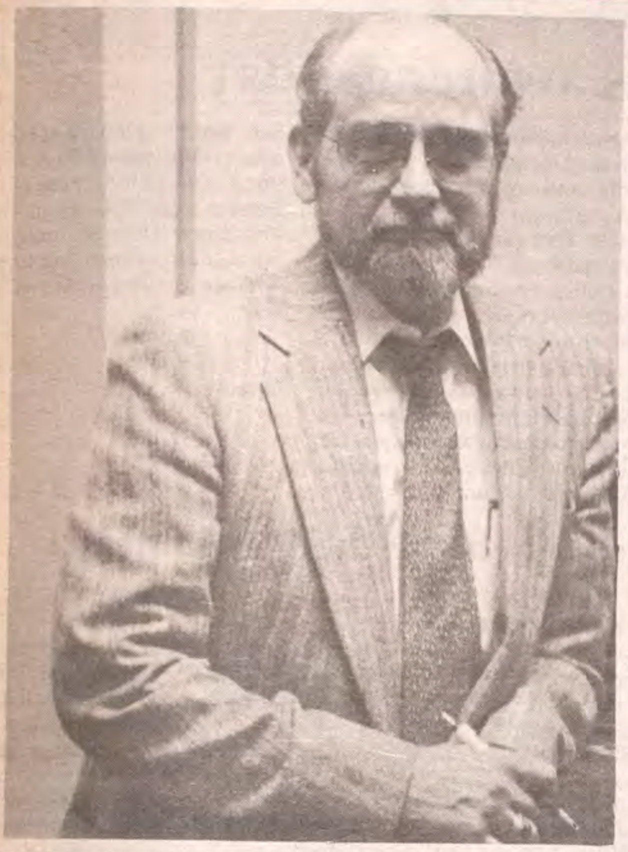
Changes in arena registration for spring



Jack Hamilton, Registrar, assisted in the planning of the new procedure for arena registration. Administration, Faculty members, and student representatives all took part.

By: Susie Mazzullo

With a new program being implemented this spring, the words "arena registration" will, hopefully, no longer be accompanied by feelings of dread.

Administration, along with the help of the faculty and also student representatives, has devised a plan to help solve the problems of the existing registration procedure.

Previously students have been told to line up with their class outside a certain door at the gym. Class by class is then led to the small gym where they are met by the faculty. There they are able to sign up for classes. This process is usually accompanied by pushing and shoving and even an occasional broken window.

Since last summer, administration members along with the faculty have been trying to come up with a plan to revise course registration.

Dr. Lucille Sansing, Associate Dean; Mr. Terry Scout, Associate Professor and Chair of the Business Management Department; Mr. Jack Hamilton, Registrar; Mrs. Judith Berry, Assistant Registrar; and Mr. Kenneth Wantling, visiting Assistant Professor, were the initial members of the group that examined ways to restructure the registration process. Together they came up with a proposition and presented that to department chairs and to student advisors. Here they opened the plan up for discussion and received suggestions for improvement from the faculty.

The plan was then submitted to Student Government representatives for a student reaction. Suggestions and concerns were again addressed. Mr. Hamilton said that the process has been a community effort. "It has involved the academic community because it is a academic process, not just an administrative process."

This past fall, preliminary changes were made in arena registration to help ease confusion. A large screen was placed in the large gym where the students were lined up by class. On this screen was shown, by overhead projector, which classes were closed. This gave those students who were still in line a chance to figure out a new class if one on their card had closed. With this process the students didn't have to wait until they were in the small gym and in line for the class to find out what classes were already closed. A second screen was also placed in the small gym where students were actually signing up for classes for the same reason. This system, although helpful, didn't stop the pushing and shoving and general confusion when standing in line. Jack Hamilton said that one of the major problems of fall registration was that the screens were too small and that because of this many students were still unable to see which classes were already closed.

With all of the suggestions by both faculty and students a model has been devised and is planned to be implemented for spring registration.

Registration this spring will be done mostly through the registrar's office. The student will initially meet with his/her advisor and discuss class possibilities. The white index card that is usually filled out at this time and then taken to arena registration will instead be kept by the advisor and sent to the registrar's office. The registrar will then enter the cards in a order that faculty will deem to be fair. It will most probably be in class order with the senior cards being entered first. Names will not be alphabetized, but in random order. Some prerequisites will still apply, however. For instance, if a student is enrolled in the first semester of a class then that student will be more eligible for taking the second semester then someone who hasn't yet taken the first semester. This will help those who are trying to meet their distribution requirements and hopefully avoid the panic senior year of needing a class that was missed in earlier years.

Out of the registrar's office will come two stacks of cards. One stack will be those students who got all of their classes in this first pass through the process. This will be the end of registration for those students. They will not have to attend arena registration as they have already been signed up for classes.

The second stack of card will be those students who did not get all of the classes that they wanted. These cards will be returned to the appropriate advisors and the students will be notified. The students will then meet with his/her advisor for a second time.

This process will provide more time for the advising aspect of registration. Dean Berry describes the original intent of arena registration as a place of advising. Those students who did have trouble with their schedules could go to their advisor and get suggestions. This process did not leave enough time for the student and advisor to get together.

During the second meeting with the advisor, both student and advisor will have access to lists that tell which classes are closed and how many students are currently on waiting lists. Each department will get a complete list and they will also be posted at sites on campus where students will have access to them.

The goal of this program is to have as many students with full schedules together before it's time for arena registration.

Students who did not have full schedules the first time through will then attend arena registration on the specified date. The location of arena registration will probably be Hynson, depending on the number of students that need to go this far in the process.

Both Baer and Hamilton commented that this will be a test run and that the cooperation of both the students and faculty is needed. "It has been a cooperative effort because both students and faculty are involved."

With registration this spring, administration is hoping to spot any major problems in the new plan and work them out by next fall when students will once again be registering for classes.

Decker & Price honored

By: Kyndra Ponder

Washington's Birthday Convocation marked a chance for the Washington College Community to contemplate the past of the Eastern Shore and to celebrate the college's future. Students, faculty and alumni gathered to hear Historian William Shield McFeely speak about the boyhood of Frederick Douglass and to hear President Charles Trout congratulate Alonzo Decker, Jr. and James Price for the very successful completion of the Campaign for Excellence.

In his Convocation Address, McFeely told about how Frederick Douglass - who spent much of his early life as a slave near Easton - escaped from slavery to become an outspoken anti-slavery activist in the North. McFeely pointed out that while in Maryland, Douglass not only suffered the injustices of slavery, but he also gained the valuable gift of literacy which helped him to escape to freedom.

After his address, McFeely - who also won a Pulitzer Prize for his biography of the life of Ulysees S. Grant - was given an Honorary Degree as a Doctor of Letters by President Trout and Chairman Louis Goldstein.

Dr. Trout then took the opportunity to officially thank and congratulate the Co-Chairmen of the Campaign for Excellence, Mr. Alonzo Decker, Jr. and James Price, for the successful completion of the campaign. The Campaign for Excellence has raised over $43 Million for "new facilities, programs and scholarships" for Washington College over the last several years. President Trout pointed out that funds from the campaign have helped to not only change the physical appearance of the college by adding buildings and bricks to the campus, but monies have also gone to enhance the quality of education provided here by modernizing equipment and lab facilities and providing funds for guest lecturers and speakers. The Convocation Program states that "Students and faculty alike are encouraged to reach a little higher, strive a bit more, in their individual pursuit of knowledge. For that we are grateful to Campaign Co-chairmen Alonzo Decker, Jr. and James Price."

During his address to the student body, SGA President Kevin Kelly spoke about the Lacrosse luck

Children, children, how many times do you need to be told, drinking and driving just don't mix.

Now, this is not a piece of general scolding. But there are people on our beloved campus who should have listened to all those Public Service announcements on T.V. about how it is very, very bad to drink and drive. Yes, I am referring to the Lacrosse incident. No need to name names since a) they, and most of the campus, know who they are and b) another campus publication already spilled the beans on that one.

The need to relax after a stressful day on the Lacrosse field is perfectly understandable. But all they had to do, my friends, was wait until they reached Chestertown and the friendly confines of Washington College, and all would have been well. Unforunately, as is the case in these incidents, our fine fellows could not restrain themselves, and as a consequence, many shall no longer do battle on the Lacrosse field for Washington College's glory. Tut tut. My, what fine upstanding fellows. Well, they got what was coming.

The good news in all this, is that they were stopped before they hurt themselves, or anyone else. For this we all should be thankful, especially those involved. The outcome could have been deadly.

Trout announces committee

To the Washington College Community,

I wish to announce appointment today of a committee to review Washington College's need for an institutional statement on sexual misconduct. Given the absence of a current policy statement in our Student Handbook, together with the overwhelming evidence of a national problem in the areas of sexual harassment and offenses such as date rape, I find it incumbent upon the institution to act swiftly and expeditiously in the adoption of a policy statement and clear protocols for dealing with cases of sexual misconduct. Committee members include Linda Cades, Garry Clarke, Ed Maxcy, Maureen McIntire, Sherry Magill, and Lucille Sansing.

It is my expectation that the committee will present a draft for my review and that of the appropriate committees in early April, which can than be sent to the Board of Visitors and Governors for final review and adoption.

Student requests awareness day

A Letter to the Editor:

On behalf of the students at Washington College, I would like to ask of the faculty and administration that we have a Middle East Awareness Day, involving the entire campus and community. Attempting to understand, learn, and promote an acute awareness of what is actually occurring in the Middle East, I propose we devote a complete day to this necessary cause. Professors of Washington College, John Hopkins, St. Johns, and other institutes of higher education, along with, Congressmen and Congresswomen, News Media, and any other individuals who maintain an interest in the Middle East and are invited to participate can help the Washington College community have an objective perspective on the situation that we have involved ourselves in, in the Gulf War. I would hope this day would involve lectures, question and answer periods, and round table discussions. Ultimately, interested students, faculty, and administrative members will be given an opportunity to vent fears and frustrations of what the future of the Persian Gulf War will involve. This day will be a beginning on our behalf to support our troops and our understanding of the War.

Sincerely,

Patricia Anne Hawthorne

U of Maryland knows something the WAC doesn't

To the Editor,

Soon after the war began, University of Maryland students expressed their opposing opinions by stringing banners between dormitory windows. The U.M. administration, fearing a war between the banners, ordered the banners removed. A fury of criticism quickly followed. Realizing their mistake, U.M. administrators rescinded their banner ban, calling it an unfortunate infringement of free speech.

I've seen a few banners at W.C. "Fuck George Bush and his war," was prominently displayed in a Caroline window. A rather pedestrian "Support our troops," was waving from KA Middle Hall. They're gone now.

There was one panel discussion about the war. As far as I know, that was the extent of the administration's support of public debate.

Apparently, The University of Maryland knows something that has eluded Washington College; education does not stop in the classroom. It's my understanding that the goal of a liberal arts education is to teach people how to think. But how can we know if anyone is thinking if they're not talking? This war has probably touched the lives of more of today's students than any other event. If the Washington College administration doesn't realize its responsibility to encourage open and public discussion of issues, then it doesn't realize the purpose of its own education.

But we shouldn't lay all the blame on the administration; they might take it personally. The maelstrom of student silence is certainly epitomized by the two pathetic pronouncements plastered on the dorms. It suddenly seems as if talk about the war has become taboo. I despise a cliche as much as any English major, but truth about your right to free speech is, "Use it, or lose it." The day Americans choose to not say something for fear it might offend someone is the last day for a free America.

Gimelson's gripe with Griep

Some Of Offset, Was Off-Base:

After last semester's fiasco of publications I was eagerly awaiting the addition of the new paper to campus, by the formerly This Is Not The Elm staff. Although the single sheet that was published as a prelude to the paper was nothing substantial, I thought that such things as the name, slick design of the "new" title and list of goals showed promise. Admittedly when I saw the first issue I was impressed with some of the writing, the new design, and even the addition of color, but there were several aspects about it which truly unsettled me.

Let me start with the SGA article by Chris Griep. All I can say is thank you for at least putting it on the "Op./Ed" page. I'm glad that these words were not even attempted to be reported as fact, because they are quite merely, just opinion. As a matter of fact I don't think that the article could have been more biased and anti-fraternity than it was. Getting back to the main problem though (emphasis added), Mr. Griep has very selectively taken quite a few points from the Student Handbook and brought them to everyone's attention paraphrased, out of context, and without full description.

It is true that a part of Article 3 (the part dealing with Officers and their duties) of the SGA constitution states that "All student sponsored clubs and organizations, excluding voluntary social fraternities and sororities, seeking to be registered under the shelter of Washington College must apply to the Organizations Committee for recognition." Mr. Griep, what are you trying to say here? What do these words mean to you ? The Phi Delta Theta colony is a voluntary social fraternity so these words do not apply to them, and they did not apply to the SGA for recognition (as you even pointed out is one purpose of the Inter Fraternity Council). The Phi Delta Theta Colony (already recognized by the school as a special interest group) applied for funding because they were in financial trouble and needed money to sustain their organization. Article 3 goes on to say, " The [Organizations] committee will present to the Senate for its approval, a complete report with its recommendations for every organization requesting money." Ahh, now here is something that pertains to the case in hand, but you failed to mention this in your article. Pity.

I ask now that everyone following along in the student handbook jump to page 43. For everyone that doesn't have a copy with them, let me tell you that this is the section of the SGA constitution on which you find Article 8, the Budget Policy.

Article 8, Section 2 states, Budget requests will be judged on the basis of: (a) Past appropriations and Financial Reports, (b) Amount of Request in proportion to other Appropriations and available funds, (c) Completeness and Organization of the Budget request forms and of club constitutions; (d)

Student Government Association Executive Council Election Supplement

SGA ELECTION SUPPLEMENT

Kevin "Sparky" Kelly for President

Fellow students, my name is Kevin "Sparky" Kelly and I would like to share with you some of my issues and concerns for the 1991 Student Government Presidential elections. As you know, I am currently the president of the S.G.A. This role was thrust upon me following the unfortunate Neiman episode. Before taking the place of President, I had previously served as Vice-President, Secretary, and Senator of the S.G.A. I have served on numerous committees and have lettered on the soccer and baseball teams.

Upon assuming the office of President, I was faced with several unfinished issues, such as the cable question and the rewriting of the Honor Code. With the help of the Executive Council and the Senate, I am well on my way to resolving these issues. The issue of cable installation will be settled within the next few weeks, and according to President Trout, we are "right on track" with the Honor Code proceedings.

If I am elected, there are some issues which I feel need to be addressed. This school is unfortunately becoming a "suitcase" college. I believe the S.G.A. needs to prevent this from happening by assuming a larger role in the social scene of the college. With the administration's policy on closed parties in the dorms, the campus if left with only one option for everybody to get together in one place. That option is the Coffee House. The S.G.A. not only needs to provide bigger and better bands, we also need to take the initiative to push hard for the renovations for the new Student Activity Center.

Another concern is the establishment of traditions at Washington College. Do we have an Alma Mater? If so, why doesn't anyone know about it? I believe that traditions such as the Alma Mater and Homecomings will help to bring the student body together and perhaps generate some pride in the college. I will be working with President Trout to help institute such traditions, specifically a fall and spring Homecoming.

I would also like to explore the possibility of having physical education as a minor. It seems to me that since so many courses are offered in the subject, perhaps this needs to be considered. This is a liberal arts school and is supposed to offer a diverse curriculum, not to mention the possibility of attracting certain students who might otherwise not have attended W.C.

Finally, I would like to continue with the college's recycling efforts, and to develop more faculty involvement with student activities. While these are some of the concerns I wish to address and accomplish, I believe that the bulk of my agenda will come from you, the students. After all, you will depend on the representation of the Student Government Association to voice your opinions and implement your ideas. So vote for Kevin Kelly for President and John Kelly for Vice-President. Vote for experience in representation.

the President shall:
preside over Senate meetings
appoint Senate committees fill vacanies on Senate committees with the approval of the Senate serve as a non-voting representative at Faculty and Board meetings give greetings from the student body at Fall and Spring Convocations vote during Senate meetings only to break ties oversee cooperation between the Senate, SAB, and SCC.
(Article 3, section 1, paragraph a; SGA Constitution)

The Vice President shall:
chair the SAB and preside over meetings of that body chair the Senate in the event of the absence of the President serve as vice chairperson of the ACJ, as a member of the Academic Council and as a non-voting representative at faculty meetings.

(Article 3. section 1, paragraph b; SGA Constitution)

John Kelly for Vice President

Dear Washington College Students:

My name is John Kelly and I am running for the office of Student Government Vice-President. I would like to take this opportunity to familiarize you with my qualifications for this office and goals I will accomplish if elected to this office.

At this time I am the President of the Junior class. Previous to this I have been the Sophomore class Vice-President and I have been a Resident Assistant for two years. I feel that all these positions have placed me at the forefront in dealing with issues that concern the student body as a whole as well as individual student concerns. Additionally, I have developed excellent working relationships with many faculty and administrators, and would use these relationships to help in attaining the Student Government's goals.

Some short-term goals I have as Vice-President include, development and implementation of programs designed to increase and promote school spirit. Also, I would like greater student representation and response on faculty committees that determine those professors who will receive tenure. I believe that Washington College needs new professors and more prominent ones who will increase this school's academic image to the outside educational community. These new professors will be an invaluable asset to the future of Washington College.

My long-term goals as Vice-President included the development of an Intra-Fraternity council that will be regulated by the Student Government Association instead of the Student Affairs office. This council will act as the administrator over all the fraternities and its main goal will be to curb abuses of the fraternal system that can and have ultimately arisen without this council. All cases of abuses would be dealt with by the council's disciplinary committee and would be subject to final inspection by the S.G.A. and the Student Affairs Deans.

Additionally, I would like to see a student social committee set up where the students would schedule all social activities on campus and the Student Affairs Deans would simply serve as the mediator should any problems arise between groups. This committee would force student social groups to plan their activities in advance and would alleviate any problems groups have of conflicting social activities. It would also open many more activities to the campus as a whole and not just a select "invited" few.

I hope to bring to the Student Government a period of new progressivism where previous conflicts and problems are quickly forgotten and new ideas and accomplishments flourish. On Thursday, February 28, 1991 please vote for John Kelly and Kevin Kelly, my running mate.

SGA ELECTION SUPPLEMENT

Brian Gimelson for Treasurer

Hello. For those of you who don't know me, my name is Brian Gimelson, and I'm running for re-election as the Student Government Association Treasurer. When I first ran for the position of Treasurer, I was a Senator in the SGA. I stated in my campaign speech, that I would be willing to sponsor any worthwhile endeavors that benefited the college. I would argue that I've done a pretty good job of holding to these words. In my time in office, the SGA has sponsored (or co-sponsored) over 20 different social events. As well, I along with my trusty Organizations committees have interviewed and given money to over 40 different clubs and Organization that help to benefit the campus, anywhere from Amnesty International to the Hands Out Program to the Rugby Club to the Writer's Union. A very diverse group of organizations by any standards, but in this diversity I feel that we have done our best to cater to the majority of the student body, and I have always left my door open to new ideas.

I take a great deal of pride with what I have helped to accomplish for the SGA but for the SGA to come I see things getting even better. At the last SGA meeting the senate approved an amendment to our constitution, forming the Council on Undergraduate Research. I helped to write this amendment, and with it, the SGA in conjunction with the Presidents Office and the Deans, will be giving students an opportunity to do work on projects that relate to their studies outside the classroom. This is a truly tremendous jump for the SGA's ability to help on an academic level, and not just a social one. As well I can say that I was glad to be a part of the SGA fights to preserve equal student representation on the Academic Council, and win.

This SGA has shown a great deal of dedication and versatility in working together to solve campus problems, as well as fulfill student needs, and that is only just the bare bone. We have done lots of things to help out the surrounding community, faculty members, and people who are in need. This is why I am asking you to vote for me again, so I can continue to serve you. With much gained experience and without any break from our dedication, I guarantee that the next years Executive Council will be even better. My goal in

The Treasurer shall handle the monetary business of the SGA and report the state of finances at each regular Senate meeting and shall also chair the Organizations Committee.

John Griep for Treasurer

The recent history of the Student Government Association has read like a primer on corruption and abuse of power. Several years ago, the SGA Treasurer was investigated for embezzlement and, ultimately, had his case tried in court. (The Student Government Constitution was altered as a result of this scandal.) It was rumored that a former SGA President operated a drug-selling business out of the Minta Martin apartment that traditionally has housed that worthy officer. And most recently, SGA President Stuart Neiman was removed from office due to his prolonged medical absence as the result of an accidental shooting.

I had never really given a great deal of thought to the operations of the Senate and the SGA until this latest incident. But as a result of reporting Neiman's removal for This Is Not The Elm and sitting in on a number of SGA meetings, I became increasedly concerned with the manner in which the SGA operated.

A major concern of mine became the operations of the SGA Treasurer. The Treasurer of the SGA is supposed to head the Organizations Committee and present the full Senate with the committee's recommendations concerning club funding. Budget requests are supposed to be judged on the basis of several criteria, among which are: (1) "amount of request in proportion to other appropriations and available funds," (2) "the purpose to which the money is allocated; and" (3) "the accessibility of the club's activities and membership to the entire student body." This is all stated rather clearly in the Student Government Constitution.

However, Mr. Gimelson's criteria, in some cases, does not appear to coincide with that of the Constitution. This seems to be the case with the allocation of several thousand dollars to the Phi Delta Thetas. If Mr. Gimelson had taken the time to read the Constitution, he would have been aware of the fact that the constitutionality of any allocation to a PRIVATE campus organization is highly questionable, to say the least. This is apparent under both Article 2 and Article 8.

I am currently in charge of finances for OffSET, the independent student newspaper. I asked to be appointed to the position because I felt the need to ensure that the financial operations of our newspaper were properly managed.

If elected Treasurer of the SGA, I will work to ensure fairness and honesty in office and will seek to represent ALL aspects of campus, not just certain special-interest groups.

SGA ELECTION SUPPLEMENT

Jen del Nero running for Secretary

Jen del Nero for Secretary

After serving two years as an S.G.A. Senator, I am interested in moving on to the next level of student government - the Executive Council - as secretary.

During my two years as a senator, I've worked closely with the Executive Council, and on many occasions have been asked by S.G.A. presidents to participate on committees ranging from campus renovation plans to the Student Conduct Committee.

In my two years I have also established close connections with faculty and administrators, which will aid in communicating the needs of students and the desires of the administration, a skill that an efficient secretary must possess.

I have had contact with students, faculty, and administrators through my job as an RA and my former job last spring as the Arts/Entertainment Editor for The Elm. Through these positions I have maintained productive working and friendly relationships with all aspects of Washington College, including various academic departments, Student Affairs, and Admissions.

My goal is to apply the knowledge that I have gained from being a member of the S.G.A. Senate for two years on a level that is more able to affect change.

As secretary, I will be an integral part of the communication process between students and the faculty and administration.

Jen Del Nero

The Secretary shall call role and take minutes of all Senate meetings, prepare a current agenda for each meeting, and read the minutes for Senate approval at the start of each meeting;
The Secretary shall also handle all SGA correspondence, maintain and make accesible the files, and chair the Publicity Committee

(Article 3, section 2, paragraph b; SGA Constitution)

John Phoebus for Secretary

I, John K. Phoebus am seeking the post of Secretary of the Student Government Association for the 1991-92 school year. The office of Secretary is one that requires dedication, thoroughness, and organization. the responsibilities of Secretary include handling all SGA correspondence, maintaining files, chairing the Publications Committee, and most importantly, keeping minutes of all Senate and Executive Council meetings. I believe that I am the best qualified person for this office. If elected, my primary goal would be to have typed copies of the minutes in the mail to all Senate members within two days of the meeting, compared to the four or five days that it currently takes. As a rising sophomore, I will have the necessary time available to put into this position and to accomplish this goal.

Through my work as a freshman Senator this past year, I have demonstrated the dedication needed to hold this post. I have been a very active member of the Senate, participating in many aspects of Student Government. I am a member of the Elections Committee, the Organizations Committee, which allocates SGA funds, and the Honor Code Committee, which is in the process of rewriting that document. This experience in committees will aid me in my chairing of the Publications Committee. Most recently I wrote an ammendment to the SGA constitution, concerning the election process, which was passed unanimously by the Senate. I have also not missed a single SGA meeting this or last semester, an attendance record that will continue through my service as Secretary.

The office of Secretary is just like any other job. To perform the job sucessfully, one needs to dedicate oneself to the job completely and work hard at it. Why should you chose me over an upperclassman? As a rising sophomore, I will have the time available to put into the office. I am running for this office because I want to represent and serve the college community. I will always be available to discuss any concerns that students have and relay them to the executive council once I am elected.

Adriane and Will for Social Chair

With three years behind us, we would like to make this next year, our senior year, one that will never be forgotten. However, we need your help. Next Thursday, we urge you to vote for Will Brandenburg and Adriane Beane for the office of Social Chair. Why? Because of our experience and enthusiasm.

During Will's college career he has played the role of both follower and leader. Last year he served as the Secretary of the Theta Chi fraternity. Currently, he is serving as Vice President of the fraternity. In addition, Will has been a member of the Washington College Crew Team and is now Co-Captain of the Men's team. Lastly, Will knows how to have a good time. How could he come away from a year of being RA on the first floor of Kent and not know how to party?!

Adriane is currently serving as Vice President of the Junior Class. As such, she was very involved in the booking of RetroActives who performed in the cafeteria during this past fall semester. Presently, she is working on booking another band to perform in April. In addition, Adriane is the Advertising Manager for The Elm. She understands the importance of deadlines, and has cultivated the art of drawing money from formerly empty pockets.

Together, Will and Adriane have the experience and connections to make things happen on this campus. Will has worked closely with the Deans as a RA and an officer of his fraternity. Adriane has worked closely with East Coast Entertainment as Vice President of the Junior Class and has also worked closely with local businesses as Advertising Manger for The Elm. Both of us understand the importance of booking bands early for best selection. We promise that, if elected, we will do everything in our power to keep this campus an exciting place to be. Please support us on Election Day!!

OUTLOOK

In the world: Yeltsin calls for Gorbachev's resignation

UNITED STATES:

President Bush said Tuesday that he is rejecting the peace plan proposed by the Soviet Union. Administration officials said that the President rejected the plan because he concluded that it would compromise United Nations resolutions and allow Saddam Hussein to stall the emminent ground offensive. It would also allow him to set his own terms as well as the timing of his retreat from Kuwait. At a brief White House photo session, Bush said: "As far as I'm concerned, there are no negotiations. The goals have been set out. There will be no concessions." The Soviets, however, believe that their plan is a better alternative than continuing the massive bombardment of the region. Their peace plan demands an immediate and unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, as is required by the U.N. resolutions. But points of conflict between the Allies and the Soviets lie in other parts of the plan, namely the assurances made to ther Iraqi government. These include guarantees that Saddam Hussein and his regime will survive, that no reparations will be exacted and Arab-Israeli issues would eventually be addressed. Many of the assurances were rejected by the Allies. Only a few, like preserving Iraq's territorial integrity, were accepted.

SOVIET UNION:

On Wednesday the President of the Russian Republic, Boris Yeltsin, called for the immediate resignation of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbatchev and the transfer of power to the Federation Council. The Federal Council is an executive body made up of the leaders of the 15 constituent republics. Speaking on nationwide television, Yeltsin accused Gorbachev "deceiving" the people. In the televised speech, Yeltsin said: "I warned in 1987 that Gorbatchev has a tendency in his character toward absolute, personal power. Now he is leading the country to a dictatorship but giving it the pretty name of presidential rule."

Last September it seemed that Gorbatchev and Yeltsin were ready to overcome their differences and would form a "center-left" coalition. But by October, under pressure from orthodox Communists, the KGB and the military, Gorbatchev was moving toward a hard-line position and rejected a radical economic plan. Since then, Gorbachev and Kremlin conservatives have accused Yeltsin of trying to break up the Union and of consorting with gangsters. The comments made by Yeltsin on Wednesday seem to mark a difinitive split between to Soviet Union's two most powerful politicians.

SAUDI ARABIA:

General Norman Schwarzkopf Tuesday that the Iraqi military was on the verge of collapseand were losing over 100 tanks each day to allied bombing raids. He added that no army can survive such an attrition rate. Schwarzkopf believes that the Iraq's military capabilities were most likely overrated in the first place. The performance of the Iraqi army, said Schwarzkopf, revealed their war weariness. They are simply tired and had no real desire to fight again after their eight year war with Iran, he added. "Even though they had a large military and probably a very capable one for this part of the world" the general said, matched against "the sophistication of the U.S. military, there is no comparison. They grossly underestimated the type of war they were getting involved with and they've paid a price for that." But Schwarzkopf did temper his optomism with caution during the interview. He said that if there is a ground war he felt sure that Hussein would use artillery to deliver chemical weapons against allied troops and that he would use the remnents of his airforce to do the same thing. Schwarzkopf declined to discuss the timetable for a ground war and he also decline to comment on the Soviet peace proposal, but he did say that if Hussein withdrew from Kuwait and remained in power the allied mission will have been a success working with SGA is similar in many ways to what I think many of your desires are. Thank You.

The purpose to which the money is allocated; and {e} The accessibility of the Club's activities and membership to the entire student body. Sorry to beat a dead horse here folks, but since the Neiman story is still such a hot topic, this must be also.

I must add Mr. Griep, that your calculations again were not only quite biased, but also somewhat off. Referring back to point {b}, when I proposed this years SGA budget (approved unanimously by the Senate), $20,000 was set aside for club funding. The SGA has received requests for nearly $40,000 over the entire year. Total allocations of funds for organizations and clubs have been in the area of just slightly over 30,000 which puts the SGA in a good position, as on the average clubs spend about 2/3 of their funds. So instead of Mr. Grieps figure of 1/6 of the money allocations going to the Phi Delts the figure is closer to 1/13 going to roughly 1/36 of the campuses members. But hold on here. Mr. Grieps article mentioned that the Phi-Delts had more social events that were open to the campus last semester than any other Greek organization. So isn't the money really dedicated towards an organization that is offering its services to 36/36 of the Washington College Community ? Not to mention, care packages to the Gulf, community related events such as the Crab Feast, and that's just to name a few. So this organization not only benefits Washington College, but people outside of the school. Wow. I would argue money well spent. But hold on. It's a loan. So the SGA is not even spending the money. It's coming back to us. Now that is nice.

By the way if anyone was worried about the Phi Delts ability to pay back the loan, they need not be. Several of the members of Phi Delta Theta said,

Dr. Gillin, Don Rickles, and the Birthday Ball

Phil "Slice" Macek

Last Saturday, George Washington, the father of our country, celebrated his 259th birthday. We at Washington College, being ever mindful that George is the primary reason for our school's existence, honored George with a rousing Birthday Ball. This ball was full of pep, spunk, and the extremely graceful dancing of both President Trout and Dr. Gillin (although in no way does this imply that the two were dancing together).

I was looking forward to a rowdy Ball and commenced the evening with a small cocktail party in Cardinal F (Washington College's official thesis support center). That right there was a fine time and on any usual weekend would have satisfied my party needs; but this was no ordinary weekend night. The sole tragedy for me was that my inflatable date, Martha, had a hole in her elbow and would be unable to accompany me to the festivities.

I slid into my burgundy crushed velvet tuxedo and made my way down to the Cain Athletic Center. I walked in the front door, skipped the coat check station and the ticket people, proceeded up the long corridor, and cut in the last door on the left. I felt like I had gotten all dressed up to go to arena registration. I thought now would be a good time to ask Dr. Striner if I could get into his Civil War class. I saw a few older people dancing, but figured that the evening was just warming up, so I set off to make my own excitement for the night. As far as I could tell, the bar was the hottest spot in the place. After fueling up, I proceeded back to the dance area where the band was belting out a lovely version of Frank Sinatra's, "The Way You Look Tonight."

The dance floor was beginning to fill up, and across the sea of people I could see Dr. Gillin dancing what seemed like a mixture of the Watusi and the Lambada; whatever he was doing he appeared to be in a lot of pain. As I watched the "John Travolta of the English Department" cut the rug like nobody's business, I figured it was not an appropriate time to ask Dr. G if he would look over the rough draft of my paper on Wordsworth. I took a break from that scene and talked with a few chums for a while. I tried to follow the band's rendition of "The Electric Slide" but I decided to get off the dance floor when I almost got killed by 362 dancing maniacs. It was at this time that I noticed President Trout really getting busy to the music. He was spinning like a top and taking no prisoners. He was definitely doing the "Hustle" with a few steps of the "Fox Trot" thrown in for good measure.

The rest of the gym looked vaguely like one of the parties as seen in "The Great Gatsby." There were just a lot of people sitting around drinking and exchanging the latest gossip—who was sleeping with who, who had just broken up with who, and who liked the last meal served in the dining hall. I felt like I was back in Dr. DeProspo's "American Literature" class and the nightmare had become a reality. Luckily, I was mistaken. I attributed the horrific hallucination to the weak gin and tonic Jeff Newell had served me earlier in the evening.

By this time of the evening, the party was pretty much in full swing. The band was playing some cooking Glenn Miller music and I wished that Martha was here so we could dance. As I held back a tear I searched for some more mischief to get into. I went outside and switched some coats around on the racks. Then I decided to try to lower the baskets and try to get some full court games going, but nobody wanted to join me in this venture. After pretending to be the local liquor authority and threatening to shut down the party if the bar kept serving booze to people under 21, I went outside for a little fresh air.

I returned to the scene of the crime where somebody told me that Dr. Gillin had formed a nude conga line and was going to proceed down High Street with all the other dancing animals singing the theme from "New York, New York." Sadly, I found out the rumor wasn't true. I don't mean the part about the nude conga line going down High Street; that was true, I just meant that they weren't going to sing "New York, New York" but rather the theme to "Gilligan's Island." I waited in anxious anticipation, but I guess the whole thing turned out to be a big hoax.

By now, the party had really put itself into overdrive. The band was playing so wildly that their horns were glowing from the heat they were giving off. The crowd never wanted it to end, although they did give a mighty cheer when the band started to destroy their instruments like The Who did back in the 60's and 70's. Like the larger majority, I didn't want the dream to end; but in the end, nothing gold can stay.

Finally, the evening began to draw to a close. I wandered inside the gym to say my goodbyes for the night. I especially wanted to thank Dr. Gillin for making the evening so memorable. However, Dr. Gillin was smack dab in the middle of the gym, standing on a table, taking bets on whether or not he would cruise up to Galena and get a tattoo of Don Rickles on his left thigh. I thought about gambling for a minute, but figured this was not the night to bet against "Chillin" Gillin.

As I went back to my room, I was filled with the fact that as a senior this would be my last Birthday Ball. I had entered the evening with high hopes for reckless fun and wild abandon, and I was not disappointed. I was hoping to go back and play a little Nintendo before turning in for the night. Tomorrow, the way I figured it, the entire Washington College community would sleep til well past noon; finally waking with mind-splitting hangovers and a dim recollection of what the hell had happened to them. Suddenly, just as I was convinced that the Birthday Ball was over for another year, Dr. Gillin came running by me sporting a T-shirt that said "Don't Feed The Animal" and carrying enough money in his hand for a Don Rickles tattoo. Somehow, I thought that he still wasn't ready to talk about my Wordsworth paper yet, but I think I understand. that if they were to borrow the money from the SGA to be paid back over 3 years, they would need to have between 3-4 new pledges a year, just to cover the expense. Enough said.

Now getting back to Mr. Grieps bias. I find it so funny that you were concerned with the SGA Senate spending, when you yourself were involved or are friends with people involved with organizations that have received money from the SGA senate, and with what many would say are much less justified qualifications, then the Phi Delts.

Lets take This Is Not The Elm, for example. Last semester the TINTE staff (of which Mr. Griep was a member) requested $500 for a single issue. In the same week that the issue in question (emphasis added) came out, the corresponding weeks Elm came out with several overlapping articles, thus signifying quite a bit of waste and perhaps unneeded expenses in the staffs inability to write for a paper that was already funded, but that's another debate altogether. Although the Senate allocated funding for this one issue (against my recommendation), this staff with their request asked every student in the school to donate 55 cents for this paper (that's $500 divided by 910 students who contrib-

Women's swim team sends unprecedented numbers to MAC's

By Matt Giller

An unprecendented 12 Washnington College women's swimmers will represent the school at Swarthmore College February 21-23 for the Middle Atlantic Championships.

Not only is it the largest group to ever represent the WAC at the annual championship, but it is the first time that they have ever had someone in each event.

Kasey Carroll will lead the group trying to defend her 89-90 1650 freestyle MAC title. She will also compete in the 500 free and 400 IM. Her toughest compecome from 500 free national champ Lynn Cassidy from Gettysburg.

Sam Streamer will try to improve on er 3 individual place finishes from a year ago in the 50, 100 and 200 frees.

Coach Kim Lessard comments on her two star's chances, "Both girls are swimming better than ever and should do really well; and Sam should be in the top six for the first time."

Junior Leslie Newcomb will also be looking to better her three rankings in the 100 and 200 breastroke and 1650 free.

The backstroke events will probably be the WAC's strongest event with Jennifer Green, Vickie Vahos, Karen Prendegast and Kelly Loftus all competing.

The 50 free will also be loaded. Magdalena Fuchs, Kristen Callazzo, Green and Ramsey Bigham join Streamer in the free sprint.

Mimi Devlin has an excellent chance to place in the 200 and 400 IM and 200 fly events.

The five relays hope to push WC up in the place rankings. The free relays of Carroll, Streamer, Fuchs and Devlin is the fastest foursome Washington College has ever entered.

Hopes at this year's MAC championships run high after a 9-2 season that saw 6 team records shattered.

Matt Giller is a senior International Studies major who is in training to compete at the '92 Barcelona Games in the tobacco-spitting for accuracy. However, it is not an official event... Yet.

Basketball: Vican and co. end season on high note

The Washington College Shoremen ended the year by winning four in a row and five of their last seven. Last Wednesday night they beat Widener, 63-52, however lost to Johns Hopkins last Friday night in the season finale, 73-71.

In the game against Widener it was all Darren Vican (32 points, 11 rebounds and 5 steals). The six foot nine inch sophomore pivotman scored the first seven points and 11 of the WAC's first 14 points. Vican's dominance in the paint helped keep the Shoremen close to visitirs through the majority of the first half. With the score tied at 21 apiece, Vican single-handidly knocked the wind out of Widener's proverbial sails by scoring the next 10 points for the WAC and helping to shut down Widener's potent offense by not allowing a point in the last 7:30 of the first frame.

The two teams went into the lockeroom with the WAC leading 31-21 led by Vican's 21 points.

In the second half Widener was determined to sweep the season series; however, Vican, during the halftime break, did not go down with malaria or even the 20-minute flu and continued his hot shooting.

With the score trimmed to 33-27, freshman Geoff Rupert scored a layup and Vican jammed home six straight to spread the Shoremen lead, 41-29.

Widener continued to scrap. The Pioneers went on a 8-0 run to cut the lead to 41-37. However, floor general Allen Lester nailed a three-pointer and two technical free throws to spread the lead to 46-37.

From then on the WAC displayed signs of maturing as they never allowed the Pioneers to get within eight points with intelligence and clutch foul shots (92% in the second half).

Another note: Vican had team season highs in both points and assists.

The Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins did not enter the Cain Gymnasium without hearing the news that the young Shoremen have arrived and appear ready to be the team of the future.

The WAC came into the game with a four game winning streak on the line. In that span they have defeated their opponents by an average of more than 22 points per contest. Dominance? Yes.

However, with Hopkins gunning for the conference title, this game was sure to be tight and, in typical Jays/Shoremen fashion, frenzied.

Indeed it was as the Vican/Lester force combined for 23 of the Sho'men's first 26 points keeping them within one, 27-26.

However, the Jays went on a small run late in the half to give them a slightly comfortable 34-29 lead.

Hopkins remained at Pirandello plays presented

by Stephanie Hess

Themes of infidelity and betrayal will be explored next week by the Drama department, when senior Drama majors Tim Madison and Lisa Woodcock present and evening of one act plays by Luigi Pirandello.

Madison, formerly an English major, is directing Pirandello's play entitled "The Vise." Madison was attracted to the play for it's portrayal of the tension between its three major characters. He notes that the play is mainly about "infidelity and betrayal, and the way in which people create the illusion of their lives." He further points out that Pirandello's work is "most profoundly about theater and the way in which one's lives are theater."

He says that Pirandello "writes a lot about illusion" and that in his work reality is composed of different levels and surfaces. He adds that while Pirandillo tends to get lost among such playwrights as Chekhov, Ibsen, Beckett and Ionesco, and his work is of no particular genre, he should still be considered as one of the most important dramatists of the twentieth century.

In the play directed by Lisa Woodcock, entitled "I'm Dreaming, But Am I?," reality is questioned through a dream sequence. Because most of the play is a dream, Woodcock has the opportunity to stretch the limits of the script, and as she says, "do anything I want - I could have two monsters on stage." This freedom was one thing that attracted Woodcock to the script. She also looked forward to the lying, deceit and sugar-coated words contained in the play's confused dream sequences. In discussing this confusion, Woodcock says that "dreams can be beautiful and dreams can be frightening. My play is both."

The word that Woodcock wants her audience to associate with her production is "fantasmagorical." Finally, she warns her audience that "most of the play is a dream, so anything can happen."

The cast of "The Vise" includes Melanie Green, Todd Karr, Chris Rummel and Alexandra Nadar. Stage Manager is Deirdre Reigel. Assistant Stage Manager is Tarin Towers.

The cast of "I'm Dreaming But Am I?" includes Jacque Collins, Carl Pupa and Brett Lankford. Stage Manager is Stephanie Hess. The Technical Director for both productions is

Willis exhibits Photographs

Landscape and portrait photographs by Robert J. Willis will be on display at Washington College's O'Neill Literary House from February 25 to March 2, 1991. There will be an opening reception for the exhibit Monday, February 25 at 4 p.m.

Willis' photographs include portraits and landscapes depicting the Eastern Shore as graphs were shown at the Maryland Hall in the summer of 1990 and are currently on display at the Ironstone Cafe in Chestertown.

"Photos in Black and White," the exhibit at Washington College, is Willis' first public showing in Chestertown.

The amazing grazing Sacred Cows

by Julie Greene

There is a new band on campus and their name is the Sacred Cows. Do not ask them why they are named after holy bovines, for they will only tell you it is privileged information. But if you are a Get Smart fan you may have an inside track.

The group was assembled last semester when junior Jim Souvlis asked fellow classman Eric Forste if he wanted to start a band. The two then recruited sophomore Chris "Fatman" Goldenberg to play the drums and asked junior Bruce Hamilton if he would sing with them. The final member is junior Josh Buchman, who decided to join after sitting in on one of their jam sessions.

Practices are held in the basement of Caroline, the formal rehearsal setting for the popular Incorrigibles. It is here that the guys sound each other out and organize their performances.

The Sacred Cows premiered on Open Mike night in the Coffee House on February 2nd to a growing and enthusiastic crowd. In fact, the crowd even danced, at Open Mike night! The band performed three numbers including Black Crows' Hard To Handle, which was later played again as an encore. After a rest and summing up the crowd's reaction they played some more songs including The Police's Message In A Bottle.

Tonight is Open Mike night in the Coffee House and you can be sure the Sacred Cows will be present once again. The band feels that Open Mike night is a good way for them to practice while gauging the crowd's reaction, and noting where there is room for improvement before they start playing paid gigs.

Goldenberg first started playing the drums during his sophomore year in high school by taking private lessons after school. He later joined a band for two years called Higher Authority. The group played hard and classic rock, as well as popular music for their friends and the school. He now plays in Washington College's Jazz Band. Fatman says he was influenced by Led Zeppelin , especially their drummer John Bonham, The Village People, Abba, Menudo, those lovable Brain Chillins, and all the Sacred Cows groupies in the world.

Singer Bruce Hamilton also sang with a band at his former school, Simon's Rock of Bard College. He states rather modestly that he only joined the band, Da Da Dread, as guest vocalist occasionally. Hamilton says his musical influences are Otis Redding, Marvin Gaye, and George Clinton.

Bass guitarist Eric "The Bull" Forste is definitely the sane one in the band. He was influenced by his father who is also a musician and plays various horns, as well as the accordion and the piano. Forste states he has been in orchestra and jazz bands up through college, but has never been in an independent band before now.

Josh "The Clamp" Buchman is rhythm guitarist for the Sacred Cows. He states that he first picked up the guitar after a bizarre incident in England. He was in a small British town, separated from his parents, when he found a stable in which lay a guitar. An old wise man asked him to keep the guitar and carry on the tradition of the town. Buchman says he was influenced by early Celtic music, Mozart's acid years, and Lou Reed.

Lead guitarist Jim Souvlis started playing the guitar at the age of six. He was a member of a band at St. Mark's high school called Room X. Neil Young, the Grateful Dead, Baroque music, and the Osmonds inspired Jim to be a guitarist.

The guys are fun and sarcastic and the music is great. The group is just starting, so there are some kinks which need to be smoothed out. But with continued practice and support their future looks bright.

Dr. Clark-Lewis presents Freedom Bags

A film and lecture on the effects of migration from the rural south to the northern city on working-class women will be presented by the Washington College Committee on African American History Wednesday, February 27 at 8 p.m. in the college's new Casey Academic Center Forum. The lecture, given by Howard University professor of history Elizabeth Clark-Lewis, is free and open to the public.

Dr. Clark-Lewis was the writer and producer of the video documentary "Freedom Bags: African-Americans and Migration to Washington, D.C.," winner of the 1990 WETA Channel 26 Project Award. The film is an oral history of the changing nature of work expected of working-class black women in the 20th Century, as they moved from the rural south to the industrial north, and from serving almost exclusively as live-in domestic workers to become a more diversified workforce. Dr. Clark-Lewis, who has done extensive work in African American urban history and gender roles, will present the documentary and then discuss her research for this project.

Brown speaks on Greenhouse Effect

"The Greenhouse Effect and the Planetary Trust" will be the topic at Washington College's William James Forum next Tuesday evening, February 26, at 7:30 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center. All are welcome to attend.

The speaker will be Dr. Peter Brown, director of the environmental studies program at the University of Maryland's School of Public Affairs. The school now offers M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in environmental studies.

Dr. Brown, who holds degrees from Haverford College and Columbia, is the founder of the Center for Philosophy and Public Affairs at Maryland and played a leading role in setting up the School of Public Affairs, of which he has served as acting dean.

No armchair environmentalist, Dr. Brown, who lives at the Aspen Institute here on the Eastern Shore, devotes his weekends to promoting conservation at his farm in Garrett County, Maryland. His wife Judith Brown is Vice-President of the Aspen Institute.

How come I and every student at this college, had to pay nearly double the cost of a daily issue of The Washington Post, for that one issue? Why weren't these questions addressed in Offset ? Mr. Griep, do you mind Crack magazine getting $1400, or is this ok, because these people are your friends ?

Just in closing I would like to say, that I truly did like some of what was printed in this "new" paper, and I have nothing personally against Mr. Griep. I just ask that in the future Mr. Griep, if you have a gripe, please research the subject thoroughly before you write. I did feel that some points in Offset were good, that with of course the exception of the SGA article, the majority of the comics which were offensive, lacked taste, humor or a combination thereof, and some of the comments made about the ARC, not the CAC. For instance, the elevator was placed in the building (in compliance with new MD zoning regulations) for the purpose of helping out handicapped people who are unable to go up and down stairs. Unfortunately, the people behind these comments are unfamiliar with physical handicaps, but are perhaps too familiar with mental ones. (Emphasis Added).

extraordinary freedom that students posses and the responsibility to impact on our society. Kelly mentioned the college students in Czechoslovakia and China and the effects that their actions had in changing a system which they saw as problematic. He stated that while students at Washington College may not have the need to act as radically as students in nations that are more oppressed, we do have the responsibility to "impact on our own society."

Kelly commended the actions of three Washington College students - Erin Hodge-Williams and Maria Jerardi who have implemented a community service program called Hands Out, and Freshman Class President Lionel Dyson who is in the process of instituting a chapter of the NAACP on campus. He said that such concern for our community is necessary for today's college students to make a positive impact on our world.

arm's length from the hosts for much of the second half until Rupert sank a layup to trim the Jays' lead to 50-47 with 11:43 remaining.

Unfortunately, Hopkins sprinted out to 11-2 run before Lester dropped a three-point bomb and Vican scored a layup to make the score 61-54.

The Shoremen got within five when Lester drove the lane or a layup at the 2:51 mark to make it a 65-60 lead.

As the Shoremen looked primed to overtake the Jays, Hopkins opened the lead to 69-60 with one minute remaining. Although the action was fast and furious, Hopkins was able to hold off a WAC run to pull out a 73-71 victory.

Lester led WC scorers with 24 points (4 three-pointers). Vican and junior Tim Liddy had 19 and 12 respectively. Freshman Greg Rogers contributed with 7 points and 4 steals.

The latter part of the 90-91 campaign for the Shoremen seemed to demonstrate that this young team has alot of talent that is beginning to mature and jell as a unit. The WAC will be back oner than many expected.

White achieves national ranking in USA Today

By: Susie Mazzullo

On Friday February 22, Senior Donna White became the first student in Washington College history to be named to the USA Today Poll of top college students.

In an article entitled "Cream of the college crop", USA Today listed the top undergraduate students in the nation. According to the newspaper, the students' average grade is 3.92 but that isn't all that qualifies these students for such an honor. "They're set apart from hundreds of other brilliant candidates by a blend of creativity, initiative, leadership, and a desire to use their talent to help others"

The students, selected from various colleges and universities around the nation, were placed in one of four categories. There were twenty students in each of the first three teams and sixty two students listed as honorable mention. Donna was named to the third team of the All USA College Academic Team.

Donna was nominated by the school for this honor. Her nomination came from Dean Baer, Provost and Dean of the College and President Charles H. Trout.

The nomination, however, was only the beginning. Donna then had to fill out a team nomination form in which she described her campus activities, extracurricular activities, and anything else that she felt would set her apart from other students in the nation.

She also had to submit a paper describing her most outstanding intellectual endeavor thus far in her college career. Donna chose to describe the research she conducted at the Center of Marine Biotechnology, University of Maryland in Baltimore this past summer. Donna conducted her research in the lab of Dr. Fred Singleton. During this time Donna studied the effects of starvation on several marine organisms.All of this information had to be sent back to Dean Baer who then included Donna's transcripts and a personal recommendation and sent it off to the USA Today panel of judges.

In the letter of recommendation, Dean Baer commented on the work that Donna accomplished this summer with Dr. Singleton. "Dr. Singleton was so impressed with Donna's abilities that he is simultaneously trying to recruit her to study at the University of Maryland and work in his lab, supporting her application to

New S.G.A. executive board to take office next week

By: Laura Hopper

The Student Government Association held its weekly meeting Tuesday, February 26, in the Sophie Kerr meeting. This was the last meeting of the current executive board since elections are on Thursday, and the new executive board will take office at next weeks meeting.

SGA president Kevin Kelly called the meeting to order. The meeting began with committee reports. Social Chair Steve Huetner apologized to the residents of Minta Martin on behalf of the Washington College Rugby Club for the behavior of the rugby team from Salisbury. Huetner asked the senators from Minta Martin to convey his sincere apology to their constituents.

Parliamentarian Gordy Scherer apologized for missing recent SGA meetings and reminded all senators that the new executive board will be sworn in next week.

Dean Baer to resign as of June 1, 1991

By: Kyndra Ponder

Elizabeth Baer, Provost and Academic Dean of Washington College, has announced her intention to resign beginning June 1, 1991. The decision, Baer stated, was " a mutual decision" between herself and President Trout, adding that she felt "given his (Trout's) priorities for the institution, the college would be better served by a new Dean."

The position that Baer vacates will be filled by an interim Provost who will be selected from the faculty. President Trout is currently taking nominations from the faculty members and Baer states that she expects Trout to work fairly quickly to make a decision as to her successor.

Dean Baer said that she will remember her experiences at Washington College fondly, adding that she is "very pleased with the changes that have occurred here over the last six years." She cited the increased awareness of issues or race and gender and the fact that the college now has more women faculty members and two Afro American faculty members. She also expressed her happiness about the strength and growth of the Academic Computing Program here.

Although Baer will resign her duties, June 1, she will be on sabbatical for the 1991-1992 school year. During that time she will complete the manuscript of her book and will begin to work on a second book that will "study the relationship between the books that women writers read as children and the books that they write as adults."

Baer added that she will be "grateful for the time" to concentrate on her writing because the extra time will only "make

EDITORIAL

Now that this war is over with...

The recent statement by President Bush announcing a cease fire in the Gulf war is certainly cause for celebration. In a matter of six weeks, with a small number of casualties, the coalition has driven Iraq from Kuwait, and allowed that people the right of self-determination.

Now, it is time to turn our attention elsewhere. While the United States was busy freeing Iraq, the Soviet Union was turning its attention on to the Baltic States. These tiny republics have existed as part of the Soviet Union since they were forced into a mutual assistance pact, and then seized outright in the 1940's. Now in the wake of glasnost and perestroika, these peoples have decided that their time has come. But apparently, the army had other ideas.

It is also time to turn our attention to domestic issues. The economy might not respond the way the president hopes it will to lower oil prices. Our environment needs help, our schools need help, our inner cities need help, our highways need help. So while there a host of important events on the international scene that will require American attention, there are just as many problems and projects on the national level that are just as pressing.

One positive way to solve our domestic problems is through volunteer work. There are 75 million Americans who can't read adequately. There are millions of unwanted pets that need homes. There are homeless people living in the streets. There are people dying of AIDS. There are issues such as abortion that need to be resolved. It is time to clean house, and start finding solutions to the every growing number of problems that our country faces. We can teach people to read, and adopt cats and dogs, and build housing for the homeless and learn compassion for people dying of a terrifying and horrible disease.

Letters to the Editor

Heartfelt thanks from Habitat

Editor:

Chester Valley Habitat's first work day last Saturday was a tremendous success. Over one hundred volunteers came to prepare the foundation and work on the interior, and three quarters of the workers were Washington College students. Many thanks to Hands Out coordinators Linda Cades, Erin Hodge-Williams, and Maria Jerardi and to all the students who worked so hard. We coundn't have done it without you.

Thanks also to the Washington College Elm for publicizing the our need for volunteers.

Many works days will follow before this project is finished. Thank you all for getting us off to a great start.

Apology from Rugby Club to Minta Martin

To the residents of Minta Martin:

This letter is to communicate the Washington College Rugby Club's feelings regarding the disturbing episode at the social function on Friday night. We do not endorse the behavior of the Salisbury rugby players involved, and hope sincerely that this particular incident will not lead to any ill-feelings between the residents of Minta Martin and the W.C.R.F.C.

While it is important to realize that these players were not invited to come up on Friday evening, and were certainly not brought to the party as guests of the W.C.R.F.C., we do accept full responsibility for this disturbing demonstration, and we do hereby pledge that in the future appropriate means will be adopted to avoid similar events.

Once again let me offer an apology on behalf of the entire Washington College Rugby Football Club. Rugby is supposed to be a gentlemen's game, and we at the W.C.R.F.C. try very hard to represent it in that manner here at Washington College.

Thank you for your understanding,

Seth Engel,
President, W.C.R.F.C.

What issues should the new SGA executive board confront?

No issues you say

When I thought about the issues that the SGA president should address, nothing came to mind at first. But, after taking a long look around the campus, several topics came to mind.

Parking is one of them. The president should work with the Administration to help end the Washington College bumper to bumper syndrome. The SGA needs to be involved, otherwise the College will simply decide the issue for use by setting out a new policy, and that will be it.

Is there a way to solve the daily contest between students and cars/trucks/semis in the crosswalk? At least once a day, some motorist, either hurried or irate, refuses to yield to students in the crosswalk. With four dormitories located on the opposite side of 213 from the campus, this is a problem that needs some sort of solution before some gets seriously hurt.

The "social depression" as one of the candidates for social chair called it. The one time there is parking behind Reid Hall is on the weekends when everyone (or it seems like everyone) leaves. The only way to keep students on campus, is, obviously, to make them want to stay on campus.

And then there's the Honor Code. Do we need a new one? Or does the current Honor Code just need some help? Face it, there are many cases where people have "gotten off" for breaking the Honor Code. Extenuating circumstances do happen, but there are enough recent examples of people getting off easy, and then getting in trouble only a few weeks later.

What about renovations for Hodson Hall? When are they going to happen? What will be put in? What will be done to the Coffee House? Here is a place where the SGA could provide invaluable student insight to the Administration. How can the College understand what the students want, if we never tell them. .

Recycling on campus should also be handled. People come through to pick up our cans, but won't pick up glass or paper. Part of becoming a responsible citizen is caring for our environment. Recycling could become a beneficial, campus-wide program, that involves all sorts of recyclable materials, instead of primarily aluminum and glass. While we're on the subject of the environment, there must be a better way to do carry-out in the Dining Hall than those Styrafoam trays, maybe lunch boxes or paper trays.

Here's what you had to say about SGA funding of Greek Organizations

"No I don't, the SGA should not set a precedent by giving money to fraternities or sororities, they should be self supporting. The SGA has a set budget and fraternities and sororities have their own sources of funding".

Jennifer Reddish
Freshman
Denton, MD

"If fraternities or sororities are in need of assistance the SGA should help them. I think loans are perfectly acceptable, but money should not be directly given unless all fraternities and sororities receive equal amounts".

Michael Frey
Freshman
Holbrook, NY

"Yes they should, they perform a lot of valuable community services, the SGA gives money to clubs and club sports, so I don't see why Greek organizations should not be eligible for funding".

Joan Colton
Junior
Baltimore, MD

"Yes I do, I think Greek life adds so much to a college campus, you learn a lot through Greek life. If Greek organizations have funding there will be a lot more activities on campus. I think there is more to education than books".

Jamee Damron

"I certainly feel that the SGA should keep an open mind – and checkbook – to the needs of campus Greek organizations".

OUTLOOK

In the world: Bush calls for cease fire, fighting just about over

UNITED STATES:

President Bush said Tuesday that Saddam Hussein would fail in his bid to "save the remnants of power and control in the Middle East" and that the U.S. will continue a war of "undiminished intensity" to force the Iraqis from Kuwait. The aims of the United States are two fold: clinching a decisive Allied victory and stripping Hussein of much of the power he has used to threaten the region. At weeks begin, Hussein was still searching for a way out of the war short of surrender. In a statement made by President Bush Tuesday, he denounced as "an outrage" Hussein's announcement that Iraqi forces were withdrawing from Kuwait. "He is not withdrawing. His defeated forces are retreating. He is trying to claim victory in the midst of a rout. And he is not voluntarily giving up Kuwait. He is trying to save the remnants of power and control in the Middle East by every means possible. And here, too, Saddam Hussein will fail," said Bush. Because Hussein has shown no acceptance of the United Nations resolutions nor agreed to free prisoners of war after the end of the conflict, Bush said the Allies will continue the war.

PERSIAN GULF:

Allied forces encircled the Iraqi army Tuesday and began a systematic destruction of all forces that refuse to surrender, U.S. officials said. The ground attack, combined with six weeks of bombing, has destroyed or crippled 21 of Iraq's 42 combat divisions in the Kuwaiti theater. Iraq has lost roughly half of what the Iraqi army had when it invaded Kuwait. U.S. officials estimate that the Iraqis have 2,085 tanks and 1,005 artillery guns. More than 30,000 Iraqi prisoners of war are now held by the Allies. Initial reports seem to indicate that U.S. losses have been extremely low. Despite the success of the ground campaign, Brig. General Richard Neal said yesterday that "the war is not over, and we are going to continue to attack and attack and attack."

In Kuwait City, resistence leaders told the first Saudi and U.S. troops to arrive in the war torn capital that they were in control of most of the city but that fleeing Iraqi troops had taken thousands of Kuwaiti captives with them in their retreat. They could not give many details about the captives, but said they were rounded up at schools and mosques and included relatives of military personnel and prominent families. The Kuwaitis said they were holding 15 Iraqi soldiers at a local police station, and 18 more in the basement of a building. The special forces troops met the Kuwaitis on the outskirts of the city and were then taken on a probing inspection tour of tour of the largely abandoned downtown area. The troops went to the Saudi embassy and the the U.S. diplomatic compound, which they did not enter for fear of mines and booby traps. The Kuwaitis also said that the Iraqis surrendered without a fight, saying they were tired, hungary, wearyof the bombing or that they hated Saddam.

On Wednesday night, President Bush called a cease fire, and declared that the coalition forces had acheived their goals.

SOVIET UNION:

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev condemned the democratic opposition Tuesday, saying the a continuing struggle for power in the country could lead to civil war, disitigration and eventual dictatorship. The speech, delivered by Gorbachev in Minsk, was certainly a response to last weeks statement by Boris Yeltsin that the Soviet president ahd deceived the people and should resign. Gorbachev made it clear that he and Yeltisn now support "two different lines." Gorbachev said that while he supports "the socialist choice," "step-by-step" reforms and the maintenance of the Soviet Union, Yeltsin and the "so-called democrats" are in favor of the "restoration" of capitalism and the "collapse" of the union. Gorbachev said he believed the democrats were really anti-communists who refuse to cooperate with the communists. "What they are really up yo is to take power," said Gorbachev, who believes the confrontation with his former allies has become acute becauseof a series of military attacks on the Baltic states alst month and presidential decrees that have given Gorbachev greater powers to the army and KGB security police. The president went on to say that the intent of the decrees was distorted by his opponents. The break between Gorbachev and Yeltsin has underscored the continuing political polarization and the conflicting urges for order and accelerated change in the Soviet Union.

GERMANY:

After winning reelection less than three months ago with the promise that taxes would not rise, Chancellor Helmut Kohl unveiled a plan Tuesday for a $31 billion tax increase. Weeks of debate ended with the Bonn coalition agreeing on a package of income, gasoline and other taxes designed to stave off possiblebankrupcies among city and state governments in former East Germany. The proposed increases drew criticism from industry and labor, but the majority of voters agreed last December that kohl was underestimating that cost of reunification. Nearly all revenue from the increase is to be spent on the reconstruction of eastern Germany, with the bulk devoted to bringing its infrastructure up to western standards.

Men's lacrosse preview

By Matt Giller

Since last years defeat in the of Hobart at the NCAA Division III Championship, the Shoremen have lost a number of All-Americans and stars from the 1990 team either through graduation or some other less than fortunate reasons.

Although the recent tragic incident "Vangate", which rocked the WAC athletic program as well as the lacrosse world, is over, its echoes will be heard during each game. "The show must go on," might be the slogan for the 1991 team as they enter into again one of the most arduous schedules in the NCAA.

Some so-called knowledgeable fans see this team weaker and out of contention to repeat as a championship caliber team. Some observers raise several questions: Who will take over the offensive void left by Martino and Hormes? Who will anchor the defense? What will be their fate vs. Hobart this season?

First of all Hobart Shmobart.

Indeed, the Shoreman success is more difficult to predict than in year's past because of the bevy of unproven youth; however, one can be certain that they will play "Corcoran Lacrosse."

Another safe bet is the All-American performance and effort of senior co-captain, goalie Dave Slomkowski. Coach Corcoran, who helped coach the U.S. national team last summer that won the World Championships in Australia, calls Slomkowski the "best goalie in the country." How's that for a defensive anchor?

Joining "Slomo" as captain and "Leader of the WAC" are senior defensemen Matt Petz and Dave Cromwell and attackman Greg Rupert. The only other senior is starting defenseman Steve Pursley.

Offensively Rupert will lead an all-freshman attack. Preseason standouts have been Gibby Semes, Chris Sanchez and Dan Cooper. Other rookie attackmen include Bill Brimhall, Stu Warner and Kevin Knox.

At midfield sophomore Jed Cronin, who played attack last year, was one of the best freshmen last year. Cronin along with classmate Dave Lipinski will be asked to mature early and lead the "green" middies. The two should be aided by the speed of John Hernandez and at faceoffs by Blair Muneses. Other middies include junior Steve Russell, sophomore Ted Greeley and freshmen Ryan Mahoney, Jamie Carver, Chris Jones and Peter Greene.

Besides Slomkowski between the pipes and the three senior defensemen, untapped youth must step up and make their presence felt. Sophomores Justin Wiest and Curtis Campbell back up Slomkowski. Sophomore Dave Taibl and freshmen Jeremy Wolk and Dave Ratta and Mike Ratta, both of whom have been impressive in preseason, will get much PT.

The Shoremen host a couple of preseason games this weekend when they faceoff against Nazareth on Saturday and Georgetown on Sunday. Their regular season begins over spring break when they play Hopkins and Hampden-Sydney.

REC Sports: Water Basketball is fast, furious and not for the faint of heart

The action has been hot and heavy in the Casey swim center since the induction of the intramural water basketball league. This fledgling program headed by Matt "Thriller" Giller has had early success and hopes to become as competitive as the regular intramural basketball league, the fall football program, and the spring softball league in the years to come.

The first night of action saw the arrival of three highly competitive, trash-talking squads. First came the arrival of "All Washed Up," the team fielded by Cardinal F members Matt Woolston, Matt Moore, Phil Macek, and Chris Seymour. The team name takes its inspiration from the broken down, beer-swilling character played by Walter Matthau in the Bad News Bears. The team relies on pinpoint outside shooting, which complements their attack with tough interior play to get the hard baskets down the stretch. The team plays a pressing defense designed to wear down their foes and cut off their channels to the basket. After the first night, "All Washed Up" stands atop of the water hoops league with a 1-0 record.

Next to venture into the water is the aquatic version of UNLV: Sam "Anderson Hunt" Gessner, Tim "Larry Johnson" Liddy, and Dave "Stacey Augmon" Brightman. These guys are truly terrors on the regular hardwood courts but in the water become almost invincible. Team UNLV plays an up tempo game designed to put a lot of points on the board in the hurry. Liddy is a key weapon on offense and certainly the man to go to when the points are needed. Gessner runs the offense with his "thread the needle" passing skills, although to leave him open for the jumpshot is a costly mistake often resulting in two points. Brightman is the centerpiece of the team's transition game and intimidates the other opponents with his show stopping dunks. However, Dave has already broken three backboards and one more violation will result in a one game suspension from the league. This is certainly a team that plays the game above the rim.

Phil "Slice" Macek

The last team to arrive on the scene was "Aqua Mule" featuring the formidable bulk of "The Real Deal" Don Steele. In the early going, Don has proved a true force on the boards simply because no one can generate enough leverage to move him out of the way. On offense, Don likes to post up low and dump his little baby hook shot over his defender for an easy bucket. However, when a team pays too much attention to Don, he can deftly dish the ball off to the always dangerous Brian Heubeck. Brian can knock down the jumpers at a dizzying pace, but can also sneak inside for the easy lay-ups.

Overall, the three teams are very evenly matched and no one team can claim to be a runaway favorite for the title. So if your looking for a little action, come on down to the Casey swim center and watch the teams do their things. You won't be disappointed; unless you don't like "nothing but net" jumpers and "cake shakin', baby makin'" slam dunks. The choice is yours, but I think you'll be pleasantly surprised. And if any girls would like to be cheerleaders, throw on your bikini and come on down. The league could really use your support!

Slice leads the water basketball league in triple doubles and is not afraid to play defense either.

Peel leads women's tennis into '91 season

By Matt Giller

The 1991 women's tennis team is about to embark on a new season. The Shorewomen will try to improve on their outstanding 11-7 record considering the arduous schedule they played in '90.

All-American junior Tracy Peel, captain Rachel Rice and Miriam Dittman should provide more than capable leadership for the much improved sophomore Jennifer Sloan and rookies Pam Hendrickson and Kristy Karns.

Last year's NCAA Division III singles finalist, Peel finished the season 33-9 and All-American for the second straight year.

The Johannesburg, South African native had an outstanding fall as well that was culminated with her appearence in the finals of the prestigious Rolex Division III National Championships in Corpus Christi, Texas, in October. Peel enters the spring season with a cumulative record at Washington College of 78-19 and ranked second in the nation.

Tracy's doubles partner in the fall, freshman sensation Pam Hendrickson, who hails from Kutztown, Pennsylvania, made an impression on her opponents early by posting an 8-2 record in the fall. The Peel/Hendrickson doubles team is currently ranked fifth nationally. Pam is currently ranked ninth in the middle states.

Junior Miriam Dittman who was placed in the #3 singles slot during the '90 campaign that saw her post a 17-10 record. Miriam flawlessly cruised through MAC Southwest section matches by not losing a doubles or singles match.

Captain Rachel Rice won some honors during last year's season. Among some of Rachel's honors were doubles consolation championship in the Mount St. Mary's Invitational and 1990 candidate for NCAA Academic All-American. Rachel was undefeated in MAC Southwest section in doubles.

Sophomore Jennifer Sloan finished her rookie season with a respectable 7-8 record against excellent competition. Hopes are high for this superb athlete that received the coveted Most Improved Player in 1990.

Freshman Kristy Karns, although new to the Shorewomen and to the college game, is not knew to Chestertown or to the game. This C-town native compiled an unbelievable cumulative high school record of 45-7 at Kent County High School.

Matt Giller is an International Studies major who never misses an episode of "Puttin' on the Hits."

Read and Co. make their serve for a National Title

Matt Giller

The Washington College men's tennis team is like a runaway train that sees nothing in its way that can stop it. How many teams can boast the fact that even when losing their national champ to graduation, they still maintain the best player in the nation.

Last spring at the National Championships, the Shoremen sent Scott Flippin Read and Larry Gewer to the finals. Gewer outlasted his doubles partner 6-4, 6-3. Gewer is gone, however, Read is back.

Read left no doubts that he was securely the best in Division III when he won the coveted Rolex Division III National Small College Championship in Corpus Christi, Texas in the fall.

Read has compiled an impressive list of honors. Since winning the 1988 Division III Rookie of the Year award, Read has already compiled the most career singles wins in Shoreman history (138-22 in singles and 61-20 in doubles). Last year he finished with a singles record of 44-7 and a 27-6 doubles mark. Incidentally, Scott, besides his loss to Gewer in the finals last year, has not lost a Division III match in two years.

Read's doubles partner, Soviet transfer Irakli Metrevelli (son of Soviet tennis great of the '70s Alex) have earned a preseason doubles ranking of seventh. But if you think Metrevelli is riding on Read's coattails you're sorely mistaken. Metrevelli is currently ranked sixth in singles. The Russian addition will greatly help the Shoremen's chances for a national championship.

Another transfer will make an immediate impact on the team. New Mexico Military Institute transfer Trevor Hurd, is currntly ranked 48th in Division III. Trading guns for Ms. D Burgers has been to difficult for Hurd who helped win the 1990 Southeastern Regional doubles championship with Read. Trevor also was successful in the singles section of the tournament with a semifinalist appearence.

The fourth singles spot should belong to Alberto Diaz. Alberto starts off the season with a preseason ranking of fifth in singles and sixth in doubles in the NCAA South Atlantic region. Diaz had a tremendous rookie campaign as he compiled an outstanding 29-7 record and was the only freshman last year to represent the WAC at the NCAA's.

This team is deep as junior baseliner Andy "I'm not a pusher" Bohutinsky reflects the team's depth. Andy had an excellent fall(9-3) and an impressive spring campaign last year (16-10). A "heady" player on and off the court, Andy is a candidate for the Academic All-American team as he pulled off a 3.85 GPA (with no Tapkes) and ranked first in his class.

The 1991 team captain Jim Lim is the other senior on the team. Jim a steady leader on and off the court (and not a bad cook either) should help maintain strngth all through the WAC lineup.

Newcomer Mexican star, Carlos Nuno had an outstanding fall with an 8-4 singles record. A highly ranked player in the juniors level in Mexico, Carlos should make an early contribution for the Shoremen.

Some might say that should be enough; however when I say they're deep, they're deep. Emilio Bogado, ranked 14th in the 18's in Argentina, went 6-3 this fall.

Junior Jeff Rexford, who traded in the leather lace of lax to the gut strings of tennis, needs match experience but he has the tools. And John Wyman, another rookie, will be relied upon to play primarily doubles.

ihe editor is qite certain that Scott Hippin Read could not carry the editor's jock in roundball.

Shoreman Baseball: Gloves are oiled, arms are loose and the bats are hot

In Coach Athey's 42 years at the helm as baseball coach at the WAC, he has probably never had such a young team.

Nine freshmen fill up half the team. This class, although young, is extremely talented. Calvert Hall star pitcher and outfielder, Keith Whiteford, and Wilmington standout shortstop Rory Conway are counted on to provide hitting punch to the lineup. Whitey will be looked to be one of the top three starting pitchers in the rotation, as well.

Rookie southpaw pitchers Scott Cole and Ed Atwood each have excellent control and will get a lot of work on the hill as well.

Other frosh prospects include hard-throwing Mitch O'Shea, finesse southpaw Marc Satterfield and Kent County product, Brian Walters will all help bolster the Shoreman bullpen.

A couple of rookies will get to roam the outfield. Soccer star Kyle Hutchinson and smooth hitting Jason Kraus should prove to be excellent additions.

Hoping to lead these youngsters are captains Hal McBee, Graeme "Ogre" Wildman and Matt Giller. McBee and Wildman are the only proven pitchers on the squad. Although both pitchers posted 0-2 records, they have the talent to stop anyone in the conference. Wildman left four games last year with the lead or with a tie game - each one he lost his decision or the bullpen lost the game. McBee, who has the hardest stuff in the conference, is making a gutty comeback after a near career-ending elbow injury. Both of them will be counted on to improve on last year's 6.21 team ERA.

Sophomore southpaw Jerry Hunt, the only other pitcher with any significant college experience, will bring some finesse out of the pen.

Hitting should be their meal ticket this year. The team brings back the heart of the lineup that helped the team average over seven runs per game last year.

Seniors McBee, outfield (.429, 4 HRS, 28 RBI's, 7 doubles), Giller, first base (.364, 4 HRS, 27 RBI's, 23 Runs), and unior John Morrall, outfield, catcher (.286, 24 RBI's, 18 Runs) will provide most of the punch in the 3,4 and 5 spots in the lineup.

Sophomore Mike Hanifee (18 Runs, 18 Walks) and freshman speedster Rory Conway (.333, 8 stolen bases in the fall) should both get on base often.

Freshmen Keith Whiteford and catcher Andy Parks will be

Rugby Preview: Real men or QuicheEaters?

By Don Steele

The Washington College Rugby Football Club(fall reord: 3-2) is back. This posse of finely tuned athletes that has rucked its way into hearts has come back for its second semester of elegant violence.

The team has had two weeks of practice including a scrimmage against Salisbury and starts its regular season tomorrow at Delaware. Delaware is the only team this side of the Atlantic to beat WC.

Seth Engel has assembled this motley crew with his timeless efforts as president. He has spent many hours fundraising, getting the team matches and finding females worthy of the Rugby Queen crown and the glory that comes with it.

Frank Crivelli is helping Seth this semester. Frank was a driving force behind last semester's inaugural team, but an injury to his knee has forced him to assume a "Quayle-like" role as Vice-President.

The team is sporting a new coach for its second season. Pete Landon; the "Sargent of Scrums," the "Lieutenant of Laps" is now at the reigns of this no longer fledgling team. A state-trooper by trade, Landon is now stopping the arrest of our rugby knowledge by keeping us off the streets and keeping us on the field.

Sam Gessner has left the coaching ranks to pursue an Al Davis-like role. He can still be seen pacing the sidelines; however, Slammer now has much more cerebral responsibilities for the team and its concept. Slammer lives and dies by his concept of total rugby and can often be heard muttering the phrase, "fifteen men together, playing as one cannot lose."

The nucleus of last semester's team is still intact. The loss of Kevin McLaughlin has surprisingly not hurt the team. The success of the team has led to a rash of newcomers, adding more diversity to this team that already covers the spectrum of collegiate life. The wily veterans of one semester have welcomed the new players with open arms. With this bevy of green recruits, ample bodies can be used for two full squads-an "A" and "B" squad - for games.

The team has quite an ambitious schedule for the spring. After this weekend's visit to scenic Newark, games are planned against St. Mary's, Temple, and various other colleges from the tri-state area. A weekend trip to Vassar College is planned for April. The highlight of the season should be the President's Cup. This is a tournament hosted by the school as a showcase for rugby.

There is also hope for the team's Chorale Ensemble. Rumors have run rampant of a recording contract for the crooners version of the feel good hit "The St M Man." No plans have been made for a C.D. box set as of yet. Fans, however, are hoping that where this smoke there is fire.

So, if you find yourself bored on a spring Saturday, find out where the rugby team is and support us. Remember: If You're Coming We're Scrumming.

Don Steele is a Mule who enjoys pina calodas and getting caught in the rain.

Editor's Note: None of the actions taken by the Rugby Club reflect that of the school community or even for the most part of the society that bred them.

Men's and women's Crew: Davenport begins campaign on the Eastern Shore

By Charlie Pilkington

Since its founding in 1971, the Washington College Rowing Program has grown in size from 8 rowers to over 40 rowers. For a college of its size, this large number of male and female participants has made Crew one of the biggest co-ed sport.

Fall 1990 saw a number of changes occuring around campus ranging from the inauguration of President Trout to the completion of the Casey Academic Resource Center. Another one was the successful hiring of a full time Crew coach, Mike Davenport. A graduate and former coach at Florida Institute of Technology, Mike came to Washington from the University of Albany. During his two years there, the program grew from 45 rowers to over 90 rowers. Mike is also presently involved with assisting with the coaching of the U.S. National Team. During the fall season, he travelled with them to Tazmania for the World Championships. Since his arrival, Mike, along with his assistant, Glenn Merry, and the women's coach, Peter Martin have brought several noticeable improvements to the program.

The most noticeable one came from President Trout in late November. He announced, to the suprise of the entire team and the coaching staff, that the Hodson Trust was going to donate money for the purchase of two new Vespoli shells. These shells are expected to arrive in time for Spring Break. Other changes have included a mandatory winter break workout schedule. The workouts consisted of three erg pieces ranging from 20,000 to 5,000 meters in length on alternate days to various conditioning exercises. They were intended to prepare the rowers for the upcoming racing season.

Since practice began on January 18th, the team has shown noticable improvement. Many of the rowers have dropped their erg scores and have begun to realize what can be achieved with a little hard work. Coupled with the enthusiasm which was demonstrated by the team during the world record setting Row-a-thon, a positive tone was set for the remainder of winter training. Everyone has also shown a determination to succeed in beating the likes of George Mason, Georgetown, George Washington and John Hopkins and in sending competitive boats to the Dad Vails in early May.

Under the leadership of the co-captains, Than Hansen and Will Brandenburg, the men's team is made up of 18 members, with the majority being sophmores. There are only four remaining seniors, so that should bode well for the future of the program. With more than enough people needed to field two competitive eights, practices are more enjoyable since boats are able to row together. The woman's team captain Stacey Maenner has also been very successful at unifying a very young team. Stacey is the lone senior on a team full of mostly sophmore's and freshmen. Unfortunately, the team lost a number of their experienced rowers due to more pressing committments.

The first race is on March 23rd against Skidmore and George Mason. This is one of two home races, since most of the sprints are in Philadelphia and Washington, D.C. The next big home regatta, the Washington College Invitational is on April 27rd.

Women's swim team impressive at Conference Championships

By Matt Giller

Three Washington College relay records were smashed at the Middle Atlantic Conference meet February 21-23.

The 200 freestyle relay team of Magdelena Fuchs, Mimi Devlin, Jennifer Green and Samantha Streamer broke the school record set one week ago swimming to a speedy 1:48.4. Fuchs, Devlin and Streamer joined Kasey Carroll to a fifth place finish in the 800 freestyle relay with a time of 8:34.1 (breaking the old school record by four seconds). Their fifth place finish was the highest finish ever by a Shorewomen team at the Conference Championships.

The same four joined together for another record in the 400 free relay. Their time of 3:56 again KO'ed the old record by four seconds.

Kasey Carroll continued her record breaking swims in the 400 IM (4:49.0) for a third finish. Carroll also swam a season best 1650 free (17:54) for a second place finish. The junior All-American again thrilled the crowd with a fourth place finish in the 500 free.

In her last MAC meet, Streamer scored in all three of her individual events (50, 100 and 200 frees). The senior swam a personal best, as well, in the 200 free.

Freshmen Green and Devlin proved their worth to WC this year. Green swam to two personal best swims in the 100 and 200 backstroke scoring in both events. Devlin scored in all three of her individual events -- the 200 IM, 400 IM and 200 butterfly.

Junior Leslie Newcomb also added points in the 1650 free. Newcomb then teamed up with Green, Carroll and Streamer to swim a season best in the 200 medley relay and scored points. In the same event they substituted Streamer for Devlin and added another season best time for a tenth place finish.

Although not all scored points many ended the season and/or college careers with personal bests at the MAC's. PB times were turned in by freshman Ramsey Bingham and senior Kristen Callazzo in the 50 free, Magdalena Fuchs in the 100 and 200 free, Karen Prendergast in the 100 and 200 free, and senior Vickie Vahos in the 100 and 200 backstroke.

Hoops: Vican wins Conference honors

By Matt Giller

Sophomore pivotman Darren Vican stepped up this season and took a seat among the Middle Atlantic Conferences best by making the All-Conference team.

The 6 foot 9 inch center dominated the paint and lead the WAC with over 15 points per game and lead to the team in rebounds as well.

Although he was relegated to the bench most of last season because of starting force Chris "Bull" Jamke, Vican knew that he had to work in the off-season to improve his skills and fill the large vacant shoes left by Jamke.

Vican admits that his rapid improvement wasn't easy: "I just worked hard at the skills that Coach Finnegan has tutored. A lot of blood, sweat and tears go into making the conference team."

What does Darren think about the company he's in? "I remember last year seeing those people lighting it up out there. I never thought I could rise to that level so quickly."

Although the soft-spoken big man gives much of the credit to his players around him that went to him down the stretch, he gives most of the credit to his best compadre on the team, Bill Weber.

"Indeed, without a doubt, Bill helped out all through my development and during the season.

"I'm pretty darn nervous out there in front of the crowd; Billy has a lot of techniques that helps me relax that I don't want to get into right now. Golly, I'm just glad to get this honor. Excuse me I have to call home."

The Shoremen's hopes for improvement mainly lay on this big man's shoulders next year. Darren should handle it well.

counted on to produce runs as well. Third year man J.R. Francamano will carry some of the catching duties as well, but he will be counted on primarily to lift fly balls over the Cardinal dorms. Second basemen Keith Faust and Kevin "Sparky" Kelly should provide speed on the bases in the bottom of the lineup.

The team travels to Winter Park, Florida to play eight games in seven days against arduous competition. They return to start their regular season against Tufts University on March 21.

The Hands Out program makes a difference

EXPERT HOUSE MOVERS

Amy Tiehel

Senior Erin Hodge Williams had a mission when she began working on Hands Out. She wanted to get the Washington College students involved in the community around them. Erin realized that the Chestertown area alone had numerous volunteer projects that could benefit from the help of students at the college. This past Saturday, February 23, Erin achieved her goal as many students volunteered their time to the Habitat for Humanity project in nearby Fairlee.

Habitat for Humanity is a local, non-profit organization which is run by a board of fourteen local residents. Their main objective is securing either housing, property or both for needy families. This project was their first since the organization began three years ago. The organization came about because originally the church identified low income housing in the area as a crucial issue. Habitat was suitable for the area because it got the community involved and dealt with one family at a time. Reverend Glenn Catley, President of the Chester Valley Board of Habitat explained the way they found the family for this project, "First we selected a family and second we found a property." They found Janice Fisher through various channels. Her family's home had burned down about six years ago but she still had the land. All Habitat needed to find was a way to either build a house or get one somewhere else. Mr. Tom McGlen stepped in at this point and donated a house he had bought so he could build a car wash. The house was in good condition and he didn't want to destroy it. When he found out about Habitat he promptly donated the house. The house was moved on a truck from Chestertown to Janice Fisher's property. Once in place, many volunteers were needed to dig the foundation and basically renovate the entire inside.

Habitat for Humanity relies heavily on community involvement. Since they are a non-profit organization all their funding comes from donations. Any supplies or labor must be donated as well. Mr. John Pharo, of the Chester Valley Board stated, " Our ultimate goal is to be better organized in getting volunteer specialists, for example, carpenters, and then unskilled volunteers can assist them. Also, we would like to get a list of trained people in the area who would be willing to give some of their time." While this has not been achieved, the turn out on Saturday was quite impressive. Many local residents did their share of digging and hauling. Mrs. Finch of Rock Hall has supported Habitat for Humanity internationally for years. She volunteers her time because she finds it "a practical solution to a problem." Mr. Robert Moore, long time neighbor and friend of Janice Fisher's family said he was there because he was "helping out friends." While the local turn out was tremendous, the college students really turned out in large numbers. Many college organizations, fraternities, and sororities were represented on Saturday. Other students showed up just because they were into the spirit of giving. Seniors Matt Moore and Don Steele were there early Saturday. They both heard about the project through campus fliers and they were there because, as Matt explained, "It's a good chance to help people." Senior Felicia Shakman echoed this view and said," I wanted to do something productive; for someone else other than myself." The Phi Delta Theta and Sig fraternity were well represented. Asked why so many fraternity members were there, Chris Kleberg, President of the Phi Delts, stated that, "Fraternities have always been given a bad name and we'd like to change that." Many of the fraternities asked their pledges to come to the Habitat project. Freshman Sig pledge Jasper Hopper explained why they were there, "Even though the Sigs are banished from campus we still feel it is important to do out part in helping our community." Sandra McLellan of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority expressed the idea underlying the spirit of the day, " It is important to help people who need help; and it is especially important to bring the college and community together." Also represented was the Women's Lacrosse Team. Lacrosse team members Lee Anne Ledwin and Kristy Hilgartner signed up with the team because, as they expressed, "We like to do our part for others who need help. It's also a great way to get involved with the community and establish a good relationship between the college students and local residents."

The turn out on Saturday was quite impressive and it was an excellent start for Hands Out. Thanks must be extended to all those students who took the time on Saturday to dig, haul, hammer, load, unload, and bury dead cats. Thanks also to Erin and Maria Jerardi for all their hard work, time and energy. Hands Out has definitely made a difference in getting the students involved in the community. Many students really enjoyed the time they spent helping Janice Fisher and her family. They discovered that it only took a couple of hours to volunteer. Yet it will most certainly last Janice Fisher and her family a lifetime.

If you would like to volunteer your time you can pick up a Hands Out pamphlet in the Career Development Office.

Classical pianist performs

Pianist Jeanette Micklem, one of Zimbabwe's leading musicians and concert artists, will perform works of Beethoven, Liszt, Debussy and Smetana at Washington College, Wednesday, March 6 as part of her current United States tour. The concert, sponsored by the Washington College Lecture Committee, will be given in the Tawes Theater of the Gibson Performing Arts Center.

Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Jeanette Micklem, who studied at the Zimbabwe College of Music under Margot Osler and completed her studies with the acclaimed pianist Bernard Roberts at the Royal College of Music in London, performs regularly in Zimbabwe, Zambia, Malawi and Botswana, and has toured the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and the United States, where she is making her second appearance. Following the Washington College concert, she will be performing the Shostakovich Second Piano Concerto with Musica Viva in New York City.

The featured work on Micklem's concert at Washington College will be the Sonata no. 32 in C minor, opus 111, by Ludwig van Beethoven. In this, the composer's last sonata, Beethoven breaks away from the standard classical form by composing just two complex, contrasting movements.

The first movement, allegro con brio ad appasionato, is filled with stormy turbulence that rises to a violent climax before closing quietly in C major, in preparation for the arietta of the second movement. This is a theme with variations, marked by simple, falling intervals which gradually increase into what has been called an "ecstatic vision," as fragments of the theme reappear while chains of trills ascend into higher and higher regions of the keyboard. This famous sonata has never before been performed at Washington College.

Other music in Micklem's program includes Three Poetic Polkas by Bedrich Smetana; Estampes (etchings), three programmatic pieces by Claude Debussy which demonstrate the French composer's mastery of modern romantic technique; and Benedictions de Dieu dans la Solitude (God's blessing in Solitude), by Franz Liszt. This is from a set of three Harmonies Poetiques et Religieuses and is acclaimed as one of Liszt's most exalted masterpieces.

Jeanette Micklem will perform at 8 p.m. Wednesday, March 6 in the Gibson Performing Arts Center at Washington College. Admission is free, and for information call (301) 778-2800, ext. 402.

Open Mike Night rocks with Yellow House, Chillins and Cows

by Julie Greene

Quite a crowd turned out for last Friday night's Open Mike Night. Precious time was spent in stopping by the Coffee House. In their last "free" show, the Sacred Cows were in rare form. They played two sets, the latter being the best.

Before the Cows hit the stage the audience was treated to an acoustic set by Joseph Hamilton and Jonas White. A Billy Bragg song as well as an acoustic "Bike" by Pink Floyd were received well, and the crowd warmed to their performance. Chestertonian Bruce Morgan shared a few of his original seventy songs with us, as did Raphael Koster, who also played a few Indigo Girls tunes. Heather Lynch shared some of her poetry and the Brain Chillins stirred things up with a provocative performance that featured Tom Ilmensee's chest graffiti and body tinfoil.

In addition to the Cows and the Chillins, the audience was most receptive to a new trio tentatively named Yellow House. They premiered February 2nd at Open Mike Night and were received well then also.

The trio includes acoustic guitarists Tom Arthur and Bill Milford, with Meg Murray doing vocals. Arthur and Milford have been playing together for four years and were joined a month ago by Meg. Murray stated that they only practiced four or five hours before each performance.

At their premiere they played Hey, Hey, What Can I Do by Led Zeppelin and Bonnie Raitt's The Road Is My Middle Name. Last Friday Arthur sang Sympathy For the Devil by The Rolling Stones and Crack The Sky's Long Nights. Murray sang Land Slide by Fleetwood Mac and got a standing ovation for Melissa Etheridge's No Souvenirs.

Murray has an incredible voice that can truly be appreciated. Although she graduated from WC in May last year with a Humanities major, Murray is currently taking the Ed Block. She hopes to be a social studies teacher as well as continue singing.

A Maryland native, Murray took Voice here at Washington College her sophomore year. Besides being involved in plays and chorus in high school, she has participated in WC's Renaissance Christmas Dinner and the Community Choir. Her influences are Bruce Springsteen, Bonnie Raitt, and Frank Sinatra.

Tom Arthur is a senior majoring in Math at WC. He plays the acoustic guitar, as well as the electric, and sings too. He took private lessons around the age of eight. Since then he has played in a group called the Domestic Imports, about two years ago.

Senior Business major Bill Milford likes doing little things like this trio, but does not plan on getting too serious with music as a career. Milford's influences include the Grateful Dead, Pink Floyd, and The Doors.

Thanks to all who showed up at Open Mike Night, especially to those who performed. My apologies to those whose are not mentioned here. There will be another Open Mike Night tonight in the Coffee House. Everyone is encouraged to attend.

Julie Greene is a junior majoring in Economics and is a Sacred Calf.

continue her study of science in Great Britain under a Fulbright scholarship, and introducing her to some scientists at Harvard University, where he believes she has a chance for a graduate school admission. A man like Dr. Singleton does not lightly assume the duties of a mentor, unless he believes in the scientific capabilities of an individual. I truly understand his admiration of Donna White, as I share it."

Donna is a senior biology major who specializes in molecular and cellular biology. She is very active in almost every facet of life her at Washington college, whether it be academic, athletic or social. She is currently a Resident Assistant for second floor Reid and a peer advisor. She is a member of the Omacron Delta Kappa Honor Society and President of The Society of Sciences. Donna is also very active in the athletic part of college. This year she served as one of the three captains of the women's field hockey team and under her leadership, the team made it to the Middle Atlantic Conference playoffs for the first time in Washington College history. The team ended up 14th in the nation and second in the region. Currently, Donna is captain of the women's lacrosse team.

As a senior Donna has a number of other things to do on top of all of these activities. Primarily, she has a thesis to complete and her future plans to finalize. She wants to continue on in her schooling, but, which school she wants to attend is still in question. Her opportunities, however, are great.

Donna has a number of schools she is currently looking at and a number of school that are looking at her in return.

Over spring break Donna will be traveling to California to visit the University of California in Santa Barbara. They are paying for her entire trip. They have already accepted her for the fall and this trip is for Donna to meet some of the faculty and tour the campus.

In the past couple of weeks Donna traveled to the University of Pennsylvania where she had interviews with administration and faculty there. She has also applied to Johns Hopkins, Johns Hopkins Medical School, Harvard, and Yale.

Donna's first choice, however, is to spend a year at Manchester in England conducting more research. If she receives the Fulbright Scholarship this is exactly what she will be doing. Under this scholarship, the recipients travel abroad to do research in their chosen field. Their trip is paid for and they are given money to spend while they are there. Donna has made it to the final selection process. A committee selected by the President of the United States is currently reviewing her file as well as the files of the other students who have qualified thus far.

When asked how she felt about being named in the top students of the nation Donna said that "it is a great honor". She also said that she owes a lot to her thesis advisor, Dr. Ford, for all of her patience and understanding.

USA Today said that the top students were selected "for their outstanding blend of scholarship, initiative, creativity, and leadership, and their desire to use their talent to help others." Donna White deserves this honor and the best of luck in the future ahead of her. She is one student who makes the Washington College Community very proud.

the book better". In addition, Baer stated that she will use the time to look for another job, although she is not sure which direction she would like her career to go. She is thinking about continuing to work in Higher Education Administration, but would also like to teach because it would offer her time to research and to interact with students. She is also toying with the idea of living abroad.

Baer concluded by saying that she "will always think fondly of the community" of Chestertown and Washington College.

Treasurer Brian Gimelson reported that the SGA has spent $ 1927.23 in club funding so far this semester, and said the SGA was in excellent shape for the remainder of the semester. He also presented a funding request from the Hillel organization for $ 500. President Trout agreed to match SGA funding for Hillel up to $ 250. The senate approved $ 250.

SGA Faculty Advisor Dr. Stewart took a moment to commend the Executive Board what he considered a fine job during their term in office.

Vice President Brook Frank covered several issues in his report. The Academic Council has voted down a proposal to include study abroad grades when a student's GPA is computed. Currently, study abroad grades appear on a transcript but are not used to compute GPAs. This includes every study abroad program.

Frank also reminded senators about the upcoming Student Academic Board meeting. The SAB will be sending out surveys to majors. The comments and criticism from surveys returned are used in compilation of the State of the Major reports. These reports are used by the College to determine where new faculty and courses are needed. Frank stressed the importance of these surveys and reminded the senate that many colleges don't have SGA involvement in this area.

Finally, Frank spoke about his recent trip to Rollins College in Winter Park, Florida. Rollins hired an Activities Director two years ago to help with the "suitcase school" problem. The Activities Director at Rollins has been an amazing success. Frank wants to propose an increase in the Student Activities fee. The current Student Activities Fee is $ 87 for the year for a full time student. The national norm is $ 160. Frank estimates that a raise of $ 25 will generate roughly $ 50,000 which could be used to pay the salary of the Activities Direct as well as provide a group activity fund to finance bands, etc. Frank also wants to circulate a petition urging the renovation of Hodson Hall begin as soon as possible. Included in the renovation would be the enlargement of the Coffee House, Offices for the SGA, and an office for the Activities Director.

Graduate Student David Searles announced the formation of an Environmental Organization, as yet unnamed. The new organization will have a meeting at 7 pm on Monday, March 4, in the Dunning Lecture Hall.

Academic Computing budget cut

Other budget cuts expected for 1991-1992 school year

By: Kyndra Ponder

The 1991-1992 budget for the Academic Computing Committee has been cut by almost 50%. Next year's budget for the committee will be $25,000 as opposed to this year's budget of $40,000.

In a letter to the Academic Computing Committee, President Trout has stated "We will be presenting a budget that recognizes that we are in a recession, a budget that recognizes that the aggressive increases of the 1980's are not forever sustainable. As a consequence...your original request could not be sustained."

According to the letter, Academic Computing has nearly $100,000 in "soft money" that it has yet to use. Paul Bishop, Director of Academic Computing, states that the money in the fund has been given to the college in grants that are most often earmarked for special projects, such as faculty endowment, adding, "The money is not a surplus."

Although Bishop does not forsee the cuts having a tremendous impact on the quality of service available to the students at Washington College. What the cuts do, however, is "to put pressure on the Academic Computing Committee to find even more sources of outside funding."

Although Bishop believes that the budget cuts "appear to reflect a decrease in the Administration's commitment to Academic Computing" at the college, President Trout said that the ACC is not the only department to suffer budget cuts. When the new budget was proposed, the college was $1.3 Million in the red. Consequently, there had to be cuts. The decrease for the Academic Computing Committee will allow them to maintain the current level of operation, but will prevent the purchasing of new equipment.

Trout also pointed out that the needs of Academic Computing will be evaluated at the beginning of the next school year, and if the cuts appear to be hindering the program, then the budget may be changed.

An interview with Trout:

Tuition, budget cuts, discussed

By: Susie Mazzullo

The Board of Visitors and Governors have recently approved an operating budget that includes an increase in tuition for the coming year.

At the February 16th meeting, it was approved to raise tuition and room and board charges a total of $1142.00. Tuition will be increased $912.00 for a total of $12312.00. Full room and board will be raised $230.00 for a total of $2730.00. The total manount for students with on campus housing and a full board plan will be $17,242.00 for the coming year. Full board will still include the $50 worth of credit at the Snack Bar per semester.

In the letter sent home to parents over Spring Break, it was said that the quality of education that all who care about Washington College have a right to demand, and strong teaching " does not come cheap". In an interview with President Trout, yesterday, he commented that this was the lowest increase in more than twelve years and that students are benefiting from the raise in tuition as more faculty

SGA plans spring activities for W.C.

By: Kyndra Ponder

On Tuesday night the SGA prepared for spring activities at Washington College. Most of the business before the Senate dealt with funding for speakers and other social affairs.

Social Chairs, John Buckey and Glen Warner announced that they are very close to signing a contract with the reggae band Full Stop to play at the April 27 Luau. Brian Gimelson, SGA Treasurer, asked the Senate to approve $1500 to pay for Full Stop. The funds were approved.

Gimelson also stated that the Jr. Class has asked the SGA to co-sponsor a part at the Coffeehouse. The band Lost in the Supermarket will play on Friday April 19. The Jr. Class will charge $3 at the door and will split the profits equally with the SGA in exchange for $1500 to pay for the band. The Senate voted to approve the money for Lost in the Supermarket and agreed to co-sponsor the event.

Gimelson then reported that he had two requests for club funding . The Ecotopian Society asked for $250 to help fund a guest speaker on April 13 as well as a trip to the Aquarium in Baltimore. The SGA approved the money. In addition, the Washington College Historical Preservation Society asked for $500 to co-sponsor the April 13 guest speaker. Because the society had already been granted $500 for the semester, but has not used the money yet, and no one was present who was able to

To get to the other side

The accident in the crosswalk this past Sunday evening should make one thing terribly clear. The College and the State need to work together to find an alternative to the crosswalk. Although the accident thankfully did not involved a pedestrian, many students can attest to the fact that some motorists just don't feel obliged to slow down or stop for pedestrians in the crosswalk.

We've all read complaints from townspeople about students crossing the street too slowly, but what about the irate motorist who doesn't feel the yield to pedestrians law applied to them? In a student-automobile confrontation, the automobile will most surely win, even if the student strikes back in court later on.

There must be a reasonable solution. Students won't use a bridge over 213, and a tunnel would quickly become a safety hazard. Perhaps the State of Maryland should promoted the use of a 213-Washington College bypass. Instead of bearing right at the Superfresh, motorists could turn left and enjoy the sites of lovely downtown Chestertown.

What about installing a traffic light at the crosswalk instead of the flashing yellow lights? A traffic light that would turn red (within 15 seconds) when a button was pushed by a student giving them 20-25 seconds to cross 213 before the light turned green again. Cities much larger that Chestertown had employed this technique with great success on roads with much more traffic than 213.

In any event, some solution must be found since four dormitories and two parking lots are located on the east side of 213, and the planned Chestertown bypass seems too many years distant. Perhaps now that the Master Plan is all but complete, the College can turn that intensity towards finding an alternative way to cross the street.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

An apology to Women's Softball

To the Editor of the Washington College Elm,

In the March 1, 1991 edition of the Elm there appeared a Spring Sports Supplement. The Elm has apparently overlooked the entire Women's Softball program. This year there are many new faces to unite with the experienced players of the past. In the past we might not have been the best, but we do have a lot of talent and a whole lot of heart. We would appreciate if the Elm would include a softball schedule so we can be supported by our school and the community. We would also like some recognition for all our hard work and dedication to the program.

Sincerely,

The Washington College Women's Softball Team.

To the Washington College Women's Softball Team,

We, at the Elm, salute your devotion to your sport and would like to extend an apology for being unable to include you in the Sports Supplement. We support your efforts, and wish you the best for your spring season.

Again our apologies,

HANDS OUT PROJECT

W.C. opens its eyes to the needs of the community:

Echo Hill, Washington College's second spring project

This Saturday, March 23rd, Hands Out is organizing its second community volunteer activity for the spring semester. The first project, held in February, involved helping to lay the foundation for a house with the Habitat for Humanity organization and was a tremendous success. Over 80 students and faculty members participated. Tomorrow, Hands Out is offering another project to help encourage Washington College's increased involvement with the community. Echo Hill is a non-profit outdoor education school designed to teach people concepts that cannot be relayed in the classroom. The school is annually required to spread fresh mulch and woodchips over their adventure course to maintain the health of the trees and of their equipment. With enough people, the project takes only a day. There will be three shifts, 9 to 11:30, 11:30 to 2, and 2 to 5, and food will be available on cite. Since Echo Hill is located just outside of Betterton, individuals are asked to try and organize transportation, however, rides will be available if needed. Participants are asked to meet a half hour before their shift starts to coordinate rides and/or pick up directions. All are welcome, even if you did not previously sign up in the cafeteria. Hands Out was organized in an attempt to bring the college and the community closer together. The success of Hands Out depends on you.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Governor Schaefer "What Kuwait needs is a Master Plan."

Editor's note: This past week, Maryland Governor Wm. Schaefer traveled to Kuwait. On the plane back to Maryland, the Governor was interviewed by a local news team. When asked what he felt the Kuwaitis needed, he replied that they needed to formulate a Master Plan. For those who lived on this campus for the past two to three years, the words "Master Plan" conjure up many images. The Elm solicted these essay from seniors who lived through the Washington College Master Plan, and asked them to write about the possible consequences of sending Clint Baer to Kuwait to direct the "Kuwaiti Master Plan."

GuMBPY: A plan for the Mid-East.

Carolin Leibig

off the cuff

Thank goodness that Clint Baer is on the job in Kuwait. Without his master plan, which will no doubt solve all problems and give us the answers that man has been seeking since the beginning of time, the little emirate would not be able to recover from this glorious war. The Great Baer Master Plan, GuBMPy for short, will begin in the middle of Kuwait and slowly work its way out in a sort of oblong triangular square pattern and in the process will bring all life as we know to a complete and utter halt.

Of course, Gubmpy will require the rebuilding of the Emirs palace first. Hence forth it will be called the KARC (I needn't say what those letters stand for). It will be built in the style of the Trumps Beverly Hills mansion, if the Trumps had Beverly Hills mansion. The elevator will be lined with the most expensive wood on the face of the earth and then Clint himself will carve his name into it. On the floor of the KARC will be placed sheets of really expensive rock. In front of the KARC will be a really big brick rotunda . The Emirs children will drive their go-carts on it at high speeds. The Red Brick Road (RBR) will link the KARC to the rest of Kuwait. The road will go right through the heart of Kuwait City and will require every red brick in the Middle East and Indo-China causing red brick stock to go through the roof. During the RBR's construction families will be separated from loved ones just across the street, since they will have to walk for days to get to the store that is a stones throw from their houses. Eventually, however, people will be able to follow the Red Brick Road or walk across it and sit on a nice bench.

Mud will be a predominant feature of the Gubmpy and the people of Kuwait hope that mud pie therapy will help the children recover from the aftershocks of war. A special top-secret government rainmaking procedure developed by NASA will insure that Kuwait will not have a mud shortage during the implementation of Gubmpy. If rain will not be a problem, keeping up with the demand for dirt could be tricky. Baer has already been quoted as saying of his new project: "There's just too much sand in the desert." The bright side of Gubmpy being in the desert is that none of those annoying trees will get in the way of progress and then afterwards a lot of nice simulated artificially real bushes can be planted everywhere.

A highlight of the construction phase will be the noise. No one will be asleep after 7:00 in the morning and the dead will begin their days by 7:25. Right outside the Emir's window it will sound like a pit stop at the Indy 500. Decibel levels will be far out of the safe range and the

Kuwaiti reconstruction ala WCMPD

off the cuff

The Washington College Master Planning Department (WCMPD) recently returned from war-torn Kuwait. Their jobs was to formulate a master plan for the rebuilding of the country. For the uninformed, Washington College, a small liberal arts college located on Maryland's eastern shore, was recently revealed to have the best master planning department in the United States.

The comprehensive plan for the rebuilding of Kuwait can be broken down into several main areas.

1. WCMPD has eliminated parking in Kuwait. It was a daring decision, admits the head of WCMPD, but he feels it will benefit Kuwait in the long run. "After all, it's a small country. They can walk everywhere." The nearest public parking lot is Mohammed's Car and Camel Lot in Baghdad. There is a new "Liberators of Kuwait" parking lot located in downtown Kuwait City, but it's only for special visitors.

2. Kuwait now resembles a forest. Yes, WCMPD felt that friendly green trees were the way to go. The head of WCMPD was quoted by Kuwait radio as saying, "The desert was so beige. Beige is not a happy color." The trees were suffering, however, from a lack of water so WCMPD had some imported. A lake of it, to be exact. All this water, mixing with all that sand means...

3. Kuwait is now one big mud puddle, except of course for the "Liberators of Kuwait" Parking Lot and the "Liberators of Kuwait" highway (which Kuwaitis are not allowed to drive on since there are large poles in the middle of it.) It took talent to turn the desert into mud, but it's only one of the many fine accomplishments of WCMPD. The head of WCMPD was quoted by a Kuwaiti paper as saying "Mud gives it that homey, lived in look. Maybe we'll plant some landscaping in the spring."

Yes, reconstructing Kuwait has been a real challenge for the folks at WCMPD. One of their great accomplishments was combining a new highway with the desire of the Emir for greater public exposure. How did they solve these seemingly unrelated problems? They built the new six lane super highway through the Emir's personal quarters in his palace. The Emir was unavailable for comment, but Kuwaiti motorists report they love getting to wait while his Highness crosses the highway to brush his teeth or get a drink of water. The Emir's popularity is up with Kuwaiti women, one newspaper reports, since he bought a new robe and slippers from Victoria's Secret

The pride and joy of WCMPD's master plan for Kuwait is the rebuilding of downtown Kuwait City. Next to the "Liberators of Kuwait" Parking Lot they built the new "Liberators of Kuwait" palace. This stunning marble and brick edifice comes complete with no-wax marble flooring, gold plated elevator and escalator, central air, Chippendale style garden

Spring Break in winter, a novel idea

Phil "Slice" Macek

I would like to take this opportunity to vent a little anger about the school's academic calendar, and especially it handling of Spring Break. Remember Spring Break? A time to pay homage to nature's glorious rebirth and celebrate the eagerly awaited return of warm weather. Yet, truth be told, there is one fact about Spring Break that should put one's part plans temporarily on hold—it occurs during winter. It seems to me that the omniscient schedule makers at this fine learning center are playing a dirty trick on the student body. I can picture them at a meeting, tucked away in a dimly lit room of the Buntagon attempting to construct our academic calendar. "Let's give those juvenile delinquents Spring Break in the winter. Then, when the warm weather finally arrives, they'll be sweating it out over Romanticism papers (for the over-demanding Dr. Gillin), U.S. History exams, and Biology lab reports; like those social vagrants should be. Especially seniors, we'll move up the final deadlines for their theses so they can't waste their time drinking Milwaukee's Best,™ playing Nintendo,™ or entertaining themselves with a few rounds of campus golf."

However, most students, contrary to the wishes of the schedule makers, do manage to enjoy themselves during Spring Break. Instead of trying to find fun things to do in Chestertown (many have died trying), most fine well-meaning college-aged youths migrate to tropical locales to soak up the rays and alleviate the boredom that a Spring Break spent at home promises (others go with the vacation look by frying themselves in a local tanning salon). Daytona Beach, Florida is a perennial hot bed for Spring Break pleasure seekers. Such hedonistic activities as the "Best Body on the Beach" contests, and all relevant contests, act as nothing more than vents for the libidinous frustrations these admirable collegians keep pent up during the academic year as they ponder the academic value of things like: Marx's doctrines for a classless, egalitarian society, Freud's theories about the Id, Ego, and Superego, Plato's treatment of justice in The Republic, and Shakespeare's use of imagery in Romeo and Juliet.

Unfortunately, not all students are presented with the opportunity for travel. Alas, these students have to spend their break at home. However, I see the prospect of staying at home for a whole week as not as bad as it seems. In terms of completely resting one's mind, staying at home has no rival. Just think of the countless hours one can spend on the sofa eating Cheeze-its,™ drinking Yoo-Hoos,™ and becoming completely engulfed in television reruns of "The Banana Splits" and "Dragnet." Yes, spending an entire week on a sofa just doing nothing except eating and watching Jack Webb busting inner city drug czars sounds like pure heaven on earth to me.

No matter how one chooses to detach oneself from one's school work, one soon discovers that break is over and the time to make the subsequent odyssey back to our magnificent campus has arrived. Thus, when the warm weather of spring rears its head, students are back in class figuratively chained to their chairs in Bill Smith Hall, helpless to take full advantage of the nice weather that nature has bestowed upon them.

Obviously, moving Spring Break back this year would be impossible. So I only hope that in the future the schedule makers at this school can realize the desire of students to have Spring Break in the spring. Granted, students are awarded the opportunity of enjoying the warm weather, but only as soon as their work is done (this especially relevant to seniors would like to be around on May 19th). There is no worse feeling than being cramped up in one's musty dorm room typing an already late paper while watching friends frolicking outside through the window.

Thus, I propose that beginning next year, Spring Break be moved back to the end of March or the start of April. Students need good quality free time to release their frustrations. Having an appropriately timed Spring Break would be, in effect, a springboard to both student happiness and better performances in the classroom. Hopefully, the schedule makers will realize their horrible blunder and make the necessary changes. A sound mind in a sound body is vital for the survival of the human race in this modern, specialized ultra-complex world.

Men's lacrosse loses to Navy

By Matt Giller

After defeating Hampden-Sydney 16-7, the Shoremen lost to Springfield, 16-15 in sudden death, and to Navy 17-5.

Over spring break while the rest of the school was relaxing the Shoremen lax team befuddled Division III foe Hampden-Sydney. Kevin Knox dazzled the crowd with an amazing eight goalsand two assists. The Washington College record for goals in a game(10) was set by Joe Seivold against Delaware in 1958.

Freshman attackman Dan Cooper tallied a hat trick and sophomore middie Jed Cronin added a pair of goals as well. Senior middie Greg Rupert and sophomore face-off specialist Blair Muneses added one goal a piece.

The WAC outshot the Tigers 34-32 and took the edge as well in the face-off circle as well by winning 12 of 22 draws. Senior All-American goalie Dave Slomkowski did his part in the net with 17 saves and added a little outside of the net with a (yes, don't adjust your t.v. set) goal.

Last Saturday, the Shoremen lost a heartbreaker to another Division III foe Springfield College. The young Shoremen squad showed signs of early maturity as they battled to even up the score after being down by three goals late in the fourth quarter.

With the Shoremen down a man, Springfield's All-American Greg Clements assisted Chris Holly to end the sudden-death period and a streak where they haven't lost to a Division III opponent outside of Hobart since 1989.

Cronin and Rupert paced the WAC offense with six and four goals repectively. Sophomore Dave Lipinski and Cooper both played extremely well by netting a pair of goals each. Freshman Gibby Semmes, one of the many bright youngsters on this Shoreman squad, netted one goal and assisted on four others. Slomkowski was good but not good enough this time between the pipes saving 17 shots.

In their most recent game paid homage to the military men as they fell to the Midshipmen of the Naval Academy.

An early hat trick by Cooper in the first quarter kept the Midshipmen at bay leading 3-1. However, Navy regrouped and scored 16 unanswered goals enroute to a 17-5 thrashing of the young Shoremen. Jamie Carver and Lipinski each added a goal, while Muneses added two assists.

The Division I powerhouse dominated all facets of the game: shots, 64-16; face-offs 20 of 26.

Coste breaks College record

Senior Sociology major Sarah Coste from Flowertown, Pennsylvania, broke the College record for goal in a Women's Lacrosse game by scoring 10 goals in Wednesday's 16-10 win against Widener.

Coste was assisted by Senior Amy Tiehl who scored 2 goals, Amy McCleary who scored 2 goals, and Sophomore Samantha Clements who also scored 2 goals.

The Shorewomen will be facing off in an away game against F&M this Saturday at 1 p.m. Their next home game will be next Thursday at 4 pm against Swarthmore. Come out and support your team.

Carroll makes All-American

Washington College's Casey Carroll wins her second All-American honor in as many years.

The Shoreman junior went to Emory, Georgia last weekend the site of the NCAA Division III National Championships. Her time of 17 minutes and 49 seconds was good enough to grant her 13th in the 1650 freestyle. Carroll also finished 17th in the 400 IM with a time of 4:46. Only the best 16 times are given All-American status, however.

While she lowered her school record time by three seconds she only one-tenth of a second from the 16th place finisher.

Although she didn't achieve All-American status in the other two events, the 100 butterfly and the 500 freestyle, Carroll did shatter school records in both events with a 1:04.1 in the 100 fly and a 5:18 in the 500 free.

Perceiving "The Doors"

by Bruce Hamilton

It depends. It depends on how much of a devoted Doors fan you are. It depends on how many roc-u-mentaries you have seen about the Doors. It depends on your capacity for the willing suspension of disbelief. Can you replace Jim Morrison with Val Kilmer? Cosmetically, he has a vague similarity. The opening scene that frames the whole film with Jim in the studio in Paris, recording An American Prayer. Kilmer seems to portray satisfactorily Jim's swagger, his fatigue and world-weary stupor.

Throughout the movie Kilmer surpasses the obligatory skepticism one might approach Oliver Stone's new film, The Doors. From on stage where Kilmer carries the stage presence and enticing menace that Morrison made a trademark to the playful innocence exhibited in a toothy grin given to a reporter waiting as the band boarded a plane. "Name? Occupation?" The hand that holds the extended microphone asks to each member, culminating with Jim's reply: "Jim," says the brooding figure that evolves into an enigma composed of rebel, dictator, victim, poet/philosopher and hero between the credits of the film.

This movie is not about the Doors. The name is as unlikely and incongruous as Kyle MacLaughlin as the keyboard player, Ray Manzarek. Although fairly well typecast, there are some nuances of character that were simply missed. Of course Mazarek was typified by his rigid disposition, the hip square. But Kyle doesn't pass it off as Manzarek; he looks half the time as if he were ready to accidentally bite his own tongue off. The parts of Robbie Krieger and John Densmore are closer to the mark, and Kilmer's job was paramount to all of these. Even if I were able to overcome my predispositions to Meg Ryan, I wouldn't really be able to see her as Pamela, Jim's part-time girlfriend.

Perhaps it should have been called the Jim Morrison story. Or the Morrison story according to Oliver Stone. Who knows where facts meet reality in the shadowed lives of icons like Morrison? The fabled story of his childhood encounter with dying indians and their disembodied souls is treated eerily in the film, the scene has a wistful sorrow in treating the fateful moment. From there we meet Jim the hitchiker on his way to Venice beach, California: pocket Nietzche in hand.

Jim enters and eventually quits film school after a room of young film-makers critique his work Harshly. His relationship with Manzarek having been established in school, Venice becomes the center for the genesis of the band. In a scene that looked like Gidget was standing a few feet away, Morrison approaches Manzarek and reads the songs he has written. Manzarek persuades Jim to sing one, and he sinks into a croon of "Moonlight Drive" with a look like a meditative trance. Manzarek stares at Jim and says, "those are great fuckin' lyrics!" Hence a band is born.

For the first few scenes of the movie, songs are overdubbed and play like a radio that won't die and create a music-video like scenario. The effect is unsettling: when Jim follows Pamela home and "Love Street" comes on, the movie begins to look as if it plans to continue along a bad beach movie path. When Jim climbs a tree onto her porch and kisses her, the effect is that a bad cliche that sticks in your throat.

The band begins practicing and a scene illustrates also the genesis of a rock 'n roll classic: "Light My Fire". Soon the band is playing the local Whisky-a-Go Go and they are booted one night for performing the revolutionary "The End", because the touchy owner doesn't like the idea of someone screaming "Mother, I want to..." but then we know classical Oedipus reference. Not that Jim's intellectual side is explored, only payed homage by Pamela (Meg Ryan) weeping over his poetry. That same night, the band is approached by Elektra records. They become almost immediate stars and find their way to the Ed Sullivan show, where a great moment in rock 'n roll history took place.

One of the Sullivan show censors tells the band they have a problem with one of the lyrics: "Girl, we couldn't get much higher." They'd like it if the band would say, "Girl, we couldn't get much better." Dig? The result being that Morrison hams it up and makes "higher" the highlight of the song. Their performance on the Sullivan show, however, only heightens their fame. Soon, the band is floating around at a party given by Andy Warhol, played by Crispin Glover in remarkably reptilian form. In another rock-myth/historical moment Nico and Morrison have an interlude in the elevator.

Stone successfully manages to drape the film over several apexes of emotive, intense moments from the initial peyote trip in the desert to the Sullivan show to the tragicomic moment in Florida when Jim gave performance art a new meaning. The Dionysian aspect of Jim Morrison is sufficiently present, as is the lusty, animal "will to power" that fascinated him. The glutton is present, even the philosopher is evident. Even Morrison as mystic is given

Soviet Popular Culture Lecture

The Washington College Lecture Series will present Richard Stites, Professor of Russian and Soviet History at Georgetown University, discussing "Soviet Popular Culture" Tuesday, March 26 at 7:30 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library at Washington College. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Richard Stites is an award-winning authority on Russian social and cultural history. He has made over 30 visits to the Soviet Union in the last 25 years, supported by fellowships and grants from the Guggenheim Foundation, Fullbright program and other institutions. His major works include the pioneering study The Women's Liberation Movement in Russia: Feminism, Nihilism and Bolshevism, 1860-1930; the conceptually imaginative Revolutionary Dreams—Utopian Vision and Experimental Life in the Russian Revolution (winner of the 1989 Vucinich Prize), and his most recent book, Soviet Popular Culture: Entertainment and Society since 1900. He has worked on many studies of modern Soviet society, including a fascinating anthology of popular songs, tales, plays and movie scripts, and articles on women's history, the family, science fiction and other popular subjects.

Middle East Symposium

A major symposium at Washington College will explore and analyze current U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East and look specifically at the probable results of the Persian Gulf War. Set for Monday, March 25 at 4 p.m., the symposium will be held in the Norman James Theater of William Smith Hall at Washington College in Chestertown. Admission if free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Hisham Melhem, the Washington based correspondent for AS-SAFIR, the leading Lebanese Daily, and Radio Monte Carlo, France, will be participating in the symposium. Melhem's writings have appeared in publications ranging from the literary journal Mawaqef to the Los Angeles Times. In addition, he appears regularly on a number of TV programs such as the McNeil-Lehrer News Hour (served as a consultant during the Gulf Crisis), Nightline, Good Morning America, Nightwatch, Cable News Network, and has been a guest at various National Public Radio programs. Melhem participated in the Frontline special, "The Mind of Sadaam Hussein" on PBS.

Melhem frequently speaks on college campuses and in conferences on Middle East Issues ranging from the Gulf crisis, to the Arab-Israeli conflict, Lebanon, US-Arab relations and inter-Arab relations. He is on the list of the speakers of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Experts in the U.S. foreign policy also participating in the symposium include Toni Verstandig, Senior Staff Consultant for the House Congressional Committee on Foreign Affairs; and Richard Cottam, Professor of International Affairs at the University of Pittsburgh.

The participants will discuss U.S. foreign policy in the Gulf since World War II with an emphasis on current U.S. initiatives in the ongoing Middle East peace process. The symposium will be moderated by Washington College Assistant Professor of Political Science Tahir Shad, who comments regularly on the Middle East for WBOC-TV and the regional enough attention, complete with vignettes about the ghost of an indian that follows him throughout the film. But the internal Morrison is nowhere to be found. The poet, the dreamer, the psychic explorer: of his creative genius we only catch glimpses and allusions.

Still, the movie is an ideal fairy tale and fitting resting place for the myth of Jim Morrison. It illustrates with a flare the decadence and chaos of a time when real leaders were scarce and times were changing. Hilarious scenes, such as the dinner party that Pamela throws for a few guests in which Jim burns the duck and Pamela tries to knife him (hence causing a quick exodus by the guests), endear the movie to any audience. As a commemorative effort, the movie is a more than satisfactory attempt. Still, I'd rather listen to L.A. Woman and remember one of rock's greatest psychedelic crooner than see the guy from Top Secret pay him tribute.

explain the additional request, the Senate voted to table the $500 request until the next meeting.

Gimelson then asked the SGA to consider asking the college to make the new parking circle in front of Kent a lot reserved for RA and Handicapped parking instead of letting the area sit unused through most of the year. The Senate approved the motion to make a formal recommendation to the college requesting reserved parking.

In addition, President Kelly requested that the SGA make a formal recommendation that the Snack Bar become a no-smoking area because of the $15,000 in renovations that were done during Spring Break. Students are urged to speak to their dorm senators this week to let them know your opinions about the change, and the Senate will vote next week about making the formal recommendation.

President, Kevin Kelly reported that he and former Vice-President Brooke Frank will meet with President Trout today to discuss a raise for the Student Activities Fee. The fee is currently $50 per semester and Kelly and Frank would like to see the fee doubled to $100 per semester. Most of the money would go to the new Student Activities Coordinator who would work closely with the Student Affairs Office and would use the funds for larger scale social events at the school.

Kelly hopes that this change will combat the current trend that the school is facing where many students opt to go away from campus for the weekends and will "bring the college up to the same level as many other schools around." He points out that although the raise is fairly drastic, most other colleges have much more money per student dedicated to social activities, so in reality WC will still be behind the actions of other schools, but we will be catching up.

In conclusion, President Kelly announced that Freshman Class President Lionel Dyson has been appointed SGA Parliamentarian and that he will be sworn in at the next SGA meeting.

Trout also commented on budget cuts to be made for the coming school year. He said that this year was a tight budget year and that cuts had to be made. He claimed that the college is continually trying to raise outside money for those things that have to be left out of the budget

Kuwaiti royal family will be deprived of much needed beauty rest. Not only will it be loud, but the bulldozers making all the noise will rip the sidewalk right out from under the feet of ordinary Kuwait citizens as they walk...uh, somewhere (there's not much left, is there). So much for Kuwait, the Gubmpy also has projects in store for the rest of the Middle East.

The Palestinians are a priority for Baer and his Plan. Under the Gubmpy, the Palestinians will receive the western part of Iraq as their new homeland. Baer made this statement concerning Saddam's linkage of the Gulf crisis to the Palestinian issue: "If he likes them so much, let him share his country with them." Many seem to accept this notion. And of course all the countries in the region will have to become democracies and no person over the age of 12 will be allowed to play with weapons of any kind. The democracy thing has not been successful in the region as of yet. Baer claims some breakthroughs have been made, however small they may be. During a recent photo opportunity Baer asked the Emir if his country will soon hold free democratic elections. The Emir responded with this statement: "Uh...have you heard the one about the Kuwaiti peasant and the Palestinian?"

Professor Art Green visits campus to lecture on drugs and alcohol use and abuse

By: Susie Mazzullo

Professor Arthur Greene, drug and alcohol education program specialist, visited the campus last Monday to teach the students about the use and abuse of drugs and alcohol. The lecture was sponsored by the sororities Alpha Chi Omega and Zeta Tau Alpha and was held in Dunning Lecture Hall on Monday evening at 7:30pm.

Professor Greene is a drug and alcohol education consultant who develops communication programs about the use of drugs for various members of the community. He has developed many programs that he has presented in Virginia and also around the nation.

Professor Greene has lectured at a wide variety of places, from high school and college campuses to maximum security prisons. He has developed programs for industrial and managerial supervisors, police officers, educators, community leaders and military personnel.

Professor Greene is currently a Professor of Sociology at Longwood College. He is also in the process of researching and developing a juvenile drug program, an instructor of "Drugs/Alcohol and Law Enforcement" for the Central Virginia Criminal Justice Training Academy, and also instructs "DUI Countermeasures-Standardized Field Sobriety Testing".

The main point of the lecture was to "Do your homework". Professor Greene stressed that he wasn't going to lecture because he was sure that those present had heard it all before. He said that it was important to understand what you were getting into when experimenting with drugs. He stressed that if you were going to take any form of drug then it was wise to research it first - even those drugs that you can buy in the drugstore such as aspirin and cold medicine. "It's not only the illegal drugs that can get you into trouble" he said.

"Opprobrium" was a word that Professor Greene introduced to those present. It is what one should avoid when using drugs and/or alcohol. According to Professor Greene opprobrium means something that brings disgrace, public disgrace or ill fame that follows from conduct considered grossly wrong or viscious: Infamy. When going out, this is what all should try to avoid.

Professor Greene didn't intend to lecture but instead invited discussion and questions. He was more interested in answering questions that the student body had then simply giving a lecture that many of those present had heard before. Questions ranged from the harmful use of steriods to whether drugs that are now illegal will ever be legalized.

On the subject of legalization, Professor Greene replied that he doesn't think that this will ever happen. "If the bottom line is death in determining legalization, then it won't happen. The legal drugs are the ones killing us", he commented. Alcohol, which is legal, is the leading cause of death.

Professor Greene warned against the mixing of alcohol and antibiotics. It is dangerous and unnecessary because the alcohol will negate the medical effect of the antibiotic anyway in most cases. If you are planning on drinking then don't take the medication because it won't work anyway.

He also warned against the recreational use of hallucinogenic drugs. He commented that those using this type of drug seem to be doing so recklessly. The problem that he sees

Middle East forum held

By: Susie Mazzullo

The Goldstein Program in Public affairs presented a lecture on "U.S Foreign Policy in the Middle East" on Monday March 25 from 4:00 - 6:00pm in the Norman James Theatre.

Hisham Melhem, the Senior Correspondent for AS'SAFIR, Newspaper of Lebanon, and Tamara Hermann, a Professor of Political Science at Tel Aviv University and a visiting professor at Princeton University this year were the two speakers for the afternoon.

Mr. Melhem received his BA from Villanova University, and his Masters and PhD from Georgetown University. He bagan his talk by giving a panoramic overview of the Middle Eastern area before the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait last August and the effects that the war has had on that area. He described the Arab world as "not only a house divided but a house with no roof" and that they were the real losers in the war .

Tamara Hermann received both her BA and Masters from Tel Aviv University and is a specialist in Israeli foreign policy. She described the current conditions in Israel and said that national security was of the utmost importance to those

The even higher cost of higher education

For those who missed it, the President of Yale University was on TV Wednesday night talking about the rising costs of a college education. In light of the recent letter sent home about Washington College's latest tuition hike, the issue of costs seems a timely one.

Universities across the country raise tuition every year, so it's not a phenomena unique to Washington College. What is distressing is the scale of the hikes. During the Cater years, tuition went up at least $ 1000 per year. If this continues, this years freshman class will be paying $ 20,000 for their Washington College education by their senior year. Will Washington College still be a "best buy" then, President Trout?

To keep from driving away talented applicants, this college had better learn the art of "creative financial aid" and fast.

Letters to the Editor

oops, we goofed

Last week, in Kyndra Ponder's SGA article, it was mistakenly reported that the SGA receives, per student, per semester, $ 50 from the Student Activities fee. The article should have stated that the SGA receives $ 25, per student, per semester from the Student Actvities fee. SGA president Kevein Kelly, and former Vice President Brooke Frank have proposed raising the Student Activities fee so that the SGA will receive $ 50, per student, per semester. The Elm regrets the error.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: Why are you a volunteer?

Volunteerism, true "heart work"

(Charming smile) "Hi! What are you doing this Saturday...can you help..." Gotcha! You're in—I've lured you into the foreboding abyss of VOLUNTEERISM!

Such a college word, right up there with idealism, realism, naturalism, and I know the concept of having enough free time to actually volunteer can often seem so abstract. But it isn't at all! It isn't hard to understand if you look at the word closely and correctly—volunteerism, not voluntearism. Giving a little of your free time isn't going to tear and rip your body apart, or physically harm you, but rather, it harmlessly touches and refreshes from the inside: in your heart.

I've discovered from my experiences that volunteeering is a good aerobic exercise that my body needs to function. No, I'm not saying I'm saint who volunteers every day, just every now and again. So many people and organizations right here in Chestertown could use vibrant WC faces with willing, helping hands to accomplish the projects in our community.

Through my recent involvement in the Hands Out organization and other local activities, I've found an opportunity here on campus to devote a couple of hours a month, along with a lot of other people's time, to help develop our community. I also work occasionally at the Magnolia Hall nursing home on Saturday afternoons with some friends, coordinating spring bulletin boards, calling bingo, and shopping for the elderly—it's a minimal amount of time.

VOLUNTEERING. It's another part of my Saturday, as natural as taking a shower—I don't even like to label it volunteer work, it sounds like too much effort. So, let's call it "heart" work, and not let the label "volunteer" underestimate the true depth and reward received from giving for a few hours each month.

Kathy Mullen

It's natural and simple, then, not as intimidating as it seems. That little time fuels a flicker of a glow in your heart...so the next time you feel the need for real aerobic exercise, pull on a sweatshirt and find any place to give some time and release that energy. It's as simple as that!

"Volunteering for such projects broadens our college experience beyond the social dimension. It also maintains good relations between the college and community, in a town where they are so dependent upon one another."

Political correctness and Liberation Theology

Alas, the specter of political correctness has reared its ugly head at Washington College. The Trojan horse within our walls is actually a philosophy seminar. Before it was too late, the students of Philosophy 420 Liberation Theology have been saved from the horrors of an oppressive, imperialistic, racist, phallicratic, and eurocentric value-system. This can hardly pass without a remark from the profoundly politically impaired.

Truth be known, Liberation Theology is not a class at all. This seminar is an attempt to teach openness. Openness has incalculable value. It make possible the quest, through reason, for knowledge of the objectively good. To the open-minded, everything and anything is acceptable and equally valid, except of course, the slim possibility that this idea is radically wrong. Openness grants us the illusion that the absence of principle looks principled.

Edward Elfenbein

The course, taught by Peter Tapke and Kevin Brien is a veritable gold mine for the conspicuously compassionate. Philosophy 420 is described as concentrating on five areas of liberation thought, "(1) black liberation, (2) feminist liberation, (3) third world liberation, (4) gay and lesbian liberation, (5) green theology, supporting the environmental movement to liberate all life from planetary destruction and pollution." Not only do you have a chance to bash wealthy, Western straight men, but you get credit for it.

The helplessly open-minded will quickly defend this class as a simple examination of liberation theology, not an advocacy. The course description does claim that "Criticisms of liberation theology will be considered." Considered false, that is. From the open-minded viewpoint, homosexual philosophy is far more relevant that the philosophy of Plato, a homosexual. It is this kind of open-mindedness that has brought personkind to its present stage of enlightenment.

Democratic education must produce men and women who have the knowledge to

In the world: Iraqi domestic crisis continues

IRAQ:

U.S. neutrality in the battles raging between rebel groups and forces loyal to Saddam Hussein was reaffirmed by Bush administration officials on Tuesday. U.S. military forces would not be used to protect civilians and armed rebels seeking to overthrow Husseins government. All major administration spokesmen also confirmed that widespread civilian deaths and atrocities were occuring in the conflict, but that this would not change Bush's policy of not getting involved in the fight to topple Hussein. "We don't intend to involve ourselves in the internal conflict in Iraq," said White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater. The restatement of the U.S.'s policy in Iraq came after calls from Kurdish and Shiite rebel groups for help in repelling Hussein's forces. Fitzwater said that the U.S. would not shoot down the helicopter gunships being by Hussein against the rebels unless they posed a threat to U.S. forces still in the area. Basic policy toward Iraq maintains that its own populations should determine its leadership. Meanwhile, in Iraq, the commander of Kurdish military insurgents invited Iraqi opposition leaders to meet and discuss the setting up of provisional government that would replace Hussein's government. They have not reached an agreement and the battles between the forces loyal to Hussein and the rebels continue.

SOVIET UNION:

Confrontation between Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev and the pro-democracy opposition was heightened today when supporters of Russian leader Boris Yeltsin promosed to defy a Kremlin ban on demonstrations, and coal miners refused to suspend their month-long strike. In retaliation, Gorbachev took stronger measures to prevent the demonstrations. He ordered the Interior Ministry to assume control of law enforcement in Moscow, which effectively strips the pro-Yeltsin city of controlover the police there. The leaders of the the Democratic Russia movement said they would ignore gorbachev's decree, which would outlaw demonstration for the next three weeks, and would hold a pro-Yeltsin rally on the first day of an emergency session of the Russian republics parlaiment next Thursday. More than 300,000 striking coal miners in the Ukraine and Siberia said they would not obey a draft decree by the Supreme Soviet suspending the strike for two months. The miners support Yeltsin and believe that Gorbachev "deceived" the country by moving towards a more authoritarian policy. In a 90-minute televised interview, Gorbachev denied he had moved to the political right and said that the opposition forces had "no concrete program" and were "merely trying to stir up society" by taking advantage of the nation's current economic crisis.

GERMANY:

East Germany's Stasi secret police helped West German terrorists plot a campaign of assassinations and bombing against American and other targets from the late 1970s until the fall of the East German regime, prosecutors said Wednesday. While unemployment and dicontent continue to rise in eastern Germany, the events of the past make it difficult to resuscitate the formerly Communist society. A newspaper in Berlin has begun printing the names and former salaries of Stasi officers, many of whom tried to hide their association with the secret police as they looked for new jobs in the newly reunified Germany. With former East German communist leader Erich Honecker now in Moscow, he is out of the reach of German authorities who want to try him for manslaugher. German prosecutors today moved against some of Honecker's most senior aides. Among the terrorist attacks that the Stasi were involved with was the car-bombing of the U.S. Air Force headquarters at Ramstein Air Base on August 31, 1981, in which 20 people were injured. The Satsi apparently provided the weapons and training for this attack. One German official said of this latest discovery concerning the Stasi: "This will go on and on."

Downpours didn't dampen spirits: Echo Hill

Amy Tiehel

Despite very adverse weather conditions this past Saturday, twenty Washington College students showed impressive commitment helping with the Hands Out second spring project. The project involved helping Echo Hill prepare their adventure course for this spring. Echo Hill is a non-profit Outdoor school which offers students positive learning experiences in the area of Science and Ecology, History and Human Environment, and Individual and Group Development. The outdoor adventure course, known as the Quicksilver Project, fosters individual and group development. Each year Echo Hill is required by law to spread truck loads of wood chips on their entire adventure course to preserve the health of the trees. Hands Out was instrumental in organizing Washington College volunteers for the task.

As with Habitat for Humanity, the day was divided into three two and a half hour shifts that students could sign up for. Unfortunately, many students signed up but did not actually come to the project because of the intimidating downpour. During the first two shifts only three people showed up. By the last shift more students did arrive. Five car loads of very committed, eager students drove out to the site to help make up for lost time and work. Senior Jennifer Mauser, who helped organized the work day, had been present at the first shift and had come to help with the last, was a bit skeptical in light of all that had to be done. "Because of the weather, the project seemed formidable at the beginning of the day. But the 2:00 shift produced a small group of very efficient workers and by 4:30, we had almost everything finished. I was impressed with what a group of enthusiastic people can accomplish while having a great time."

The emphasis on Saturday was definitely on commitment. The rain drove many away but the work still had to be done. Thanks to the students who did show up, the day was a success in more ways than one. Erin Hodge-Williams, founder of Hands Out, stated, "After working with a project such as Hands Out you quickly learn the difference between talkers and doers. Saturdays events a lot of doers. The individuals and group members that showed on Saturday, as well as to past projects, have really given me a lot of hope for what Hands Out can be."

The day was a success. The brothers of Phi Sigma, who were present at the first Hands Out project, were the main source of workers on Saturday. They made an important statement that any organization can not only become involved in activities helping the community, but also have a great time doing it. Sophomore Sig Mark Brewen said, "It was hard work, but a great time; it was well worth my Saturday afternoon." Mike Mathias, head of the Phi Sigmas, added, "In the spirit of Hands Out

Now you can afford to dream in color.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC. If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Men's tennis loses to Claremont

Last Saturday hooked up two of the hottest tennis teams in Division III, Claremont College of California and Washington College (5-3) played in Swarthmore, Pa. The sixth-ranked Shoremen unfortunately fell 6-3 to fourth-ranked Claremont that saw a couple of upsets.

Matt Giller

Claremont, which has played 15 matches already this season, lost to our own Scott Read at first singles with a 6-4, 4-6, 6-3 defeat over Lance Au, ranked third in Division III. However, at the end of the singles, the Shoremen were decisively trailing 4-2.

Read continued his winning ways on the doubles slab as well. Paired with Irakli Metreveli, the doubles team, which is ranked seventh in the country, drubbed the second ranked team in the nation, Au and Ryan McKee, 7-6, 6-3.

Ninth ranked McKee shocked the seventh ranked player, Shoremen's Metreveli, at second singles, 6-1, 7-6.

At fourth singles, the WAC's Alberto Diaz salvaged the only other victory.

The loss to Claremont snapped a four-match win streak by the Shoremen. The WAC lost only three matches to spring break foes, Wheaton, Christopher Newport and Averett College. When they returned home for their first match after break against American, they mopped up the AU racketeers 9-0. The Shoremen's only loss During the spring trip was to Davidson, 5-4, a Division I foe.

This Saturday the WAC host a doubleheader. Starting at 10 a.m., they hit the new courts against SUNY-Binghampton. At 2 p.m. the Shoremen hope to blow out Ursinus.

Fall leads improved softball squad

By Andy Parks

Women's softball head coach, Penny Fall wants her squad eventually to get the respect it deserves. When asked about her team, Coach Fall can only answer optimistically.

"The kids on the softball team are so dedicated and have a great committment to winning...", says Fall. "We may not attract the athletes that [some teams at WC] attract, but it does not negate my players' effort."

After finishing 3-15 last year, several games by three runs or less, the major tasks according to Fall will be to "work on the fundamentals, work hard on consistency, and find the right combinations".

Though she lost three starting seniors, including co-MVP, Tracey Coleman, Fall returns last year's second co-MVP, Edna Diefenderfer. Diefenderfer, a junior from Preston, Maryland, will head up what Fall describes as a strong defense up the middle. Not only will the junior start at shortstop, but she will use her "decent fastball and good control" to fill the number two pitching slot.

Junior, Shannon Cupka, will also rely on good control to nail down the position of number one hurler on the club. When Diefenderfer is on the mound, Cupka will cover the right corner of the infield at first base.

Completing a tough battery will be catcher, Kathy Brewster, a junior and one of two captains. Fall describes Brewster as a tough catcher who "handles pitchers well and never flinches when she takes a hit".

At second-base, Fall has probably her hardest worker with senior and co-captain, Jill Reppert. Reppert was moved from the outfield to second "to provide experience and positive reinforcement on the infield". With Reppert at second, Fall has a player with great reflexes, a good arm, and excellent quickness.

Sophomore, Marie Mohler, will be the starting centerfielder for Fall. Mohler, an outfielder with a strong arm, great range, and good speed, is the best outfielder that Fall has ever seen. "If it's humanly possible to catch it, Marie will.", praises Fall.

At third-base, Fall has Caroline Jensen, the only freshman in the starting lineup. Fall placed Jensen at the hot corner to take advantage of her great fielding ability. Jensen possesses the quickness that should erase the opponent's bunting attack, respected as a valuable weapon in women's softball.

In left-field will be, Jen Rupert, a sophomore from Saverna Park. The time in right-field will be shared by heavy-hitting sophomore, Lori Hastings, and one of the most improved players from last year, senior, Jen Brown.

Sophomore, Christy Harris, from Greensboro, Maryland will see time at first-base when Cupka pitches. Freshman, Denise Marshall, a "very solid hitter" will be the designated hitter and back up Brewster behind the plate.

Fall's number three pitcher will be Debbie Smetherst, who will also play in the outfield. Backing up Jensen at third will be Kathleen Kwap, a utility infielder with "good hands and a great arm".

Backing up the outfielders will be freshman, Anne McDermaid, who is currently nursing a stress fracture in her foot. Sophomore, Julie Dill, and freshman, Wendy Debnam, will also see time in the outfield.

Fall commented that she needs more games to tell actually how the season should go. However, after the team takes a week "to solidify things", it should be a pretty good season for Fall's Lady Shoremen.

The WAC plays host to Dickinson Saturday in a twinbill starting at 1 p.m.

Men's lax loses to Alfred

By Matt Giller

The return of Jed Cronin and Dave Slomkowski's outstanding job between the pipes was not enough to defeat the sixth-ranked Alfred University (5-0), 7-3.

The rain-soaked Kibler set the tone for the game as it hosted a low-scoring affair.

The much more experienced Saxons got on the board first. In the second quarter Jed Cronin, who sat out the Navy game because of a badly sore ankle, evened the score at one. The sophomore middie, however, re-injured his ankle and was less than 100% for the remainder of the contest.

Alfred went on top again later in the second quarter to take a halftime lead of 2-1.

The Saxons scored two unanswered goals before freshman attackman Gibby Semmes and freshman middie James Carver hooked up to trim the Saxon lead to 4-2.

The Shoremen (1-4) were unable to mount any scoring threat, however, for the rest of the game. Senior Greg Rupert scored the last goal for the WAC.

Slomkowski had 10 saves and the Shoremen outscooped the Saxons in groundballs 48-40. The Saxons did, however, outshoot the WAC 24-20.

The Shoremen face-off against the defending Division III champion Statesmen of Hobart. Starting time 1:30.

R.E.M. releases timeless album

by Joe Hamilton

R.E.M albums are hard to talk about. They make them that way: murky, obscurantist, and highly impressionistic. Yet for all the disconcerting elements of an R.E.M album, they are usually hummable if not danceable. Hence their success. Murky dance rock. It's fitting that as each album R.E.M. puts out becomes increasingly lucid, both lyrically and musically, cries of commercialism and artistic corruption are flung at them. Out of Time, the band's latest album, is sure to arouse indignation in the "I-listened-to-R.E.M.-when. . . " elitists, but it is also sure to attract new listeners. Either way a success.

The first noticeable difference about this album from their other six albums is the inclusion of string and horn arrangements and outside "star" cameos. In the way of strings and the like, there are violins, cellos, saxophones and a flugelhorn. On the star front, there is an appearance by KRS-1 from Boogie Down Productions and Kate Pierson of the B-52's. There are those cynics that will say that the addition of strings and guests is the definition of washed-up. These people haven't heard Out of Time , or they are scrambleheads.

Side one, the "Time" side, begins with "Radio Song," a tune that goes from a quick, sort of jangly funk, that is not too far from what one expects from the band, to a slow string filled interludes. As if that alternation isn't bizarre enough, rapper KRS-1 ends the song with a rap about radio promoting class violence. A funky symphonic tune with a black socialist rap. Did someone say washed-up?

The song that starts off side two, the "memory" side, is "Shiny Happy People." Also an upbeat song, this one will more than likely arouse disinterest on the part of some due to its trite, poppy lyrics. Lines like shiny happy people holding hands and shiny happy people laughing or there's no time to cry/ happy happy/ put it in your heart where tomorrow shines abound. This song with written though to intentionally make people smile. The way the vowels are put together, all those "e" sounds at the end of lines makes ones mouth curl into a smile. Clever. Besides, Kate Pierson sings harmony with Stipe so well you'd think the song was about her.

The real charm of the album, though, is in the warmth and intimacy of the new clarity

Drama department presents Chekhov's The Three Sisters

by Clay Eichelberger

The Three Sisters, considered by many to be one of Anton Chekhov's finest plays, will be produced by the Drama Department next week in Tawes Theater. The play, written by Chekhov near the turn of the century, concerns the lives of Olga, Masha, and Irina, three sisters who live in a small Russian town and long to return to the Moscow they remember from their childhood. Throughout the play, the sisters' lives bring them both happiness and disappointment as they come to realize the distinction between what they have and what they dream of having.

Some of the themes dealt with in the play include the escape of time, laughter, tears, and the illusions that people create to supplement reality. Through it all, the relationship between the three sisters remains constant and strong. Senior Cindy Croot, who plays Olga, the eldest of the sisters, is intrigued by the sisters' relationship. "The most fascinating thing is the way in which these sisters rely on one another and trust one another," she says. "Their bond is so strong, the dramatic action of the play hinges on it."

Though not a comedy, the play contains much humor, which may come as a surprise to those accustomed to thinking of Chekhov's writing as heavy and serious. Throughout the rehearsal process, members of the cast have been encouraged to see that humor and let their characters enjoy themselves. Senior Brett Lankford, in the role of Kulygin, husband of one of the sisters, feels that this presents a challenge. "I think that probably when you first look at a Chekhov play, you're not immediately struck by [the humor]. There is some humor which is obvious, but some of it is on a deeper level, which is interesting, because it makes it more challenging to bring that across."

Seniors Jacque Collins and Felicia Shakman join Croot in playing the title roles in a large cast which also includes Martin Buinicki, Scott Cagan, Clay Eichelberger, Stephanie Hess, Lankford, Tim Madison, John Need, Carl Pupa, Ed Schroeder, Rob Thompson, and Lisa Woodcock, with Jason Imber as stage manager.

The play is directed by department chair Timothy Maloney, with set and lights designed by associate professor Jason Rubin. Original music was composed especially for this production by Kate Bennett. Dates for the production are Thursday through Saturday, April 4, 5, and 6, at 8:00 PM. No reservations are required.

Clay Eichelberger is a senior drama major who hopes everyone will come to the show.

of sound and voices. Singer Michael Stipe's lyrics are now easily discernible and also, let's face it, make more sense. Not to disparage Stipe's earlier surrealistic and impressionistic lyrics, but these seem so much more vibrant with emotion and personal depth. On the song "Half A World Away," the band sounds reminiscent "You Are The Everything." With acoustic guitar, organ and mandolin, the song is stark and confessional. The power of Stipe's voice is so evident it is no wonder that they choose now to emphasize it. Stipe sings beautifully. The songs lyrics are typical of the quality and emotional appeal of the new R.E.M.: This could be the saddest dusk/ that ever seemed to turn to the miracle./ I'm alive. My mind is racing./ as it always will. My hands tired,/ my heart aches, I'm half a world away.

The song "Texarcana" is the most obviously R.E.M. sounding song on the record. The addition of the slide guitar adds a slight country feel, and the lyrics are again directed more toward emotion than cerebral surrealism. Sung most clearly by Mike Mills, the band's bassist, the song still has the depth: I would give my life to planet, I would give it all. Catch me if I fall. The last line sung by Stipe repeatedly at the end.

This use of repetition endings is prevalent on the album. "Country Feedback," perhaps the most emotionally expressive song on the album, and in my opinion, Stipe's strongest performance. Acoustic guitars, pedal steel guitar, a loud feedback-laden guitar, and bells, give this slow song a brooding, plodding quality. As the general themes of the album are love, time, and memory, this song speaks of clearly of them: I was central, I had control, I lost my head, I need this. I need this. And as the song build to the fade-out in which Stipe sings for all he's worth, It's crazy what you could have had, it's crazy what you could have had, I need this. I need this.

The albums other tracks are also highly notable. "Low" is untypically R.E.M. in its instrumentation (congas?) but is more typical Stipe-style lyrics. Definitely a plus here. "Belong" is more a prose reading set to music than it is a song and for that reason is extremely cool. Whoever said they were washed-up was silly. "Losing My Religion" is another string arrangement song, but it also has the mandolin on it. Beautifully sung and hauntingly confessional, the mix is weird. Decidedly another plus. I'll admit, although I'm raving this album up like nothing since the Beatles, there are two weak tracks: "Near Wild Heaven" and "Endgame," the latter being an instrumental. They are good, but they are not as intense as the others. The last track, "Me in Honey," is another more typically R.E.M sounding rock tune.

R.E.M. are not only not washed-up, they are at their creative peak. Success does not always mean a group has lost its integrity. Out of Time is excellent. Saying much else is pointless. Hear it.

it shouldn't matter if you are a member of an organization, or for that matter which organization you may or may not be involved in. But on the other hand, groups are prime opportunities for reaching people. This is one reason we have had such a good turn out. The response through our fraternity has been very positive. With each project we have had people show up who didn't even sign up. Realistically large campus organizations can reach more people. Hands Out could do so much more if everyone took part."

By 4:30 most of the work that could be completed that day was finished. It is ironic that Echo Hill is a school designed to teach individuals about cooperation because, coincidentally, by the end of the day those who helped learned just that. Freshman George Jaimison felt this way as well saying, "As a member of Hands Out I was impressed with the outcome and the display of enthusiasm and teamwork, especially considering the weather. It was a great success." Above all else, however, Echo Hill was fun. It was a day to do something different and do something for someone else.

Hands Out has one more event schedules for April 20th which will involve painting a barn for Camp Fairlee Manor, a camp for physically and mentally handicap individuals. Also on April 20th, Hands Out will be encouraging faculty to help plant trees around the community in honor of Earth Day.

In addition to group projects Hands OUt has compiled a directory of individual volunteer activities. Directories can be picked up in the Career Development Office. Hands Out also has a mail box in Central Services if you have any questions, comments or ideas.

support a democratic regime. President Trout said at his inauguration that "Education must include a moral and social dimension." While this sounds perfectly groovy, it misses the point. Education can not be value-free, it inherently carries moral baggage. When higher education concerns itself with the latest in "lesbian thought," what, pray tell, is it higher than?

Washington College may soon be joining the list of institutions who seek to have its students march in lockstep uniformity under the name of diversity. All lovers of academic freedom must beware, big sibling is watching.

One main reason he stated that those using this kind of drug should be especially careful was because the reaction to it could be very different from person to person. It could be good or it could be very bad. He also warned that after using the drug no one comes out the same way psychologically. "The word space cadet has real meaning", he said concerning those who use hallucinogenics.

Professor Greene suggested meditation as a substitute for drug use. He commented that it will induce the same drug like experience and is natural and not harmful.

U.S. Ambassador to Japan to speak at 1991 Commencement

Michael Hayden Armacost, United States Ambassador to Japan, will address Washington College's 209th commencement class on Sunday, May 19, and will receive the College's honorary Doctor of Laws degree.

Armacost has had a long and distinguished career in foreign service and international relations. He assumed his post as twenty-thire U.S. Ambassador to Japan in May of 1989. Prior to that appointment he served for five years as Under Secretary for Political Affairs at the Department of State working with Secretary George Schultz. From 1982-1984 Armacost was Ambassador to the Philippines during the critical and sensitive period prior to the election of Mrs. Corazon Aquino. Armacost also served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (1980-82). Deputy Assistant secretay of Defense (1978-80), senior staff member for East Asia at the National Security Council (1977-78), and special assistant to the Ambassador to Japan (1972-74). He was s member of the Policy Planning Staff at the State Department first in 1969-72 and again in 1974-77.

In addition to his career in diplomacy, Armacost has held academic posts as a lecturer at Georgetown University (1971-71) and at John Hopkins University (1970-71), as a visiting professor of international relations at the International Christian University in Tokyo, Japan (1968-69), and as assistant professor and instructor in government at Pomona College (1962-68).

Armacost is the recipient of awards for distinguished and meritorious service from the Secretary of State, the President and the Department of Defense. He is also the author of The Foreign Relations of the U.S. (Dickenson Press, 1969) and The Politics of Weapons

Dr. Taylor appointed dean of the college

By: Susie Mazzullo

Dr. John Taylor has recently been chosen to be Acting Dean of the college for the 1991-1992 academic year. The position thus far is temporary and only covers the next school year. He will be replacing Dean Elizabeth Baer who is leaving to finish work on her manuscript.

Dr. Taylor is currently Department Chair in political science and teaches a number of courses as well as manages advisees.

Next year Dr. Taylor is scheduled to continue teaching only one course. Law and Society will be team taught by Dr. Taylor and whoever is chosen to replace him. The reasons for this he explains are because someone who is coming out of graduate school will probably not be prepared to teach a course such as this one and he did not want to drop the course from the schedule altogether.

He also explained that his current advisees will be well taken care of .Because he was Department Chair this past year, Taylor explained that he didn't have any freshman advisees and his sophomore advisees have now declared their majors. This left him with only those students majoring in political science. Dr. Taylor said that they won't have to be shuffled around because Dr. Premo will automatically take them over as advisees when he returns as Departmental Chair for the political science department. .

Sherry Magill announces resignation

By: Susie Mazzullo

Sherry P. Magill, Vice President and Deputy to the President, has announced her resignation beginning immediately following Commencement in May. She has since accepted the position as program officer for the Jessie Ball DuPont Religious, Charitable and Educational Fund in Jacksonville, Florida.

Magill has been at Washington College since 1983. She was hired originally as the executive director of the Wye Faculty Seminar. The Seminar is a program that "assists professors in small leveral arts colleges in relating their teaching to the broad issues of citizenship in the American polity," as explained in its brochure.

She was then offered the position of part time Executive Assistant to President Cater the next year. Her position as director of the Why Faculty Seminar was also at the time only part time. Three years later she was promoted to Vice President and Deputy to the President. Of her years her at Washington College, Magill responded "I have enjoyed them enormously and have had a long and mutually beneficial relationship with the college."

During her years here at the college Magill has also taught courses in History and American Studies. She has a PhD in American Studies.

This semester Magill is team teaching a course ith Dean Elizabeth Baer entitled Southern Voices. Magill commented that she was very appreciative that she was given the opportunity to teach here at Washington College and that she will miss it a great deal.

Magill claimed that her decision was entirely her decision and that she knows that this will give President Trout the opportunity to hire a new key person for his staff. "I have a great deal of respect for Dr. Trout and he will have an enormously successful administration."

In her new position with the Jessie Ball Dupont Fund, Magill will be working with in-

EDITORIAL

Sunny weather and spring fever

Spring, all warm and balmy weather, seems to be heading into the Chestertown area. With all the sunny days, and clear blue skies, it's very easy to lose track of time, and forget one's obligations. The way nearly half of the SGA senate did. Tisk, tisk. So, while the truant senators, and they know who they are, were out, the remainder of the Senate, the executive board, and interested onlookers sat in the Sophie Kerr room waiting for enough senators to arrive to make a quorum.

Now these missing senators were not serving their constituents the way they promised to all the way back in September when they were elected. Attendance at SGA meetings has been a bit lax of late, leading SGA president Kevin "Sparky" Kelly to vow that next year excessively absent senators will be impeached. Did the SGA really learn nothing from last spring's escapades? Oh, the ghosts of amendments not passed and Senators not attending. Yes, as the year winds down, there does seem to be less and less reason to go to meetings since most of the juicy stuff is behind us. However, we all have our jobs to do, and it would be nice if the Senators could show up to do theirs, considering the meetings usually last for under an hour.

Letters to the Editor

Liberation theology and the Conservative Inquisition

The Conservative Inquisition has finally arrived at Washington College! It seems Edward Elfenbein, in his letter on political correctness and Liberation Theology, wants to perpetuate the sort of "liberal" bashing that has pervaded so many other college campuses.

For those that aren't familiar with the latest academic witch-hunt, many college faculties have been accused of imposing "liberal" values upon rightly dissenting students. Supported with anecdotal evidence, the self-proclaimed vanguards-of-free-thought claim that those students who dare oppose the liberal indoctrination are flunked or forcibly barred from the classroom. Supposedly, this policy of political correctness has pervaded nearly every liberal arts college.

Liberation Theology analyzes Black, Feminist, Latin American, Gay/Lesbian, and Environmental interpretations of Christianity. Mr. Elfenbein claims that the philosophy department, by offering this course, is participating in an insidious, liberal plot to "have its students march in lockstep uniformity under the name of diversity." Apparently, he believes that students are forced to agree with the liberation theologians, and this constitutes political correctness. Quite simply, Mr. Elfenbein, you're wrong. It seems you have formed an expert opinion about the course by reading a paragraph in the course catalog description.

Having never taken the course, Mr. Elfenbein can't know what sort of discussion takes place. Those of us taking the class have never been condemned for disagreeing. Criticism is always encouraged. In fact, the professors often debate with each other.

The purpose of a Liberal Arts education is to teach people to think. To think, one needs to be exposed to a diversity of ideas. To think that intellectual diversity can only be accomplished by eliminating alternative courses is pure poppycock. It appears that Mr. Elfenbein wants every Washington College Student to graduate with a prefabricated moral code. Whose moral standard is the college to teach, Mr. Elfenbein? Yours?

In the future, we hope Mr. Elfenbein won't write absurd statements like: "President Trout said . . . 'education must include a moral and a social dimension.' . . . This misses the point. Education cannot be value-free, it inherently carries moral baggage." If Mr. Elfenbein wishes to complain about education at Washington College, he should do so in an educated manner.

To conclude, we have never encountered political correctness at Washington College. Let us stop academic witch-hunts. Rather let us get down to the business of thinking.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

The Board of Publications is now accepting applications for the position of Editor-in-Chief of the Washington College Elm. Interested parties should send a letter expressing said interest to Chairman Amzie Parcell by Friday, April 12.

CAMPUS VOICES

Issue: How important do you feel faculty involvement is in community volunteer activities?

Words to the faculty

On Saturday, April 29, Hands Out will be organizing two separate community activities. One will involve painting a barn for Camp Fairlee Manor, a summer camp for physically and mentally handicapped individuals, and the second project involves planting trees around Kent County. Because of the nature of this activity, Hands Out will be making a special effort to encourage Washington College faculty members and their families to participate.

So far, Hands Out has mainly targeted students. The April 20 tree planting event is an opportunity for faculty to show their support and willingness to become an active part of our college community. Before the Hands Out organization began, there already existed a group of students and faculty who were regularly involved with the community, a predictable crowd that was academically and extracurricularly active.

The point of Hands Out was to reach those who weren't ordinarily involved and to encourage growth for everyone in the college experience. At both the Habitat for Humanity and Echo Hill projects, many of these students were there giving their time. Hopefully, this attitude toward involvement will remain here at Washington College, but it won't happen if an enthusiasm for these activities can't be kept up, a total enthusiasm found in the combined efforts and energies of both students and faculty.

It is highly unlikely that one day of volunteer work will change the lives, attitudes, and study habits of the students involved, but it could, perhaps, spark an interest that would lead to continual participation in such volunteer projects. With the encouraging support of faculty presence and a growing number of active student volunteers, this spark, we feel, will become a flame of dedication and a willingness to become active in our community. So, come on out, faculty, a show your support for volunteer activities because of the ultimate goal of Hands Out is to change everyone's outlook on the total academic life experience here at Washington College— to make it richer and more beneficial for all involved.

I think that faculty should be involved because it should be a community effort and it might help the student-faculty relations on campus.

In the world: Kurdish rebellion in Iraq falters

Iraq: Kurdish Uprising Falters and U.N. Action is Strongly Urged in Crisis

Saddam Hussein has dealt the Kurds the worst setback in the history of their century long Nationalist struggle. Last Thursday, with the Hussein's forces captured Kirkuk, a major oil refinery, and the Kurds failed to reopen road north to Irbil that was blocked by an Iraqi armored force; with these two events the fate of the rebels was sealed The Kurdish revolt, which seemed to be making gains after Iraq's pull-out from Kuwait, is now feeling the brunt of the Republican Guard's helicopter and tank attacks.

Rebel forces are scattering in disaray and many civilian Kurdish families fear arrest and torture. Kurdish businessmen, professionals and peasants, as well as the guerilla forces are now fleeing the Iraq to the neighboring countries of Turkey and Iran. The Kurdish people, who praised the role of the United States in forcing Hussein out of Kuwait, are now feeling betrayed as the U.S. has refused to aid their uprising. Guerilla forces had been lulled into a false sense of security by America's ban on the use of warplanes against the rebels. The Bush administration has taken a neutral stance in Iraq's current internal conflict in light of American public opinion, which most likely would not support another show of force so soon after the Gulf Crisis.

This week, Turkish President Turgut Ozal called for an urgent U.N. Security Council meeting in resopnse to growing international concern over the Iraqi crackdown against the Kurds; the refugee problem is of also of great conern to the international community. Concern over the crisis came as finishing touches were being put on a U.S. proposed resolution that would formally end the Persian Gulf War in exchange for Iraq giving up its weapons of mass desrtruction and agreeing to pay war damages. President Bush's aids have been keeping very quiet about the administration's future intentions in the current conflict.

Soviet Union: Soviet Price Hikes Incite Anger and Opposition Seek to Unite

Few shoppers were convinced with the government's claim that this week's price increases signaled a long awaited move toward a Western-style market economy. Tuesday, prices on a range of goods, such as eggs and meat, were doubled and tripled by administrative fiat in exchange for small wage increases. The Soviet news agency Tass has described the reform as "the most unpopular of all decisions by the Soviet leadership" since Gorbachev came to power in 1985. The government has been trying to persuade the public to swallow these painful changes by claiming that they will lead to a reappearance of "deficit" items; so far the store shelves remain as poorly stocked as always. Radical economists see this step as an administrative measure that will allow the government to control most of the economy.

While all of these economic changes are occuring, leaders of opposition groups in the 15 Soviet Republics are planing to meet in Moscow this month in order to strenghen their challenge to the Kremlin and consider the creation of shadow political institutions. Gorbachev has previously faed powerful, but isolated challenges in the republics; with unity among these elements, the opposition's confrontation with the Kremlin is likely to take on a new dimension.

Albania: Protest of Election Result in Bloodshed

Clashes between police and rock throwing demonstrators broke out as opponents of the long-ruling Communist Party gathered in Shokder to protest Sunday's parliamentary election in which the Communists won a landslide. The protesters were rallying against what they said were numerous cases of fraud and intimidation in the election. Three were left dead, including Arben Broxi, the leader of a newly formed opposition Democratic Party, and scores were injured in the incident. After the street battle, witnesses say that protesters broke into and ransacked the Communist party building. Western election observers said that the government seemed to be intentionally provoking street violence in order to have a pretext for a crackdown.

Although the Communists won the election, the President, moderately reformist Communist Party cheif Ramiz Alia, was ousted from power. Voting patterns showed a distinct split between urban and rural regions with the opposition finding more support in the cities.

Beers: in step with the owner of Newt's, Big John

Phil "Slice" Macek

Newt's is a place that many people know well. This being the case, I decided to take a little jaunt down to the bar on High Street and have a chat with the owner, Big John. My purpose is to get people better acquainted with the owner so as to feel more inclined to go to Newt's for a good time (and a beer or two). So before we get to the interview with Big John, it might be appropriate to give a little background of the man who made Newt's a solid part of our college experience.

Born in Philadelphia, Big John is a captain in the Merchant Marines, and for a while was a tugboat captain up in New York. He says he likes owning Newt's because it gives him the chance to meet so many people. He also has some real estate rental properties and his hobbies include boating, travelling, and water skiing, which he used to teach. In terms of travelling, Big John says that he has been to all contiguous 48 states and that every year he goes to the Black Hills Rally in South Dakota. He said that one year he met both Malcolm Forbes and Liz Taylor at the rally and that you get to see people from all walks of life. Thus with this brief introduction concluded, let's get to the interview without further delay.

Slice: Since Newt's is considered a "second home" by so many people, I wonder if you could give us a brief history of your establishment?

Big John: Well, initially, the location where the Hillside Bar now stands used to be a milk station. The first milk station or dairy was operated by a Mr. Haughn in the early 1900's. In 1912, a Mr. Hauptfuhrer bought him out and operated the place until 1914 when he was, in turn, bought out by the Supplee-Wills-Jones Company of Pittsburgh. During the heyday of Kent County's Dairy industry, the milk was shipped by train to stations in both Philadelphia and Wilmington where it was made available to consumers.

More recently, the bar came into existence in 1958, when the original owner, a man named Emory Newton (known to his friends as "Big Newt") built "Newt's" on a vacant piece of property where the Kent County milk station used to stand. I acquired the place back in 1977 and have owned it ever since.

Slice: Everyone knows about the traditional Wednesday night beer bargains. Do you have any other specials featured throughout the week?

B.J.: Oh sure. First off, we have Happy Hour every night from 4-7 p.m. On Tuesdays we have 50 cent Schnapps shots, including a brand new variety called Cactus Juice (the author and his fellow alcohol taster and booze critic, Matt Moore, reviewed this flavor extensively and both gave it two big thumbs up!) On Thursday nights we feature half-priced beer, shots, and mixed drinks, and we usually try to have a band. Of course, Wednesday nights are self-explanatory, although this is the first time in 15 years that we have had to raise the price of the drafts; this is due in large part to the new tax that took effect in January.

You see, I just want to run a place where both the town folk and the college kids can get together and drink. Back in 1977 when I took over, there was a highly negative image associated with Newt's. It used to be that you throw the hat in the door and see if it got shot at before entering. As a result, I banned those cutthroats from the bar and today the police chief tells me Newt's has fewer fights than the Tavern, the Bluebird, and Andy's. Incidentally, in 1985 Newt's got written up in the Washington Post for the good atmosphere it presented to the people. Although personally, I think the reporter must have gotten lucky or something.

Slice: What do you think about Newt's being labelled "the new sports bar in Chestertown?"

B. J.: Well, it's true that I've tried to become more sports oriented. We now have six television sets, most of which are tuned into sports programming. Plus, I've been toying with the idea of having a sports raffle every week for two tickets to an Orioles game. I'm also trying to get some more sports memorabilia in here without changing the entire look of Newt's.

Slice: Have you ever thought about installing a grill so as to offer sandwiches and other light fare?

B. J.: No, actually I haven't; mainly for economic reasons. However, the hot dogs and hot sausages we have are made by the Amish and they make them by God's law and won't risk their soul by putting anything artificial in them. The dogs are then brought down to Crumpton on Wednesday and that's where I pick them up. They've been called the "best dogs on the shore."

Slice: Lastly, how did you get involved with supporting the rugby team?

B.J.: I've always been sponsoring softball and bowling teams mostly because it's good publicity and also I just like doing it. So Seth [Engel] came to me and asked if I could help the team out. And as it turns out, I gave the team money I could afford to and am now a sponsor.

Finally, the time to depart had arrived. With enough liquor in me to drown a small moose, I thanked Big John for a wonderful time and told him I would be back again--probably tomorrow night.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC. If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Women's lax steamrolls

By Matt Giller

While the men's lax team was fighting through some difficult times, the women across the tracks were squashing their opponents like runaway locomotives, outscoring their last two opponents by a total of 40-11.

Swarthmore and Bowdoin were the damsels in distress falling to the Shorewomen (3-1) by respective scores of 21-3 and 19-8.

Last Tuesday the WAC played a shaky first half that was even for most of the way until seniors Sarah Coste (8 goals) and Amy Tiehel (3 goals) snapped a 5-5 tie to pull away for good just before the halftime horn.

The Polar Bears pulled to within one goal until the Shorewomen exploded for 12 of the next 13 goals securing their second win of the season.

Junior Margaret Doyle, who suffered damage to her right kneecap during warmups prior to the Bowdoin contest and sidelined for at least two weeks, tallied a hat trick. Sophomores Amy McCleary and Samantha Clements netted three and two goals respectively. Junior Kristy Hilgartner handled 14 saves between the pipes.

Two days later the Shorewomen hosted Swarthmore College and showed no mercy by scoring three touchdowns and allowing only a field goal to the Garnets.

The first 25 minutes was the only sign of offensive life displayed by Swarthmore scoring three goals; fortunately, the WAC scored 12. When both teams came out for the second half, the Shorewomen's Amy McCleary's defender forgot her stick on the sidelines as she tallied five goals in the second frame for a career game high of seven goals.

Coste almost went unnoticed with four goals while Tiehel and Clements added hat tricks. Freshman Cristin Albert and senior Erin O'Neal each netted one apiece.

The Shorewomen host MAC rival Susquehanna Saturday, faceoff 1:00 p.m.

Crew battles weather and foes

Events were cancelled or shortened on land and on sea as well last Saturday afternoon. The five-school Chester Regatta was trimmed to just three events because of lightning and torrential rains.

George Mason, Skidmore, Franklin and Marshall, and the Annapolis Rowing Club joined the WAC on the historic Chester last weekend.

George Mason took two events, the men's jayvee eight and the women's novice.

GMU oared 2,000 meters on their way to first place in the first event, the men's jayvee eight, with a time of 6:36. Amy Osborne was the coxswain of the Washington shell that included stroke Terence McCabe, Rod Benson, Matt Bershon, John Herring, Glenn Warner, Eric Jewett, Daryll Calloway and bowman Ray Herndon. The Shoremen rowed to a respectable 6:43.

The Shorewomen came in second place in their meet behind GMU. Coxswain Merrit Pridgeon led the freshmen shell. Stroke Laura Green, Suzanne Groner, Kate Towery, Nancy Whitemen, Sue Czechowski, Mary Bird, Alex Nadar and bowman Jen Hozik rowed only 25 seconds behind the first place time of 7:24.

Only Skidmore and F&M rowed in the men's varsity four before the lightning and rain.

Both crew teams travel across the Bay to dip their oars at the Johns Hopkins Regatta this Saturday.

The Great Sabha knows baseball

The Great One is back. You ask, where has he been? Sabha had to put sports, his passion, of course, in the proverbial bullpen while he gave strategic advice to General Schwarzkopf at the front during Desert Sabha. Needless to say, the staff is giddy that the Great One is back safely in C-town. After outstanding pigskin prophecies in the fall, he is back to share with us his baseball savoir-faire. Here are some of his predictions for the upcoming season.

NL MVP: Will Clark - Maybe the voters will leave their hearts in San Francisco this year, finally.

AL MVP: Ken Griffey Jr. - If it weren't for you-know-who little Kenny could carry the Mariners all the way.

NL CY YOUNG: David Cone - best stuff in the league; K'd almost 10 per 9 innings last year.

AL CY YOUNG: Erik Hanson - with an improved confident team behind him, he should win 20 by August (won 18 last year, 3.24 ERA).

NL EAST CHAMPS: NY Mets - no bad attitude (no Strawberry), just guys who are hungry and good - reminds the Great One of the '86 team (but this year they won't need Buckner).

NL WEST CHAMPS: SF Giants - The best 3-4-5 lineup in baseball.

AL EAST CHAMPS: Boston - If Burks and Greenwell are clutch they could be hitting it over the Green Monster in October.

AL WEST CHAMPS: Oakland - The Great One foresees dissension in the clubhouse; but they are still good enough to win it.

WORLD SERIES CHAMPS: METS - pitching wins it - there's nobody finer than the Flushing Five.

SOME OTHER PROPHETIC TIDBITS

DO YOU DELIVER? Cecil Fielder will eat more Ring Dings than hit ding dongs.

SORRY BALTIMORE. If the woeful O's win more than 65 games with guys like Joe Orsulak and Craig Worthington in the lineup it will be a successful season.

NO CHANCE CUBBIES. How can you win with a manager that was the only one in the history of the series to bring a major league All-Star team over to Japan and lose.

DARYL WHO? That's what they're going to say after Strawberry's career in LA. While with the Mets he hit under the Mendoza Line (.200) at Dodger Stadium; what makes anybody think that's going to change now that he is wearing Dodger Blue.

NAILS NAILED. Lenny Dykstra's (poor) gambling could ultimately be more serious (there is some bookie out there who is waiting for the right price to come out and squeal on this poker face).

SAY IT AIN'T SO KIRK. This could (and should) be Gibson's last year. Trotting the baseline with a limp should be remembered as heroic not as a symbol of a dying athlete not knowing when to quit - for the good of the team.

Symposium given on Enviromental Ethics

A growing concern in the aftermath of the Gulf War is its impact on the environment, ranging from the trash left behind by allied troops to the tragic dumping and burning of millions of gallons of Kuwaiti oil. In cooperation with West Point Academy, and the Washington College Philosophy Honor Society, Phi Sigma Tau is sponsoring a timely symposium on Environmental Ethics Saturday, April 6 in the Casey Academic Center Forum.

At noon, West Point Major Merritt P. Drucker will lecture on "The Military Commander's Responsibility to the Environment," with a discussion and debate to follow. Later, a 7 p.m., the P.B.S. documentary "After the Warming" will be screened and a discussion and reception will follow.

Warren Brookes, a nationally syndicated columnist for the Detroit News (who has written extensively on the economics of environmental policy) will also speak on the plight of the environmental condition today. Brookes' columns appear four times a week in over 65 papers. He is the only journalist to have received top rating in all six editions of MediaGuide.

The talk will take place on Thursday, April 11, at 7:30 p.m. in the Casey Academic Center Forum. Brookes will argue that the environmentalists are hurting their own case by overreacting to the dangers of pollution. He asserts that education will naturally lead to beneficial environmental effects.

Brookes earned a B.A. degree in Economics from Harvard University in 1950, after which he embarked on a twenty year advertising and marketing career in private industry. He is the author of The Economy of the Mind.

Delegation sent to National Model NATO

by Stephanie Sherwell

The International Relations Club recently sent a delegation to the National Model NATO held in Washington, D.C. The delegation members, representing Luxembourg, were Jenny Albers, Selwa Amer, Lionel Dyson, Maria Jerardi, and Stephanie Sherwell. The highlight of the trip was a visit to the Luxembourg embassy where the delegation was briefed on the country's position on such topics as nuclear arms, defense planning, economics, political alliances, and feelings about NATO. The delegation returned to Washington COllege with a first hand knowledge of policy making, the art of compromise, and how to deal with crisis situations in world politics.

Symposium sponsored on "Africa Today"

Three experts in African Affairs and politics will discuss "Africa Today" in a major symposium sponsored by Washington College's Goldstein Program in Public Affairs Monday, April 8 at 4 p.m. in the college's Hynson Lounge. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

"Africa Today" will focus on two important contemporary topics: conflict in African nations and diplomatic relations between African nations and the United States. William Zartman, Director of African Studies at the Paul S. Nitze School for Advanced International Studies of the Johns Hopkins University, will discuss the overall topic of "Conflict in Africa."

South African conflict will be reviewed by H. Michael Stevenson, Professor of Political Science at York University, Toronto. Finally, Martin Stainland, Director of International Affairs at the University of Pittsburgh Graduate School of Public and International Affairs, will discuss current "U.S./Africa Relations." The discussion will be moderated by Washington College political science professor Tahir Shad.

British Social Morals lecture given

Lawrence Stone, a leading social historian of Renaissance England, will lecture on "Honor, Morals and the Law: Trading Money for Adultery in England, 1660-1860" Tuesday, April 9 at 7:30 p.m. at Washington College. The lecture, which is free and open to the public, is scheduled for the Casey Academic Center Forum.

Lawrence Stone is Dodge Professor of History, emeritus, at Princeton University, where in 1976 he received the first annual Behrman Award for distinguished achievement in the humanities. The range of his published works in enormous, and includes medieval British sculpture, the history of the family and sexual relations in Britain over the centuries since the middle ages, and the history of the British aristocracy.

A native of Epson, Surrey, England, Dr. Stone became a U.S. citizen in 1970. He studied at the Sorbonne and at Christ Church, Oxford. Before joining Princeton University, he was a lecturer at University College and then a Fellow at Wadham College, Oxford.

Dr. Stone's lecture is the first Conrad M. Wingate Memorial lecture in History, recently established by the Wingate family in honor of the 1923 graduate of Washington College.

In announcing that Armacost had accepted an invitation from the senior class to speak, Washington College President Charles H. Trout stated, "Both Japan, and indeed, the entire Pacific Rim are unquestionably vital to the long term interests of the United States. To learn that Ambassador Armacost will be with us at the College's most important ceremony is wonderful news. Throughout his distinguished career he has exemplified service to the nation of the highest order. There is no one better able to speak to us about America's delicate and vital relationship with Japan than he. The officers of the senior class have chosen well."

When Dean Baer decided to resign, President Trout invited the faculty to offer suggestions about how the new Dean should be chosen and also who should be chosen. The President then went over the suggestions with the Committee of Appointments and Tenure. From this deliberation, Dr. Taylor was offered the position.

Dr. Taylor expresses that while he will miss the classroom, he is looking forward to an administrative position. "I like the classroom experience but I have always thought that I would like to try working in an administration at some point. This offer will give me that opportunity to do that."

Dr. Taylor said that the future doesn't hold any definite plans. If for some reason, whether his or the schools, this situation as Dean does not become permanent then Dr. Taylor expresses a hope to return to his position as political science professor here at the college.

The political science department, along with the college administration, is currently looking for Dr. Taylor's replacement. While Dr. Taylor will be missed in the classroom he is congratulated and wished the best of luck in his new position.

Crisis Center Advocate discusses date rape

By: Susie Mazzullo

A member of the Crisis Center in Easton visited the campus on Wednesday evening to talk to those interested students about date rape. The lecture, which was sponsored by the Alpha Chi Omega sorority, was held in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library from 7:00 - 8:00 P.M.

Shelly Phelps began the lecture by telling those present about the Crisis Center of the Midshore which is located in Easton. The center caters to a number of counties including Queen Anne, Kent, Talbot, and Worcester and the staff members there are prepared to deal with a great number of problems. The primary crisis that they deal with is sexual assault.

The center has been in existence since October 1988 and offers a number of services. Among these are a twenty four hour hotline, free therapy, and speakers that will travel throughout the community in order to educate others.

The hotline is available to those who need assistance any time of the day or night. Members of the staff are always available to listen or provide help. Advocates are staff members who will go to you wherever you are during the day or night to help. They will travel to the hospital, to the police station, and even attends legal hearings. The purpose of advocates is so that the person who needs help will have it throughout their ordeal and not just the first night.

The most important part of the Crisis Center, she says, is that the person does not have to suffer alone. The twenty four hour hotline provides service for those persons at any time for any reason. If you just need someone to talk to then the Crisis Center is there. Anyone can call and not even have to give their name.

Miss Phelps, who is an advocate herself, also told those presents some shocking statistics including the facts that every ten minutes a rape is reported and that 75 - 90% of rapes go unreported. She also said that one in three women will be raped or sexually assaulted before they are eighteen years of age and that one in five men will be raped or sexually assaulted before they are eighteen years of age.

To put life in the statistics, Miss Phelps asked one member of the audience how many girls they have knows throughout their life. She then divided this number by three and this end number is the total of how many girls in that group were probably sexually assaulted at one time or another. For example, if the number of girls known is one hundred than it is likely that thirty three of those girls were sexually assaulted before they were of the age eighteen.

Some local statistics for the region included that the crime of rape is increasing more on the Eastern Shore then in any other part of the state.

Following the statistics the lecture turned to the subject of date rape and acquaintance rape. Miss Phelps warned everyone present to "be careful and be smart" above all. She also defined the terms so that there will be no confusion. The difference between date and acquaintance is that in one instance you are on an actual date and in the other instance the victim's aggressor is just known to them. For example, they may be someone in a class with them, someone they know from a job, or just someone they have seen once or twice before. Rape she defined simply as "unconsented sexual intercourse".

Miss Phelps also gave those present some pointers on how to be safer. She warned about walking alone where you are more susceptible, especially at night. For instance, if you know that you are going to be walking around a dark street at night, don't wear high heels for they may impair you if you do get in trouble. Looking vulnerable is also a problem because statistics say that men are more likely to attack women that look vulnerable.

Listening to initial instincts is also important. If you aren't sure about the situation that you are in then don't stay there. If someone doesn't look like they can be trusted then get away from them. Miss Phelps remarked that many of the girls who get in trouble will often say that they knew the guy "looked funny". If this is the case, Miss Phelps says that the best decision is just to get away.

Dating a new person also puts you at risk. When dating someone for the first time, she advises not going out alone until you know eachother better and when you do go out it is wise to stay in public places. Double dating or going out with a group is also a good idea, but you should always be sure that someone you know will be there. "Gang rapes are not unheard of," she says.

The lecture then turned to questions and a number of students took the opportunity to ask questions about situations that they were unsure of. The effects of alcohol, dressing a certain way, and stopping a seeming uncontrollable situation were all areas that the students addressed.

To Ms. Phelps, the effects of alcohol and the way you dress are not excuses for rape. She used an example to illustrate her point. she asked that if a someone was walking down the street and money was hanging out of their pocket and you see it, is it your right to take it? "Do you have the right to take it just because you can see it?" Ms. Phelps strongly declared that the answer was no. She declared that even if someone was walking naked, that does not give someone else the right to touch or take what they wanted. Only consent gives that right.

Ms. Phelps explained that the only way to save yourself from possible rape charges is to ask the person for consent before continuing. She also said that when you do say no make sure the other person knows that you mean no. "Don't compromise yourself". She said that in such a situation where things are going a bit farther then you would like and your partner is not listening to you when you will say no then don't hesitate to get violent or make noise by yelling or banging on the wall. "You'll get over the embarrassment of causing a scene a lot quicker then you will get over the trauma of being raped" she said.

To help those in the room Ms. Phelps gave some characteristics of those people that may be likely to be abusive. Those characteristics include people who are particularly loud and obnoxious, particularly all of the time, and also someone who frequently abuses other things, such as animals and furniture.

Ms. Phelps stressed that the center was there to provide assistance at any time. The number at the center is 820-5600 and those that need any kind of help are encouraged to call.

Ecotopian Society formed at W.C.

A new organization has been formed on campus. The official name of this organization is the WASHINGTON COLLEGE ECOTOPIAN SOCIETY. The Ecotopian Society is an environmental organization. It includes students from all majors and from all class levels, from freshman to graduate. There were about 15 students in attendance and several "guests" (non-students) at the organizational meeting on March 4. students in attendance at the second meeting on March 20. A third meeting was held on April 8th.

The word "ecotopian" is a combination of ecology and utopia. It is defined as a place and a philosophy where humans live in harmony with nature and the laws of humans and nature are one. Its roots can be traced back to Thomas Jefferson and Jeffersonian philosophy, and even to the ancient Greeks. The Washington College Ecotopian Society is for those students interested in environmental issues and concerns as well as preservation of our heritage and natural resources.

At the organizational meeting held on March 4, in the Dunning Lecture Hall, the constitution was approved and the officers were elected. In addition, there were discussions concerning what the primary focus of the organization should be and what kind of activities the Society should sponsor or participate in.

The following people were elected as officers:

President- Dave Searles, GR, History-Social Studies major; Vice President- Tamy B. Hickman, JR, Biology major; Secretary- Martie Smith, FR, German major; Treasurer- Sally Haynsworth, SO, Psychology major. The faculty advisor is Dr. Donald Munson, Chair of the Biology Department.

At the second meeting held on March 20, Kris Wallenberg, SR, Biology-Philosophy major applied for and was appointed as the Publicity Coordinator. Michelle Darling, SR, Political Science major, has been and will continue to be helping out with publicity and promotion. Since the issue of campus recycling and environmental awareness is going to be a major focus the Ecotopian Society, Patti Karnes, has been appointed Campus Recycling Coordinator. She will be working with Student Affairs and the RAs in coordinating campus recycling efforts.

The organization is still seeking two people to serve as coordinators for programs and for field trips. The three coordinator positions, publicity, programs, and field trips, are appointed by the Executive Board and approved by the member-

The Cater Walk and other Washington College trends

The Cater Walk, formerly the fire lane. The long expanse of brick we have come to hold so dear. And yes, they've chosen to adore it with a bronze plaque officially deeming it the "Cater Walk." Smith had a classroom building named after him, Cain got the gymnasium, and Gibson got the Fine Arts building, and Cater gets...the Fire lane.

Perhaps it's only appropriate. After all, it was during his last year in office that the student body had the honor of walking around the fire lane, instead of on it. (Do we see a trend here?) And the massive reforestation that over took Washington College this year was foreshadowed by the rush to plant landscaping on either side of the newly completed fire lane before parents and alums arrived for graduation. Washington College is full of such trends. But with the plaque up, the bulk of the construction is, hopefully, finished, and the College can get down to building what really matters, its Academic Program. The results from the State of the Major surveys will be in soon, and if they are anything like last years, the majority of majors will be asking for additional faculty.

The perfect monument to Cater would be a brick, resting in a tree-lined mud puddle. He rebuilt Washington College on the outside. Come on, President Trout, rebuild it on the inside.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

If you enjoyed Echo Hill, or just want to help out, Hands Out has more activities planned. See page 4.

1991 PEGASUS

Yearbookers go north of the border

By Renée King

On Wednesday, April 3, four members of the 1991 Washington College Pegasus staff ventured north to Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, the site of the yearbook's printing company, Herff Jones. Sue Czechowski, Kevin Decker, Heather Scholtz, and Renée King, editor-in-chief, visited the yearbook plant in order to see first-hand how the yearbook is manufactured. In the plant, workers convert photos, words, and layout sheets covered with squares into the pages we ultimately see.

The path from layout sheet to yearbook page is a long one. First, all of the copy (the words you read in the book) is proofread and typeset electronically in the style and size type desired. It is proofread again to make sure it will fit on the layout, and a final copy is printed out, to be pasted up with the photos and graphic elements later.

All photos that arrive at the plant are sent to the camera screening area, where they are scanned for density of dark and light areas. They are then rephotographed and printed at the size we request. Any color photographs are reshot with black and white film. This is why all photos return to us unharmed; what is seen in the yearbook is actually a picture of a picture.

Once the words and photos are ready, everything is sent to the paste-up area. This is where all of the elements of the page come together. All graphics, such as screens, lines, and artwork, are pasted down first, then the photos and copy. At this point the page essentially looks like it will appear in the book.

When a complete signature (sixteen consecutive pages) is pasted up, it is photographed and turned into one huge negative. The images on this negative are then burned into a very thin sheet of metal. This is the plate that will be used to print the actual yearbook pages.

The next step is printing. Sixteen pages are printed at a time, eight on each side of a piece of paper. If a page is black and white it only needs to be run through the presses once. If the photos on the page are color it is run through four times, once each for red, yellow, blue, and black ink. These colors blend together to make every color needed for the photographs. Additional runs through the presses may be necessary if the page contains special graphic colors such as burgandy, turquoise, or neon colors.

After the pages are printed (sixteen on one large piece of paper) they are cut apart and intricatelly folded to form a 16-page booklet. Any number of these booklets are bound together to make the yearbook. When the pages are all bound together, the endsheets are sewn on and then glued to the cover. The book is then ready to be shipped.

While we were at the Gettysburg plant we found our yearbook in the corner of the bindery. At that point the 1991 Pegasus lacked only a cover. All estimates indicate that the book will be here by the end of April. New for this year's Pegasus are 16 additional pages, including 8 more color pages and a Dorms section. These additions bring the size of the book up to 144 pages, making it one of the largest books in the last 10 years. The addition of color to the Student Life section is something that has never been done before, and we think it adds a new dimension to the section. The opening section also remains in color, but with the addition of some burgandy backgrounds and artwork. The Faculty section layout also received an overhaul after remaining the same for three years. Overall, the staff is proud to say that they have produced one of the best books in recent years. Remember, the Pegasus will be here soon, so keep your eyes open for its arrival!

Renée King is a Senior Biology major who edits the Pegasus when she is not in the lab or counting the days until Graduation (37). Ask her about Bill, the waiter at the General Lee.

OUTLOOK

In the world: Gorbachev proposes anti-crisis program

Iraq:

In the midst of U.S. withdrawal from the region, Iraqi army deserters and civilian refugees have begun begging to be taken prisoner to escape what they predict will be a bloody new crackdown by President Saddam Hussein's forces. The number of U.S. troops stationed in southerned Iraq has been greatly reduced in the last few days. As a result, Iraqi forces are reported to be moving into the area for the first time since late February when it came under the control of 100,000 American soldiers. U.S. troops have reported some isolated instances of Reupblican Guard troops actually entering U.S.-occupied territory only to leave when confronted by U.S. force. U.S. soldiers manning checkpoints here described scenes of Iraqis pleading to be taken prisoner. Many of the would be prisoners are not soldiers, but civilians posing as soldiers to become prisoners and escape from Iraq. These people are turned away because they lack the credentials to prove they were active-duty Iraqi soldiers. U.S. troops have also said that Iraqi truck drivers are benefiting from the situation by charging high fees to shuttle people to American checkpoints, where they have attempted to surrender en masse.

UNITED STATES:

The idea of establishing enclaves in Iraq to protect the hundreds of thousands of refugees fleeing from Hussein's forces was rejected by the Bush administration Tuesday. Instead, priority was given to organizing up to $200 million in additional humanitarian aid. According to senior U.S. officials, the establishment of a safe zone in northern Iraq under the auspices of the U.N. to serve as a haven for Kurds as well as other refugees would cause major political and diplomatic problems. They went on to say that they did not want to divert attention from the need to provide humanitarian aid to the refugees. The idea for the safe zone was suggested by Defense Secretary Dick Cheney on Sunday, but the administration reconsidered after Iraq expressed fierce opposition to the idea, which could lead the U.S. to use force to protect the enclaves. Iraqi Prime Minister Saddoun Hammadi charged that the idea had been "engineered by the CIA" and vowed that "Iraq will resist it with all means."

SOVIET UNION:

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbatchev proposed an "anti-crisis" program Wednesday in the face of national economic collapse and widespread calls for his resignation. The program includes a tougher Kremlin stance toward rebellious Soviet republics and a moratorium on political demonstrations and labor strikes. "Our statehood and federation are endangered," Gorbachev told leaders of the Soviet republics in an impassioned address later telecast to the antion. "The economy is coming apart. The institutions of power are paralyzed. The very foundations of our lives are endangered...We must put aside our feuds and prevent the country from sliding into catastrophe." He went on to say that the danger of economic disaster "with all its consequences" requires immediate action, and he called for a stiffening of law and order and demanded that the country's 15 constituent republics fulfill all constitutional obligations to the central government in Moscow. He said any republic that refused to honor state contracts for production and distribution of goods would be guilty "of robbery, and we will put an end to this." Adding that the traditional chain of government command emanating outward from Moscow, "must be restored." A number of Soviet republics, including the three Baltic states, have claimed that contracts violate their sovereignty.

It is as yet unclear as to how Gorbachev plans to implement his proposals.

Hands Out: Last Spring Events

The first project will ivolve painting a barn for Camp Fairlee Manor, a summer camp for mentally and physically handicapped kids. The event will be divided into three, two and a half hour shifts starting at 9 am. Participants are asked to meet in the Bill Smith Parking Lot one half hour before their shift starts, and are encouraged to bring their own transportation if possible. Snacks will be provided throughout the day. Sign-ip will start in the Dining Hall on Monday, April 15.

The second event will involve planting trees around Kent County in honor of Earth Day. The sign-up date has already passed, but if you are interested, please leave your name and number in the Hands-Out mail box located in Central Services. People who have signed up already will receive information in the mail sometime next week.

The last two Hands-Out projects, Echo Hill and Habitat for Humanity have been tremendous successes. Help keep the spirit joings by joining the fun on Saturday. In the last few weeks of this semester, Hands Out will be planning for Fall 1991. If you would like to become more involved, or have any suggestions, come to the next Hands Out meeting or leave your name in the Hands Out mailbox, and we will get in touch with you. Thank You.

Poetry in motion, a women's lacrosse team profile

Phil "Slice" Macek

If you walk the "stairway to heaven" and cross the train tracks you'll soon find yourself in the knock-down, drag-out, slam bang, live on the razor's edge, laugh in the face of death world of Division III women's lacrosse. For women's lacrosse is a fast moving game of graceful, fluid motion that emphasizes finesse more than brute force; it's just the players, the ball, and their sticks-man to man, or in this case woman to woman. Thus, each game (if such a struggle to the death can be called a game) becomes a contest of stamina and endurance with the winner being determined by adroit stickwork, agile body positioning, and quick legs. I cannot underestimate the amount of endurance needed to play women's lacrosse, because quite simply, the field has no boundaries. That's right, there are no designated markers for an out of bounds area; the game can go anywhere at anytime and it's perfectly legal. In fact, one time I was in the Kent County public library reading my favorite Dr. Seuss book, If I Ran the Circus, when I got thrown through a glass panel window by two girls who had entered the library while fighting for possession of a loose ball. Every day I count my blessings that I "escaped" with only multiple abrasions and lacerations, three cracked ribs, a punctured lung, a ruptured spleen, a separated shoulder, two dislocated fingers, a skinned knee, a mild concussion, and a temporary case of whiplash. The doctor says I should be out of my bodycast within a year and that I won't have to eat strained food for too much longer. But that's why I keep coming back to this great game. I love the excitement, the danger, and the risk of getting killed by two girls wielding their hickory-carved sticks like battle axes while they battle to the death for control of a little white rubber ball. So with the delicate nature of women's lacrosse firmly intact, let's take a closer look at some of Washington College's wonder women who have built a nationally reputed program that any school would be proud to call their own.

First off, we have the focal point of the offense and the team's leading goal scorer, Sarah Coste. No defense ever conceived on heaven or earth can stop Sarah when she sets her sights on the goal (which is often). She overpowers her weaker, slower opponents with blinding quickness, using the nimble footwork of a skilled ballet dancer to outmaneuver the goalie and leave herself with an easy, uncontested shot at the goal.

Another potent weapon in the Shorewomen attack is sophomore Sam Clements. Sam scores with the frequency of a horny millionaire on hookers' row and usually makes her defender look silly while doing so. She bounds down the field with long, graceful strides, scooping up errant loose balls and converting them into goals. Her blistering shots have left many goalies completely dumbfounded and in dire need of psychiatric help.

Senior tri-captain Amy Tiehel is another central figure of the Shorewomen attack. Amy plays with all the compassion of a rabid pit bull. She stalks her sorry opponents with a relentless desire to leave them humiliated and eating her dust. A key component in the transition game, Amy turns defensive steals into fastbreak goals for the maroon and black. Amy is so fast (at bedtime she can turn off the lights and be under the covers before the room gets dark) that she leaves her defenders behind as if they were standing in quicksand. This prolific scorer is one of the best W.C. has ever put on the field, and the team, as well as Dr. Gillin, will be sad to see her graduate.

Senior star Erin O' Neal plays with the fierce tenacity of a Great White shark once it smells the blood of injured prey in the water. A woman possessed, Erin has been a clutch performer for the Shorewomen for her entire four years here. A kicking ass and taking names defenseman (sorry, defense person), Erin derives no better thrill from the game than seeing her opponent groveling in the dirt, shamelessly crying for mercy.

Another senior tri-captain for the Shorewomen, Lee Anne Ledwin provides the backbone for a defense that is relentless, unforgiving, and damn near impossible to score upon. Constantly walking that fine line between genius and insanity, Lee Anne is a defensive wizard who has stolen more passes from the enemy's offense than Phil Tom Jackson stole dollars from the S.G.A. A complete player with no discernible weaknesses, Lee Anne has fantastic field vision and possesses a razor sharp knack for knowing where the ball is at all times. A vicious defensive specialist, Lee Anne always commands respect from her opponents and is a formidable part of the team's "steel curtain" defense.

Last, but certainly not least, stands the final tri-captain of this stingy Shorewomen team, senior Donna "speed of light" White. Donna covers the field like a cheap suit; at once playing gut-wrenching, dominating defense, then using her her sprinter's speed to race the ball down the field and fire a white-hot shot at an unsuspecting goalie who doesn't stand a prayer of coming up with the save. Playing with the perfect balance of surgeon-like control and funky, reckless abandon, #38 consistently beats her opponent like a rented mule and usually leads the team onto victory.

Thus, win or lose, the ultimate thrill (at least for me) is watching everything click and seeing the players move the ball down the field with the spontaneous rhythm of improvisational jazz musicians in a groove. It is here where the graceful and fluid motion of the game takes center stage, and the whole scene takes on the look of a well choreographed ballet. So ladies, here's a toast that your losses be few and your victories many; and keep on going for the gold, because Lord knows you deserve it.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC. If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive,™ which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself. It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Lacrosse trips Roanoke

By Matt Giller

Men's Lax tripsWith their backs against the wall, the Shoremen went down to Salem, Va. to do what they have to do for the remainder of the regular season, and that is win.

The WAC attack outscored Roanoke in the first half 4-1 enroute to an 8-7 shaving of the home team.

Kevin Knox, who likes to play in Virginia (8 goals at Hampden-Sydney), powered the offense with four goals and an assist. Senior midfielder Greg Rupert netted two of his own while sophomore middie Jed Cronin and freshman creaseman Dan Cooper each tallied one to round out the WAC scoring.

The scoreboard, however, told only part of the story. The Shoremen dominated every statistic last Saturday. Senior netminder Dave Slomkowski outsaved his counterpart Steve Mason 18-9. Sophomore Blair Muneses, the Shoremen's faceoff specialist, won 11 of 15 (the WAC won 11 of 19 total). Another key stat that the Sho' men dominated was the groundballs - 41 to Roanoke's 29. The only statistic that Roanoke had the edge in was shots taken- 42-29.

The WAC faceoff tomorrow against always scrappy Franlin and Marshall at home. Starting time: 1:30. The WAC's schedule gets extremely difficult the rest of the way. They faceoff against seventh ranked Washington and Lee next Saturday and second ranked Sea Gulls of Salisbury State the following Saturday to end their regular season schedule.

The Washington College tennis team is definitely a force to reckoned with. That is what they should be saying after the WAC slayed the Garnets of Swarthmore 5-4 last Wednesday in Pennsylvania.

Sophomores Trevor Hurd and Alberto Diaz won the deciding match at third doubles, 7-5, 7-5.

The only other time the Shoremen defeated the Garnets was in 1987 when last years singles national champ, Larry Gewer, was a freshman at the WAC.

The concluding match was an exciting one all the way through. With the sun gone down and the Diaz/Hurd tandem up a set, the match had to be settled indoors in Swarthmore's field house. Swarthmore was serving for the second set at 5-3 when the slashing sophomores brokeserve and never looked back.

The Shoremen were on their way to making this a laugher as they jumped out to a 3-0 lead behind singles wins from Scott Read, Irakli Metreveli and Hurd.

Read barely broke a sweat enroute to a 6-1, 6-2 thrashing of the Garnets #1 man.

Metreveli could have played with his opposite hand in his match as he toyed with his opponent during his 6-2, 6-2 drubbing.

Hurd showed no mercy serving his way to a 6-1, 6-1 delousing of his Garnet foe.

Emilio Bogado was upset at five singles, 6-1, 6-2. However, Carlos Nuno won in a nail-biter, 7-5, 6-4.

Diaz took the first set in his singles match, 7-6, but faltered, 6-0, 6-2.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Drinking at Washington College

by Bruce Hamilton

Those interested in traditional theater may be somewhat shocked by the confrontational nature of Eric Bogosian's "Drinking in America", to be performed at Washington College on April 18, 19 and 20. A performance artist/ actor as well as a writer and social critic, Bogosian says the point of his work is "to get the audience to feel right there, front row center". Bogosian performed in Shakespearian productions during his college career and moved to New York in 1975, where he became part of the art scene of SoHo. He became disinterested in traditional theater and began building his artistic vision and style, typically monolouge-based pieces with wild characters.

Bogosian performed a one-man show in a 1982 New York Shakespeare Festival and has since enjoyed relative success. His shows, "Drinking in America" and "FunHouse" have both received Obies, as well as other awards. The recently successful movie, "Talk Radio", directed by Oliver Stone, was based on Bogosian's stage play. The success of the movie was largely due to Bogosian's performance as the radio DJ (modeled after Alan Berg).

"Drinking in America" is a collection of monologues with varied formats. There are standard street-raps from street characters, bums, and jive artists. There are TV evangelists, Disc Jockeys, and commercials. All of these have intense characters with attitudes, and the audience inevitably becomes a part of the performance in each one. Jason Imber says of one of his characters, "he's like those radical preachers you seen on Sunday mornings- they tell you to do a lot of things in the name of God, but it's really a whole lot of nonsense." Dale Daigle, who will be directing "Drinking", says that the characters "all represent people on the fringes of society. People who we forget about and shouldn't."

Essentially a commentary on contemporary America, "Drinking" is, according to Brett Lankford, "radically different from anything I've ever done before because all the emotive energy has to come from within and the audience, rather than interacting with others on stage." Senior Clay Eichelberger says, "I think the show has a really effective way of dealing with the problems of America. It deals with serious issues in ways that are both unsettling and funny at the same time."

"Drinking in America" contains some explicit language and mature themes. A collection of monologues written between 1984 and 1988, the show promises to have incredible energy. Director Daigle said of the show, "it helps to remind us of certain parts of our society that we need to understand and deal with." In this sense, the theater becomes (in typical Bogosian style) a medium for social commentary that goes face-to-face with the audience.

Seating will be on-stage, and reservations are required. For reservations, call 778-2800, extension 269. The show includes senior Cindy Croot as Co-Director, Shan Driscoll as Lighting Designer, and Beth Skinner as the Stage Manager. Actors in "Drinking" are: Tim Madison, Peter Johnson, Brett Lankford, Doug Peterson, Jason Imber, Jeff Daly, Clay Eichelberger, Ed Schroeder, Jason West and Bruce Hamilton.

"Drinking in America" will be performed on Thursday, April 18 at 8 p.m., as well as Friday and Saturday at the same time in Tawes Theater. Admission is free, and the public is encour-

Orioles stadium model shown

A model of the Camden Yards stadium, to become the home of the Baltimore Orioles next baseball season, will be on display at the Casey Academic Center at Washington College Saturday, April 13 from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Representatives of the Maryland Stadium Authority will be on hand to explain the model and to answer questions about the new stadium, which has been acclaimed for its old-style stadium design and its incorporation of the historic Camden Yards warehouse building of the old B&O railroad.

The exhibit is timed to coincide with several sports and special events on campus. Those coming to the college for the 12:30 dedication of the college's new tennis courts followed by the men's tennis match against Johns Hopkins University, the 1:30 p.m. men's lacrosse games versus Franklin and Marshall College, and the 4 p.m. talk with Tersh Boasberg on preserving Manassas Battlefield, may want to stop by the Casey Academic Center for a look at Maryland's new baseball stadium.

Manassas Battlefield saved from shopping mall

by Jen Grindle

This Saturday afternoon you can hear about the "Third Battle of Manassas." Not the two battles fought with guns and bullets at Manassas, Virginia during the Civil War, but the battle of politics and public opinion that stopped a shopping mall from ruining the battlefield site just a few years ago.

On a summer afternoon almost 130 years ago, the genteel of Washington, D.C. jaunted thirty miles southwest into the Virginia countryside to Manassas Junction near Bull Run stream, to watch Union forces quell the army of the secessionist South. When it was over, the spectators fled with the routed Union army, knowing the dispute between North and South would not be decided in a single encounter. In 1990, Manassas battlefield was once again embroiled in a battle for survival: the battle to preserve a national historic landmark from developers who wanted to build a regional shopping mall on edge of the battlefield.

In his lecture "Lessons from Manassas" on Saturday, preservation attorney Tersh Boasberg will discuss the strategies used to finally save Manassas by an act of Congress. In particular, Boasberg was responsible for bringing Civil War historian James McPherson, who will be at Washington College on April 17, to testify before Congress in order to win the support of several influential Congressmen. Congress responded first by refusing interstate highway funds for an I-66 connection to the proposed shopping mall, and finally by acquiring the last unprotected quadrant of Manassas in 1988.

But Manassas is only a case study of the imminent danger to many of our national Civil War sites. As Boasberg wrote in an April 1990 article for The Washington Post, the increasing expansion of urban areas is threatening unprotected sites near Washington, throughout the east, and even into the west. Boasberg calls for a United States Civil War Sites Commission, which would survey the threatened sites and then take steps to initiate guidelines to protect them. The proposed commission should be composed of powerful, influential people, including Congressmen, governors, historians, leaders of Civil War organizations, and "enlightened" developers. Working with local governments and non-profit organizations, the commission would demonstrate how to preserve sites in an era when soaring land prices make purchase difficult.

Tersh Boasberg is a Senior Partner in the law firm Boasberg & Norton which specializes in land use and historic preservation law, and is the 1989 recipient of the National Preservation Honor Award from the National Trust for Historic Preservation. He received his undergraduate degree from Yale University magna cum laude, and his law degree from Harvard University. Mr. Boasberg is one of the founders of the National Center for Preservation Law and also Preservation Action, a national grassroots preservation and conservation lobbying organization. He has been a speaker on many occasions and has authored several books and articles about preservation law.

"Lessons from Manassas" is presented by the Washington College Historical Society and is co-sponsored by The Goldstein Program in Public Affairs, The McLain Fund, The Ecotopian Society, and the Student Government Association. The Washington College Historical Society, formed in the Fall of 1990 for the purpose of preserving the cultural and historical resources of the region, hopes to sponsor other speakers and trips to historic sites in the future to further educate the community in preservation. Anyone from the student body or the community who is interested in becoming a member may contact President Pam Feeney, Vice-President Jenifer Grindle, or Secretary/Treasurer Cynthia Slaby for information.

Tersh Boasberg's lecture will be held Saturday, April 13, 1991 in Norman James Theater at 4:00 p.m. A reception will follow immediately in the Common Room of the Casey Academic Center. Everyone is invited to attend.

Jen Grindle is a Junior.

The Mad Hatter Spring Spoof

Comic and light-hearted music will be the theme of the Washington College Community Chorus' Spring Concert, "The Mad Hatter's Spring Spoof," set for Friday, April 12 at 8 p.m. in the Tawes Theater of the Gibson Performing Arts Center. The chorus, directed by Assistant Professor of Music Kathleen Mills, will perform music by P.D.Q. Bach, Garry E. Clarke, Irving Fine and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. In addition, the lobby of the theater will be transformed into "Café Gibson" and will be open from 7 to 8 p.m. for a "Mad Hatter's Tea Party," featuring sweets by pastry chefs Cynthia and Victor Fields-Bélanger. Admission to the concert is free and pastries, teas and coffee will be available for a small fee.

The theme of the concert comes from three settings of Lewis Carroll texts from Alice in Wonderland, "The Lobster Quadrille," "Lullaby of the Duchess" and "Father William," by contemporary American composer Irving Fine. Other works in the program include "Epitaphs" by Washington College Professor of Music Garry E. Clarke, a vocal adaptation of the overture to the Mozart opera The Magic Flute, and "The Seasonings," an oratorio by P.D.Q. Bach (1807-1742), the youngest of the Bach sons, whose works were sadly neglected until their discovery by Professor Schickele.

Soloists in the oratorio will be J.S. Edward Tatnall, John McDanolds, Diane Landskroener, Meredith Davies, Marcia Landskroener, Kathleen Bennett, Jasper Hopper and John Farr. Instrumentalists include Denise Carlson and Melissa Strick, violin, Sally McGee, cello, Maria Jerardi and Carl Pupa, keyboards, and Capt. Meredith Davies, foghorn.

Anyone who may be interested in more information and/or wants to apply for one of the two positions that are still open, programs coordinator or field trips coordinator, may contact Dave Searles, President (758-3932) or Martie Smith, Secretary.

Also, at the organizational meeting, it was decided that the Ecotopian Society would cooperate and work with its sister organizations, the Washington College Historical Society and the Washington College Anthropological Society. The Ecotopian Society will co-sponsor with the Historical Society, the main sponsor, a speaker on Saturday, April 13, at 4 P.M., in the Norman James Theatre. The speaker will be the eminent Washington lawyer Tersh Boasberg, known nationally for his specialization in historic preservation, environmental and land-use law.

For those students that are still interested in joining the Ecotopian Society, please call Dave Searles at 758-3932 or leave a note with Dave or Martie Smith, in the campus mail to request a membership form. In the future, if you wish to be notified of upcoming meetings, programs, and activities, you will need to have a membership form on file.

Whether it was the disco ball or the appetizing food which... made Alvin push his dining hall tray away, Jump onto the cafeteria table & break out into Song—No one will ever Know.... But his song was a mournful farewell cry of a graduating senior. (there can be no doubt about that) Dedicated to one of the most vital & important people during his four years of higher education at the WAC.
[And it has a real catchy tune - Kinda like the Polices "Roxsanne"] And this is how it went'...
Proooocs — MAN! You don't have to Step on the brake light, Those days are over You don't have to sell your Pizzzas in to the night....
Proocs - MAN! You don't have to wear that apron tonight,
Walk Minta Martin for money - you don't care if its 11:00 or Past mid-Night!
And it was the most beautiful Sight ever witnessed in the WAC dining hall. Every Single senior lifted up there lighters and started swaying to Alvin's touching tune!

More construction planned for W.C. this summer

By: Susie Mazzullo

Many changes for the future of the Washington College campus are being planned now that the school year is coming to a close. Summer construction projects will soon be underway.

Students returning to campus next semester will see more changes to the campus that they call home for most of the year. Summer projects will st starting at the end of this semester. Mr. Clint Baer, Director of Planning & Special Projects, says that this will be the end of the site work. Although some more landscaping and clean up will probobly still need to be done at the beginning of the fall semester, the majority of the projects will be complete or well underway.

A number of projects designed to beautify the campus have been completed in the past years. These include a number of renovations such as those done to the selected dorms and to Dunning.

A number of additions have also been made to the campus. These include the Cardinal dorms, the Casey Swim Center, the Constance Stuart Larrabee Arts Center, the brick crosswalk by the Hill dorms, the loop behing kent and the Cullen dormitories. Eight new intercollegiate tennis courts were also installed behing the Cardinal dorms last semester. A multitude of landscaping and planting of plants and trees has also taken place recently.

The most recent project to be completed on campus is that of the building of the Academic Resource Center. This project was made possible by the generosity of the Casey Family, especially, Betty Brown Casey.

Projects for this summer include the building of a parking lot that will be located next to Kibler Field and adjacent to Cecil, Dorchester, and Talbot dormitories. The parking lot will have spaces for approximately 125 vehicles. previously on the site was a house that was just recently removed.

The house, previously on the lot, has been donated to the town of Chestertown and will be used for low income housing. Foundations are in the process of being prepared for the house. When they are complete, the town will move the house to the site in Washington Park. Clint Baer describes the project as "habitat like" that involves the cooperation of both the town and the college.

The major project that the school will be taking on will be located on the south of campus between Ferguson and Decker Science Center. Smith parking lot will be demolished and a large pedestrian mall will be put in its place complete with green grass and a brick walk way leading up to the Academic Resource Center. "It's a rare campus that takes out asphalt and puts in grass," said Baer.

Along with the large pedestrian mall will be a small parking lot that will have approximately twenty spaces.

The project is scheduled to begin immediately following graduation ceremonies in May and will be complete by the time students return to school in the fall. Some landscaping will still need to be done but the major work will be complete at that time.

The second major project to be started this summer will be the beginning of the Banjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, also known as the Field House. The ground breaking ceremonies were held this past December.

The site of the center will be next to the gym where the old tennis courts used to be. They have since been moved. The new facility is anticipated see Construction, page 8.

The ARC:

Cable and T.V.'s in dorms

President Charles H. Trout has approved the installation of cable service in all College dormitories.

Based on the recommend of the Student Government Association, cable service will be installed in a lounge of each dormitory on campus. The President also authorized the purchase of televisions for certain lounges. Dormitories to receive cable and television sets are nta Martin, Reid, Caroline, Queen Anne, Kent and Somerset. Cable service only will be provided for East, West and Middle Halls and Cecil, Dorchester and Talbot Houses, all of which now have television sets hooked to this service.

Cable service also will be available in the Hodson Hall Student Center and the Casey Academic Center. Says President Trout: "We are happy to be able to provide students with access to cable service and finally to achieve successful negotiations with Simmons on a workable relationship." At each location, the College will subscribe to the regular Simmons offering, which includes the major networks, ESPN, CNN, TBS and MTV. No premium channels will be offered.

While a recent SGA poll suggested that students would like to have cable service available to all dormitory rooms, the College administration has ruled that out as economically unfeasible. Clint Baer, Director of Planning, stated that "the College has received proposals from different companies that range from $150,000 to $200,000, dependent on the various options."

In the meantime, Elizabeth R. Baer, Provost and Dean of the College, is conducting an academic review of the uses of a cable network and a campus satellite dish. The Academic Council will also explore how this technology might support the curriculum.

The majority of the T.V.'s are already in place. Clint Baer stated that the cable will be installed as Simmons Cable Company has the time to service the college.

EDITORIAL

And Georgia makes four...

Georgia, in response to Mikhail Gorbachev's speech last week, became the fourth Soviet republic to declare its independence, following the three Baltic States. This puts both Gorbachev and our own government in a difficult position.

For Gorbachev, it indicates that the attempts to limit nationalist sentiment, both through speeches and the crack down in the Baltic States of Latvia and Lithuania, have failed, and the Soviet government needs to find a new solution to its ethnic problems. There are 120 ethnic groups in the Soviet Union. By the end of last year, all 15 republics were asking for sovereignty, now four want independence. It is clear that the Soviet Union, as we know it, doesn't have much of a chance to stay together peacefully.

For President Bush, the Georgian declaration of independence is yet another chance to extend recognition to these breakaway republics. Such an action would send a message to the Soviet Government that the potential foreign aid of the U.S. is tied to political reform, human rights, and civil liberties. So far, the president has avoided such an action, hiding behind the belief that helping the independence-minded Baltic States, and other nationalist movements, could bring down the Soviet government. This would leave the Soviet nuclear arsenal vulnerable. Well, it looks like the republics are doing a fine job of breaking up the Union without any assistance from the United States. If President Bush is so committted to democracy, maybe it's time the U.S. backed someone else a little more committed to reform, and a little less committed to preserving the Union.

This Saturday: The Last Hands Out Projects of the Year!
Don't miss the Fun!

Saturday April 20th Hands Out needs volunteers to help paint a barn for Camp Fairlee Manor, a summer camp for physically and mentally handicap individuals. The day will be divided into three two and a half hour shifts- 9 - 11:30, 11:30 - 2, and 2 - 4:30. Participants are asked to please meet in the Bill Smith parking lot one half hour before their shift starts. Transportation can be arranged, however, individuals are encouraged to provide their own if possible. Since we will be painting, wear old clothes. Food and drinks will be made available through out the day. Even if you did not already sign-up - all are welcome!

In addition to the barn painting project, Hands Out has already had several faculty members sign-up to help plant trees also on Saturday in honor of Earth Day. While the deadline for signing up has past, if you are especially interested in planting trees, arrangements can still be made. Call 778-9121 for information.

OUTLOOK

In the World: U.S. expands aid to Kurdish refugees

Iraq: U.S. Expands Relief Effort to the Kurds and Germany Helps in Initiative

In a push to create a more ambitious relief effort for the Kurdish rebels that have fled to neighboring Turkey and Iran, Bush announced this week that U.S. military forces would move into Northern Iraq with the purpose of establishing camps to provide food, clothing, and shelter for the hundreds of thousands of Kurdish refugees that have massed in this area to escape Saddam Hussein's forces. Ironically, Bush, less than a week ago rejected the formal establishment of such zones of safety, and limited his policy to humanitarian aid through air lifts. The Bush administration's change of heart, in its decision to set up relief camps, is a response to growing public criticism of their relatively neutral stance toward the Kurdish refugee as callous or inhumane. The President, after trying to contain relief efforts to the Iraq-Turkey border, acknowledged that this assistance was inadequate; increased U.S. involvement in the aid operation will commit another 5,000-10,000 troops in addition to the several thousand already mobilized.

Germany, who had remained very quiet throughout the Gulf War, has also taken some new initiatives in dealing with the refugee problem. Germany did not join in the Gulf War because Chancellor Kohl contended that the nation's constitution forbids military participation in areas outside NATO territory. As is the new U.S. aid effort, the new German initiative is "part humanitarian response and part political effort". Criticism of the moderate German role in the crisis has prompted that country's government to triple its emergency aid relief to Iraqi refugees. On Monday the European Community adopted German Foreign Minister Hans-Deitrich Genscher's proposal to have Hussein tried by an international war crimes tribunal for his suppression of the Kurdish minority.

Israel: Middle East Peace Talks In Jeapordy Due to New West Bank Settlement

Eight new Jewish families moved into the occupied West Bank today as Secretary of State James Baker is trying to make headway on Israeli-Arab negotiations. Tension was in the air as the settlers moved into their trailer homes as earlier in the week, the army had been forced to disperse protesters who sought to prevent establishment of the site. Israeli Prime The new settlement is a point of contention as Minister Yitzhak Shamir had assured Bush that Israel was not intending to add to its 150 settlements in the occupied territories and this is the first one built in a year. Many U.S. officials and Arab leaders see this move as part of a new mass expansion and construction program, in the territories, on the part of the Israelis. Shamir maintains that the new site is of no consequence to potential a Middle-East peace conference as the territories will not be a factor Arab-Israeli negotiations.

Gorbachev's anti-crisis program sparks defiance in Georgia and Belorussia.

In a speech last week, Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev announced a new anti-crisis program designed to curb the growing political and economic unrest. Gorbachev called for a moratorium on strikes and more measures to stabilize the economy. But Gorbachev's speech was met by a declaration of independence from Georgia, the first republic outside of the three Balitc states to break with Moscow, and by a massive strike by workers in MInsk, the capital of the republic of Belorussia. Former President Richard Nixon visited the Soviet Union two weeks ago, and commented on the state of depression the Soviet Union is experiencing, as well as Gorbachev's shortcomings as a political leader.

In the first quarter of this year, the Soviet Government has accumulated a budget deficit of 4 billion rubles, largely due to a decrease in contributions from the republics. If strikes should continue, the government could lose billions more in revenues.

I, Phil "Slice" Macek, being of twisted mind and tortured body do hereby bequeath my estate to the following beneficiaries. These sentimental gestures of goodwill are to be distributed by my lawyer, Stephen L. Miles (we've talked about it), upon my graduation from Washington Prison ... er...College on May 19, 1991. So without further delay, let's name the following inheritors of my good fortune.

To Jeff Newell, I leave the gift of a third Senior year. I figure that you used your first Senior year to discover the fact that you actually had to do a thesis and the second year to come up with a topic. So Jeff, I leave you another year to actually write the thesis itself. I only wish I could be around to see you graduate next year. I know graduating from college has been a dream of yours ever since you used to fall asleep in high school.

To Scott Read, I leave the following tokens of esteem: a citation for perfect attendance to Dr. Fallaw's class and an exam that takes more than 15 minutes to finish. Plus, preseason rankings for both college football and college basketball teams so as you can determine which bandwagon to get on before the seasons actually start.

To the basketball team, I leave an entire season of games against Haplessford... er... Haverford. This should assure an undefeated dream season and should land the team a spot in the final four. I also leave my basketball head and cheerleader rater in the hopes that the team can pass them on the a dedicated fan who will put such "tools of the trade" to good use.

To Matt Petz and Greg Rupert, I bequeath the following gifts: first, a "rate your roommate" quiz that takes four years to complete. I also leave a golf cart with no stick seats that won't mark up your butts as you play naked golf around campus. Thirdly, I leave you an entry into the local look-alike contest for Nelson as well as spots in the next search to find a new Hans and Franz. Finally, I leave you with the enviable prize of lifetime membership subscriptions into the Sean Dunn fan club (complete with autographed depth-charts that were used in intramural football).

To Amy Tiehel, I leave my lifesize picture of Dr. Gillin, my prized pocketknife (it's broken anyway), and an open invitation to sunbathe on my roof anytime she so desires.

To Dr. Gillin, I leave my lifesize picture of Amy Tiehel, my personalized letter from Erik Estrada that I've had since fourth grade, and a chance to contend for the coveted title of Mr. Universe next year. I also leave all the cultural gaps that I haven't yet filled in.

To Jennifer Sponsellor and Jen Jaeger, I leave the possession I hold nearest and dearest to my heart: my sociology major legacy. I leave it to you budding young conflict theorists to carry the discipline of sociology (as we know it) to the threshold of greatness and to make Dr. Horne and Dr. Cades truly proud. I also leave, for inspiration, some of my most cherished sociological memorabilia, including my giant murals of Mighty Max Weber, Emile Durkheim, and Talcott Parsons; as well as the lifesize marble statue of Karl Marx. Gemeinschaft!!!

To the Suds-n-Soda guy, never mind I'll be back time and time again.

To Jeff Rexford, I leave a piece of my birthday cake (better eat it fast Jeff, it's getting kind of old), a pair of moth-eaten, canvas boxers that have yet to be washed and can cause severe chaffing if worn too long, a lifetime registration into Dr. Striner's class, and the distinction for bugging me the most about mentioning him in an article.

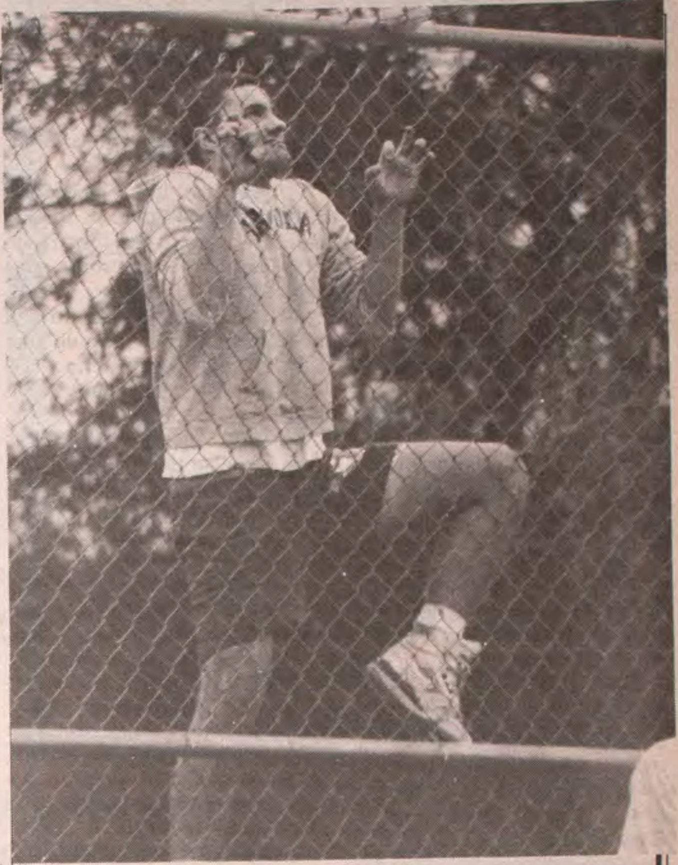
To Cardinal B, I leave the second place award for decorating (Cardinal F came in first, according to my unbiased reports).

To the high school seniors who are slaving away right now trying desperately to get in this school, I leave my condolences.

To the fool who takes over my spot on The Elm next year, I leave the hope that a cure will be found for whatever mental illness he or she is suffering from.

These are my gifts to the patrons of Washington Country Club...er...College. It is my sincere belief that these mementos will be used wisely and for the benefit of mankind. For I will always be watching this school to make sure my fortune will be used for intentions of goodness instead of badness. Finally, Washington High School...er...College, let me just say that my time served here has been quite enjoyable. I will always remember, at least until I forget, the places, people, and things that have been part of my college experience. So just remember Washington College (hey, I finally got it right), that while I go out and confront my future in the real world, the past has been bottled and labeled with love. And maybe one day when I'm rich and famous (or poor and obscure) I'll come back to this little college on the shore and give a lecture or something. I mean, who the hell knows anyway? I could end up a corporate raider on Wall Street (I can already Dr. Scout laughing over this one), a brain surgeon, a writer of greeting cards, a chef, a milkman, a television heartthrob on some soap opera, a trainer of seeing eye dogs, the shark feeder at an aquarium, a tattoo artist, a strength coach for the women's wrestling team from East Germany, the opening act for Don Rickles in Las Vegas, a pro basketball team mascot, or the latest New Kid on the Block. Since experiencing a liberal arts education at a school like this, one comes to realize that the doors of almost any future career are wide open. So here's hoping that my gifts are used wisely and benevolently and that Milwaukee's Best will remain the official beer of this school.

Slice is a graduating senior who never sees a movie without the word "cheerleader" in the title and has never spotted Dr. De Prospo down in the weight room. His idea of excitement is eating a cup of yogurt on the expiration date and not studying for Dr. Gillin quizzes.



Slice's will and testament surfaced after he met his fate during a freakish backstop acident.

Cooper's goal lifts WAC in sudden death

By Matt Giller

Last Saturday the Shoremen(3-5) hosted a classic see-saw game against Franklin and Marshall(5-7) that eventually saw the WAC prevail in sudden death 11-10.

Led by a balanced offensive attack and outstanding netminding by the senior captain Dave Slomkowski, the WAC led at halftime 7-3.

Sophomore middies Dave Lipinski and Jed Cronin netted two apiece, while Freshmen Gibby Seemes, Dan Cooper and Kevin Knox tallied one each in the first half.

However, the Dips scored 5 unanswered goals, 3 in the third and two in the fourth, to take an 8-7 lead. Cronin answered back; however, F&M took the lead 9-8 with under five minutes to play. Cronin and Senior Greg Rupert stung the Dips with two goals with under three minutes in regulation.

Slomkowski (22 saves), who received high grades from both coaches for his effort in the net, couldn'y deny F&M as they got one by the All-American with only 1:26 remaining.

In the sudden death period, faceoff specialist Blair Muneses (18-18 in draws) won the draw and raced up field where Rupert dished it to Cooper for the much-needed win.

The Shoremen put their playoff hopes on the line this Saturday when they host sixth ranked Washington & Lee(7-3), starting time: 1:30. The Shoremen have moved up in the polls to No. 9. The first eight teams go to the Division III playoffs. The WAC have left to play top ranked Salisbury State.

Senior Matt Petz leads a defense that will have to come to the forefront this weekend when the WAC hosts W&L. A victory Saturday keeps their NCAA hopes alive.

Women's Tennis extends streak

The Shorewomen tennis team took two last week to extend their unbeaten streak to ten games. They first bagelled Salisbury State 9-0 on Tuesday, and then MAC rival Elizabethtown, 7-2.

MATT GILLER

Collectively, the WAC only lost 12 games to the Sea Gulls of Salisbury in their sweep.

Tracy Peel, ranked second in the nation, trounced her opponent, 6-1, 6-3. At second singles, freshman Pam Hendrickson, had little trouble toying with her foe winning 6-2, 6-1. Miriam Dittman, playing at three singles, and Kristy Karns, at the five spot, each tarred and feathered the Gulls 6-0, 6-0.

Captain Rachel Rice showed no mercy as she drubbed her opponent 6-1, 6-2. At six singles, Michelle Root ran her opponent around during her 6-2, 6-0 thumping.

The action heated up, however, as Dittman and Rice played well to outlast their opponent at No. 1 doubles, 6-4, 4-6, 7-5. Karns and Jen Sloan bagelled a Gull at No. 2 and Root and Shriver were well on their way to mopping up when their opponents retired with the WAC leading in the first set 2-1.

With their huge win streak on the line last week, the WAC took on Elizabethtown, which was planned to be a tight one.

At No. 1, Peel did her thing by sweeping to a 6-3, 6-2 trouncing. After Hendrickson eased her way to a 7-5, 6-2 win she teamed up with Peel to win their tenth straight match, 6-3, 6-4. At fourth singles, Dittman swept 6-2, 6-2. The Dittman/Rice tandem (9-2 this spring), however, broke a sweat on their way to a three-set victory, 4-6, 6-4, 6-4.

Karns, in a key singles match in the sixth spot, trimmed her opponent 7-5, 6-4 and then teamed up with Sloan close out a three-set nailbiter, 7-5, 5-7, 6-2.

The Shorewomen play at Towson State today.

Matt Giller is a senior International Studies major who honed his craft of one-wall handball on 128st and 3rd Ave of the Bronx. After graduation he will turn his skill into big bucks.

Award-winning novelist gives reading

Marie-Claire Blais, a contemporary French-Canadian novelist, poet and playwright, will visit Washington College Wednesday, April 24 to give a reading from her fiction. The reading, which will be in English, is set for 5 p.m., in the Sophie Kerr room of Miller Library. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

Marie-Claude Blais made a sensational entrance to the Canadian literary world at the age of 17 with the publication of her novel La Belle Bete, which she describes as "an adolescent nightmare.. about the erotic love of a mother for her handsome retarded son and the jealous hatred felt for him by his ugly sister." Since then she has written seventeen novels, two volumes of poetry and seven plays. Her novel A Season in the life of Emmanuel won the prestigious French Prix Medicis as well as the Prix France-Quebec; her 1985 Anna's World was awarded a prize by the Académie Francaise, and she has been decorated with the Order of Canada.

Marie-Claire Blais' visit to Chestertown is sponsored by the Washington College Lecture Committee.

Symposium given on Chesapeake

In honor of Earth Day 1991, the McLain Program in Environmental studies at Washington College will hold a major symposium of "The future of the Chesapeake Bay" Saturday, April 20 at 2 p.m. in the Casey Academic Resource Center Forum of the college. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

The symposium will feature fours experts in various fields related to the ecology of the Chesapeake Bay, one of the world's major estuarine systems. Tom Horton, author of Bay Country and former environmental reporter for the Baltimore Sun, will discuss the educational programs of such organizations as the Chesapeake Bay Foundation. Verna Harrison, Assistant Secretary of the Maryland Department of Natural Resources, will address the DNR's approach to such concerns as the rockfish fishery of the bay. John Cumberland, emeritus professor of economics at the University of Maryland, will discuss the economic impact of environmental conservation and Joseph Mihursky, Director of the Chesapeake Research Consortium, will present the role of scientific research in the development and protection of the Chesapeake.

Carroll Papers exhibited at Washington College

A major new exhibit featuring the papers and documents of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and his family, one of the most powerful and influential families in Maryland history, will be on display at Washington College from April 25 to May 15. The exhibit will be on the lower level of the new Casey Academic Resource Center. On Saturday afternoon, April 27, Sally Mason, Associate Editor of the Carroll Papers Project, will conduce lecture tours of the exhibit after the official opening ceremonies for the Casey Academic Center.

Charles Carroll of Carrollton, born in Annapolis in 1737, became one of Maryland's four signers of the Declaration of Independence and helped to draft Maryland the first constitution and declaration of rights in 1776. In the last six years of his life, before his death on 1832, he was revered by the last surviving signer of the Declaration of Independence.

The exhibit is called "A Priceless Legacy: Charles Carroll of Carrollton's Papers and History of Maryland," and uses documents, letters, paintings and photographs to trace the Carroll family back from its roots in 17th century Ireland to its ascendancy as one of the wealthiest families in Maryland.

The exhibit is currently open just inside the entrance of the CAC building. Stop by on your way to the mailroom!

Harris' electrifying Silence of the Lambs

by Eric Forste

Rarely does Hollywood do a good job of transferring a work fiction to the silver screen, and rarely does an author's intent shine through after the screenwriters get a hold of his work. But, then again, the producers of the film version of Thomas Harris' book The Silence of the Lambs, could hardly have gone wrong.

Harris has created one of the most thought provoking, page turning suspense thrillers since Presumed Innocent. Don't be surprised if you finish it in a day, or less. Then see the movie. And don't be surprised if you feel drained. Then, in all probability, you'll find yourself reading the book again. And again. The pages just seem to fly by as Harris reaches into the conscious (and subconscious) minds of his readers, strapping them down and saying: "listen to this, you won't believe it."

The book opens with Clarice Starling, a young FBI trainee specializing in psychology and forensics, as she is called into the office of Jack Crawford, section chief of the Behavioral Science department - the FBI section that deals with serial murder. It appears at first that she is in for a special assignment. But Starling gets more than she bargains for. It seems someone has been kidnapping young women across the country - apparently starving them and then murdering them. But this is no ordinary serial killer. The victims, discovered floating in rivers and streams in a completely random and almost careless way, have one very troubling and gruesome thing in common: they have been skinned.

Starling is sent to interview Dr. Hannibal Lecter, a once noted Psychiatrist who is serving out a life sentence at the Baltimore State Hospital for the Criminally Insane. Lecter, a.k.a "Hannibal the Cannibal," remains the foremost authority on criminal and psychopathic behavior - even after having become part of that community himself. Lecter's cool manner and keen insight, coupled with his training in psychology and obvious intelligence, as well as his hands on experience with murder could quite possibly help the FBI find this new psychotic killer. Starling soon discovers, however, that in order to gain Lecter's trust (and any useful information) she must give up part of herself - the part where her fears and nightmares come alive - to this blood-chilling sociopath. This she resolves to do... but time is running out - "Buffalo Bill" has kidnapped another victim. Starling is forced to examine her own psyche by the manipulative mind of a brilliant madman, who knows more than he is telling...but has to have his fun before revealing anything.

Lecter's manipulative attempts to rattle Starling are very convincing and effective, and his character is one with which readers will find an eerie fascination. Starling's growth and accomplishments through out the book are particularly poignant. The secondary characters, such as Crawford (the FBI chief) are refreshingly convincing and true-to-life. Harris has effectively merged insights of the psychological and criminal professions with action, suspense, mystery, graphic detail, chilling characters, and real human spirit. While the film, The Silence of the Lambs is a little too graphic to be a real must see Thomas Harris' book is certainly a must read.

Dedication of ARC to be held this Saturday

This Saturday, April 27th, the dedication and ribbon cutting of the Eugene B. Casey Academic Resource Center will take place. The ARC has been open for student use since the beginning this semester.

Festivities will begin at 2:00 p.m. Saturday with the dedication ceremonies. Remarks will be made by Charles H. Trout- President of the College, Louis L. Goldstein- Chairman, Board of Visitors and Governors, Christian Havemeyer- Chairman of Building and Grounds Committee, Elizabeth R. Baer- Provost and Dean of the College, and finally Steven Cades- Associate Professor of Sociology.

Kevin Kelly, President of the Student Government Association, will then make a presentation to Mrs. Casey, who will also be in attendance, from the Student Government Association and the Alumni Association.

Mrs. Eugene B. Casey will then make the final remarks of the dedication ceremony before the ribbon cutting and the unveiling of a bust of Mr. Casey.

The late Eugene B. Casey is the force behind the building of the ARC. His graciousness, along with his wife, was what made the Academic Resource Center possible.

While still a law student at Georgetown University, he formed the Casey Engineering Company, the firm that build several major structures in the area, including eh Georgetown University Medical School and the Walter Reed Army Hospital, before turning to home building. Mr. Casey later expanded his interests into real estate and farming.

A former aide to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, he served as deputy governor of the Farm Credit Administration in 1940 and 1941, and later as a White House agricultural adviser. He served in the Navy in the Pacific, late in World War II.

Mr. Casey was one of several investors who made their fortunes in land dealings during that period. During the 1950's and 1960's, Mr. Casey pioneered low-cost housing in the Rockville-Gaithersburg area, and was one of the first developers to build large apartment projects in Montgomery County.

Mr. Casey, who was one of the largest landholders in upper Montgomery County during the years after World War II, was also one of the most generous philanthropers. He gave the historic Darnell farm, built in 1755, to Montgomery County. He donated the land for the Maryland Sheriffs' Boys Club Ranch. His gift of land and facilities, known as the Casey Barns, led to historic medical advancements. From 1949 until 1960, these barns were used by the U.S. Government for research that led to the development of the Salk polio vaccine.

He was married to Betty Brown Casey '47, who is a member of Washington College's board of Visitors and Governors.

In his later years he made significant contributions to Washington College as well, funding construction of the Casey Swim Center and paying for the purchase and renovation of the O'Neill Literary House (named after his mother) and Brown Guest Cottage (named after his wife's mother).

Before his death in 1986, Mr. Casey's pledge to donate the money for a new campus facility initiated a building campaign that just now is being completed. "His generosity and his leadership inspired Washington College to think anew about its mission and its needs, leading to a master plan and a revitalized campus," commented then-President Douglass Cater at the time of Mr. Casey's death.

The ceremony on Saturday is in his honor.

The Academic Resource Center was designed by the architectural firm of Peterson and Brickbauer, Inc. of Baltimore. It has become the center of the college campus as it contains the Admissions Office, the Student Affairs Office for the Dean of Students and her staff, seminar rooms, a common room, an advanced computing classroom, a modern language laboratory, and a forum. The college bookstore and mailroom are also located here.

Following the dedication and the ribbon cutting all are invited to attend an Open House in the Casey Center. Demon-

Students hold mock U.N. Conference

By: Susie Mazzullo

Those students, enrolled in the Politics of the Middle East class this semester, recently participated in a mock United Nations Conference. The conference was held in Hynson Lounge this past Tuesday and was organized by Dr. Tahir Shad, Director of International Studies.

The students attempted to solve the Arab Israeli Conflict that has been plaguing the Middle East for many years. By the end of the day, the students had agreed on a plan that would solve the problem, but only after hours of discussion and compromise.

The class had been preparing for this since the beginning of the semester. They had broken up into groups representing the countries of Israel, Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, U.S.S.R., and the United States. There were also groups representing the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the United Nations. Each group then had to research their own country and in essence become a citizen of that country. EDITORIAL

To my successor:

Well, kid, it's all yours. The wonderful creation known as the Washington College Elm. Having served as Editor for a year, I feel I can wax nostalgic and offer some pointers.

At President Trout's inauguration, the President of Western Maryland University spoke about the "three envelope" method of crisis solving. Well, here's my version.

How to manage the Elm.

1. Learn to live without sleep. Don't be fooled, it's a luxury. The paper will rule your life, but, hey, it's done the same to every editor before you. While you're at it, learn to love coffee, takeout in the Dining Hall, and getting irate phone calls at 8 am.

2. Don't worry, there's always next week. The great joy of the Elm is what went wrong last week can be put right this week. This, however, does not mean that you can mess up something you've been doing right. We are only human.

3. Blame your predecessor. "She never told me about this" is an excellent reply to queries about your skill as an editor. Go ahead, blame it on me, I won't be here, I won't mind.

Best of luck, the job has its good points. And even if people are saying "Who?" at the moment, by this time next year, they'll be say "Her?"

Every editor feels a bit sad leaving her newspaper. I am no exception. This hasn't been an easy year, but I made it through and that couldn't have happened without my staff. We had a bumpy ride, but we made it through. Thanks. And Gimbo, you weren't on the staff officially, but there would've been one beserk bunny without you.

Well, that's the news and ....

Happy Trails.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters should be signed, but exception will be made when disclosure of an author's name would violate his/her privacy. Students should major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief, or to the appropriate page editor. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive before 8 P.M. Wednesday evening for publication the week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Professor expresses satisfaction with architects proposals

To the Editor:

Thank you very much for asking me to share my reactions to the proposed renovation strategies for William Smith Hall. I was very pleased with the remarks of Tai Soo Kim, the architect retained to conduct the preliminery study of the College's construction needs. I wholeheartedly agree with Mr. Kim's preference for retainingas much of the original character of the building as possible. William Smith Hall is one of the architectural treasures of Washington College, and it requires very delicate treatment. Mr. Kim's philosophy seems to be exactly right in this respect, and events seems to be moving in a very good direction.

Richard Striner

Thanks for the mud

Good-bye

As the year draws to an end, I look back at my time here at the WAC. Without waxing nostalgic, I simply want to say goodbye, thank you and I will miss all of the people who have helped to make my years here enjoyable, interesting and memorable.

At W.C. I have learned about myself, the meaning of friendship and high-heeled elephants. Thank you - Professors, Faculty, Friends, Enemies, Elm/Pegasus staffers, Reid Hall ladies, the Writer's Floor, CCF and the Above-Average Bimbo! Goodbye - and I wish you all happiness!

Issue: What is the meaning of life?

The meaning of life?

carolin leibig

What is the meaning of life? Well, that is a good question. Of all the people that have inhabited the Earth down through history, who among them has not pondered their existence, their purpose. Until today we are not any closer to finding the answer then were our cave man ancestors. It is not unlikely that perhaps even us carefree college students take time out from our busy schedule of papers, classes, exams, and parties to think about the meaning of life. As a senior I can now safely say that the education I have recieved, although it is a good one, has in no way furthered my knowledge as to what the meaning of life is. I looked in the course catalog, but I did not see Meaning of Life 101. Just imagine what the prerequisites for Advanced Meaning of Life 420 would be like: the student must have at least 19 years of living experience. Actually I do not think one could learn the meaning of life anyway, since it is such an abstract concept (kind of like International Economics). I probably have a better shot at understanding economics than the purpose of my existence on this here planet Earth.

Let me now share with you some of the things I did learn in college which may someday lead me to the answer to the meaning of life. I learned that Rembrandt had a last name, that some dorm rooms are too small for two people, that drinking Sangria...well, anyway, that supply and demand curves cross at the equilibrium point, that no one is done with their thesis when the deadline rolls around, and finally, that college is over before you know it, especially if you're having fun (it's no cliché!). In my ponderings of the meaning of life, reenforced by the things I have learned, I have come to a conclusion. There is no difinitive meaning of life (except to procreate and pass our genes on to the next generation in order to survive and continue to exist in some form or another long after we die) because life is what you make it...I can't believe I just wrote that. But there is no other way to say it. So don't ponder the BIG question, just live your life and enjoy it to the best of your abilities. Maybe some people believe in order to have a meaningful life you have to perform great deeds or become famous (or infamous), but that does not mean anything because many people have led extraordinary lives without ever having their name so much as appear in a newpaper article. So, to reiterate my earlier conclusion, the meaning of life is what you want it to be—while your deciding, go out, have fun, and care about your fellow man who is trying to do the same thing you are. And for those of you who need a little extra help in finding out the meaning of life, go to your local video store and rent Monty Python's The Meaning of Life. That should clear up any doubts you may still have.

Top twenty possible meanings of life...

What is the meaning of life at Washington College? In an attempt to answer this utterly profound question, I asked my friends what they thought and we came up with the top 20 answers to this question.

The Meaning of Life at Washington College is:

CLIFTON M. MILLER LIBRARY

NOTICE

There is a great demand for library materials at this time of year. Students are reminded to please return books as soon as possible so they will be available for others.

All materials must be returned by Friday, May 3.

Graduating seniors with library obligations will be sent an estimated bill and then a final one. Bills will include a processing fee of $15.00 per lost item. Seniors' bills will be sent via campus mail.

After commencement, undergraduate bills will be prepared and sent to the students' home addresses.

Debts may be paid in cash or by check payable to Washington College Library at the library Circulation Desk. Ask for Mrs. Slagle or Mr. Tubbs. Bills not paid directly to library will be sent to the Business Office to be deducted from the deposit.

The Registrar's Office will not honor requests for transcripts until bills have been paid.

Words of farewell and hopes for the future from Hands Out

By Erin Hodge-Williams

> You cannot teach man anything. You can only help him discover it within himself.
> Galileo

Hands Out is a program designed to encourage students and faculty to interact with the community. While this spring was Hands Out's first semester in effect, the concept of Hands Out has always been around Washington College. There have always been a small but distinct group of students and faculty who have consistently involved themselves in the community. One of the main reasons I decided to organize Hands Out came from a realization that oppurtunities for growth and learning extend well past the confines of Washington College's campus. Before I left to spend my junior year in Spain I didn't know much about Chestertown. Living in Europe taught me to become more sensitive to my surroundings.

Upon returning from Spain I was suprised to find that despite a group of active individuals, the college community was separated from the greater community. A year in Spain, where the pace of life is slow and you have time to talk to your neighbor, taught me the value of learning outside the classroom. People have always told me that the only way to truly learn another language and culture is by livng there. After a year away I know that to be true, but I had to discover it for myself.

In January Hands Out created a student and faculty volunteer directory. The directory contains specific information about organizations in the area with listings of both the services they provide to the community and the activities in which volunteers can participate. Encouraging long term participation in volunteer activities, such as interacting with children from Garnett Elementary or visiting nursing homes on a regular basis, was Hands Out's original intention. However, since this spring was our first semester, we decided the best way to introduce individuals to the idea of participation was through short term projects. Next year Hands Out will be using the directory, which is currently being updated, to try and encourage more long term community participation.

This weekend Hands Out will be organizing the fourth and final project of the year. The event will involve painting a

President's letter

To: The Washington College Community

In my Inaugural Address back in October (Can nearly six months have elapsed since then?), I commented on volantarism at Washington College. "So many of our students have already recognized that opportunities for volunteer service in our region abound," I observed, "and nothing would give me greater pleasure than were every student in this College to reach out— reach out to the Garnett School playground project, to Council of the Aging, to literacy programs, to social agencies, to schools for kids in trouble."

With the subsequent funding of Hands Out, the mechanism is in place for extending needed assistance to those less fortunate than we on the Upper Eastern Shore. I could not be more delighted. That now we have an umbrella organization under which all sorts of volunteer opportunities are lodged, and that Hands Out has taken initiatives to extend the range of volunteer efforts, is something about which we can all be proud.

To all who have worked so hard to make Hands Out a success, I offer my thanks. Hands Out is off to a most auspicious beginning, and I look forward to seeing it thrive in the years ahead.

Summer opportunities

Summer offers a wide range of opportunities for students to volunteer their time. If you have discovered through participation in Hands Out how much fun it is to work with others making you community a better place, you may want to take advantage of the summer months to continue to volunteer whether it be in Chestertown or in you home communities.

Students remaining in Chestertown can continue to work with the agencies listed in the Hands Out Directory. Virtually all of them operate year round and need volunteers especially during the summer months when their regular volunteers are away on vacation. Special summer programs like Camp Fairlee Manor, which serves disabled children and adults need both volunteers and paid staff. The same is true of agencies in any other community. While most schools are closed for the summer, students who would like to work with children could assist with recreation programs sponsored by Parks and Recreation Departments nationwide. Day care centers, YMCA programs, or pediatric hospitals also offer a chance to volunteer.

If you would like short term volunteer opportunities, check with the Special Olympics Office in your area to see when they will be holding events. The Maryland State Special Olympic Games at Towson State University on June 14th and 15th welcomes volunteers. Call (301) 931-4100. If you would like to work with elderly people, contact a local nursing home, meals

Faculty involvement adds new dimension

I have read someplace that learning begins in the home. I believe this because our parents help us to formulate what we learn and how we should use this information. Now that we are members of an institute of higher learning we need role models more than ever because, for most of us, our parents are hundreds of miles away. And with us being force fed a lot of information, we need guidance to help us use our information wisely. This is where our professors come in. We need them to teach us how, when, and where to use this data that they keep telling us will be important in our future lives. Teachers have a responsibility to not only teach with the utmost of quality but also to respond to the needs of the student body. Students need guidance. But how can teachers give guidance if they themselves do not have a clear direction. That is why I urge the professors , if they are not going to join in the fight to make this community better, at least to encourage their students to become active. Because as a member of the Hands- Out Program, I have come to realize that nothing can be accomplished if we do not have the forces of the larger community on our sides.

Let's plant a tree

By Kathy Mullen

Last Saturday, April 20th, many Kent County residents gathered under cold, rain-threatening skies to plant a few hundred saplings in Worton Park. Included in these numbers were a few students, faculty and staff of Washington College: Beth Armstrong, Vicky Sawyer, Clint Baer, Dr. Shivers and Dr. Shoge, who offered their time and service to help restore the tree numbers in our local area. Originally, there were to be a thousand saplings planted at three different locations from the time period of 8-12, and 15 of WC faculty and staff had signed up to participate. However, due to some last minute changes, there was only one location and through the work of those volunteers that did show up, all the tree-planting was completed in 2 hours. Hands Out would like to thank these dedicated volunteers who represented our college in trying to make a difference in our local community's environment.

barn for Fairlee Manor, a non-profit summer camp for physically and mentally handicapped individuals. This project was originally scheduled for April 20th, however, due to the rain, it had to be postponed until this weekend. The last three projects have been incredibly successful and Hands Out would like to extend immense thanks those groups and individuals who have helped to make them possible.

One of the original goals for Hands Out was to create a comprehensive volunteer program at Washington College which would be incorporated into the academic direction of the college. I myself feel strongly that students should be able to receive some form of academic credit for volunteer activities. The type of learning that comes from participation and involvement cannot be compared to classroom learning. As the quotation states "Do not let education get in the way of learning." Washington College cannot expect to teach students to be independent and responsible if they do not encourage and recognize those who are. I have discovered that Washington College is quite conservative about its academic policies, and while Hands Out has not given up on further exploration of the idea of participation and its relationship to academics, it will certainly be a gradual process.

I will be graduating this year, and while I will be sad to leave Hands Out, I know that the organization is in good hands. I would like to thank all the members of Hands Out for their incredible energy, enthusiam, and commitment. A special thanks to Maria Jerardi, Jennifer Mauser, Kathy Mullan, George Jamison, Mary Holmes, Kevin Marshall, Erin Page, and Linda Cades and Vicki Sawyer of the Career Development Office. Thanks also to the Washington College Dining Service for donating drinks for the projects. The continued success of Hands Out depends on you.

or at Andy's – possibly at all four. For others, it will be found on the stage of Tawes or Gibson or on the playing field. It will be found in writing a poem or book or perhaps it will even be found in the Dinning Hall. Life is an experience, it is a process. Life, when taken for what it is, is sweet. It is not something to be conquered; it is something to be grateful for.

The answer to the meaning of life at Washington College is 42 so to all you graduating seniors out there I bid you a final farewell: so long and thanks for all the fish.

on wheels program, adult day center or local office on aging. If you like teaching, join a literacy program and help an adult learn to read or a new immigrant learn English. If you'd like to work outdoors, check with a wildlife refuge, a habitat for humanity program or a state or national park.

Simply decide who you would like to help, what kind of work you would like to do, how many hours you would like to volunteer and contact the appropriate agency. Almost any community service agency can use your help; people seldom turn down a willing volunteer. If you are unsure what agencies exist in your area, start your search at your local public library. Libraries often serve as volunteer clearing houses, and the reference librarian can help you locate likely volunteer opportunities.

In Maryland, you can also call the Governor's Office on Volunteerism (301) 225-4496, which coordinates volunteer opportunities state wide. The Volunteer Clearing House of the District of Columbia (202) 638-2664 publishes an annual list of agencies needing volunteers in Washington. Most telephone directories have a page near the beginning of the directory which lists community service numbers. If you need more suggestions, Vicky Sawyer or Linda Cades in the Career Development Office will be pleased to help you locate an oppurtunity of interest to you.

No one can solve all of the world's problems, but by giving a few hours of your time, you can make a difference. Somebody needs you.

A Dr. Cades exam and a fishing trip to Betterton

Phil "Slice" Macek

There was once four juniors at Washington College: Bob, Johnny, Tom, and Joe who were diligently preparing for Steve Cades's ultra-difficult "Research Methods in Sociology" final exam. However, they were very burned out from all their studying and hereby decided to remedy the situation with a well deserved break. Since the exam was to take place at 2:00 in the afternoon, the boys opted to quit studying early and spend the remainder of the morning fishing up in Betterton. Well, they got their rods and the big IGLOO cooler loaded up with three cases of Rolling Rock (same as it ever was), and headed off into the clear, serene Spring morning.

Our four journeymen followed the sun's lead and soon happened upon a small, secluded farm pond. They unloaded the beer first (clearly showing that their priorities were in order), and with any thoughts of Cades's exam a million miles away they proceeded to drop their lines into the cool water.

Well about two and a half cases later (never mind that no fish were caught), our four heroes decided to take a little siesta on the pond's sun drenched banks, and subsequently they all curled up into fetal positions and dozed off.

Johnny woke up first, the sun shining bright and hot on his face; and at first he struggled to grasp his temporal reality.

"Dude, where the hell am I?" he asked himself softly. His head felt like somebody had tried to jackhammer through it as he slowly and very painfully sat up and called to his school-skipping cohorts.

Joe opened his bloodshot eyes and wondered aloud, "How long have we been asleep?"

"I don't know," Bob answered dryly. "But sure as hell, we're gonna be late for that damn exam."

"Oh lovely," Tom chimed in slowly as he came back to life. "My grade can't afford another F. I wonder if Cades would except a hefty bribe?"

The four partners in crime struggled to their feet with their joints protesting loudly from the stiffness. They made it to the car without throwing up and headed towards campus in silence.

An announcer on a local radio station told the hung-over lads that the time was now 2:55 and that it was now time to get back to the outlandish interview with the guy spreading rumors that Scott Read was seen buying something at the bookstore with his own money, this same guy also claims to have seen Dr. Gillin yelling, "I don't care how toned a woman's body is, her thighs are still going to jiggle!!" out his car window at female joggers on Route 213.

"Turn off that damn noise," growled Joe painfully. He held his throbbing head gingerly like it was going to fall off if he let go.

"Look guys," piped in Bob optimistically. "Since we're commuters and live a good ways from campus, we'll just tell Dr. Cades some story about getting a flat tire; and that since we didn't have a spare we had to walk the rest of the way. I think he'll respect our determined effort to be present, albeit late, for his exam.

A sparkle suddenly came to Johnny's eyes as he saw the brilliant logic in Bob's plan.

"That could work. My brother, come to think of it, pulled the same gag in high school and he ended up getting extra time on his exam without a hitch."

The four members of the goon platoon perked up a little and each popped open a fresh beer in order to celebrate their newly found fool-proof alibi that would be their ticket into Cades's exam.

They pulled into Bill Smith's parking lot looking like they had just returned from the grave and as they walked to the exam room each boy wondered to himself if their plan would be successful.

As the boys entered the room the class looked up from their papers and laughed wildly at the sight of their hung-over colleagues. Cades, however, was not so amused.

"Well fellas, I'm overjoyed to see that you could set aside a little time from your busy days to join us. You only have until 5:00 to complete your exams, a mere 42 minutes from now." Cades handed each boy a copy of his "death warrant" and after taking in their pathetic appearance one more time added sarcastically, "Good luck."

The boys sat side by side in the front row and started their exams. Tom grimaced and grew pale when he read the question about stratified geographic sampling. Joe took similar displeasure in the question about testing for a researcher's two best friends, validity and reliability and Bob winced as if he had just been hit by a stiff jab when he saw the essay question about Likert scales.

At 5:00, Cades got up from his desk and announced to the empty classroom save for four boys, "That's it fellas. Let's wrap 'em up and hand 'em in."

The boys looked at each other for a fleeting moment and finally, Bob, the unofficial leader of the brew crew, arose from his seat prepared to save the boys from certain F's.

"Dr. Cades, sir, we just want you to know that we have a very good reason for being late and we think that we deserve extra time to complete your exam."

"Well is that so boys?" inquired Dr. Cades in a playful manner. And as he sat back down with a smile on his face he said, "O.K., let's hear it."

Bob looked back at his friends with a "this is not going to work" look and met their agreeing glances. The beer used in their celebration now left a hot, sour feelings in their stomachs, and yet Bob gamely continued.

"You see Dr. Cades, the four of us are commuters and live about 12 miles outside Chestertown. Well, we were on our way here and about half way to campus we suffered the horrific calamity of a flat tire. Since we didn't have a spare we decided to walk here and tell you the truth, knowing that in all your infinite mercy you would graciously give us a time extension. After all, this was a freak accident; and I don't think we can be held directly accountable."

Cades listened intently to Bob's little speech, considered it for a moment, and then passed down his verdict like a time-tested judge.

"Alright boys, tell ya what I'm gonna do. I'll give you an extra hour to finish your exams. Now you boys stay here and work, while I get another cup of coffee."

"Thank you," the boys said in unison like a well practiced choir. "We really appreciate this."

"Yes well, accidents do happen." And with that bit of profound philosophy the boys watched Cades leave the room.

The boys exchanged a series of victorious smiles with one another and then turned their devoted attention to the task at hand. Finally, Cades came back into the room carrying a fresh cup of Java and four bluebooks.

"Boys I've changed my mind and I'm going to give you a special final. Now mind you I don't normally do this, but I feel that in a situation like this such actions are justified. I have only one request, that each of you sit in a different corner of the room."

The four friends got up and did as Dr. Cades had asked. After all, they had just outwitted sociology's "grand old man" and were about to get a custom made final exam.

As the boys were getting comfortable in their seats, Dr. Cades said, "As I've said this is a special final in that it contains one brief essay question. I think it is fair, and if you've studied at all it will be quite simple."

Cades turned his back to the boys and paced deliberately to the front of the room like a man waiting for his first child to be born. When he turned around to face the boys again he smiled softly and said in a casual voice, "Your question is simply this: which tire went flat?"

And finally, Slice's final word about W.C.

Well, that does it; four years of college in the books. Little did I know as an incoming freshman that the time would fly so fast and leave me at the doorstep of graduation in the blink of an eye. I remember my first days here during freshman orientation.

"Where's Kent House?" I asked some old man while I tried to get situated in my new home.

"Over there" he said with an accompanying pointing finger. "Next to the tar pits and the toxic waste dump."

I immediately felt at home in my new surroundings and eventually became accostumed to small town life. I learned to love dining hall food, mud, and Milwaukee's Best.

Towards the end of freshman year I experienced my first Spring at Washington College as well as my first May Day (which I still haven't recovered from). Thus, my initial year ended and left me full of amazement, wonder, and a desire to see what Sophomore year would hold.

So I returned a wise fool, and instantly picked up where freshman year had ended. I crashed my first Birthday Ball and struggled through the mental anguish of selecting a major. Sophomore year saw the onset of major construction around campus and left me wondering what this school would look like when I returned for Junior year.

Well since I didn't fail out, I decided to return for my third year at the friendliest damn little college on the shore. I returned to find the progress of construction moving at a snail's pace and subsequently determined that the workers had taken summer break too. Junior year saw Dr. Gillin's class another time and the arrival of Doug Cater's retirement announcement. Junior year also bore witness to my second crashing of the Birthday Ball and my third May Day. I had, needless to say, grown to love WC, and put off thoughts of graduation as long as possible.

Senior year arrived and I welcomed in my final year with the torture of a 8:30 Dr. Scout class. I survived being the only male in a Dean Sansing class, which ultimately taught me not to get married lest I be abused by all the passion and fury of 250 pounds of loving wife who wants to kill me for not taking out the garbage.

Finally, I finished my thesis and await the arrival of graduation. So here I stand, four years later, awaiting my fate in the real world. And to all those returning next year I leave the following threat: I am not that easy to get rid of and I will be back for Alumni Day. Adios W.C., maybe one day when I rich and famous I'll donate a building or something (or maybe not).

A tribute to Chatty

Don Chatellier retires after 36 years of service

By Gary Brown

Washington College's Don Chatellier is a man of numbers. If you sit next to him at a Washington swim meet, he'll have his state-of-the-art stopwatch handy to time the swimmers' splits for you, and he'll show you the scrap paper with the current score and just how many more points Washington needs to win the meet. If you stop by the Truslow boathouse on a chilly morning, you'll find him calculating how many strokes per minute the crew team will have to generate to conquer the Chester River. If you attend a Shoremen basketball game, you'll see Don at the scorer's table running the clock, controlling time, as it were, with a push of a button. And if you try and count just how many people Don has coached, taught, or influenced in his 36 years of dedicated service at Washington College, you'll most certainly run out of numbers, and time.

Don is retiring at the end of the fiscal year from an institution that has helped mold him, and that he in turn has equally changed and benefited. It is ironic that Don be confronted with this retirement phase that frames an element of time, for though the numbers on a clock have been his life blood, the bits of data that fill his mind, he is not a man who is ruled by time.

"My attitude toward anything I've ever done," Don says while taking a break from his computer screen," is that if you're going to do something, do it as well as you can. That may sound like a cliche, but time really doesn't mean anything to me. It shouldn't matter how much time you need to do something right. If the commitment is there, then you don't worry about time."

Few people have made the type of commitment to Washington College that Don has. His compassion for perfection and his work ethic have made him an invaluable contributor to every facet of the athletic department, and many others within the College. He has served long stints as head coach of Washington's cross country, track, and crew teams, he is a tenured faculty member who has been a mainstay in the physical education department, and most recently he has served as the athletic department's business manager, again facilitating Don's numerical knowledge. He is already a member of Washington's Athletic Hall Of Fame, and he has firmly established himself as one in a lengthy list of revered College mentors.

He was hired in the fall of 1955 as an instructor of physical education. He came from Springfield College with a Master's of Education after a two-year stint as a specialist in charge of supplies for special services at Fort Monmouth, NJ. After going through nearly 30 job interviews during a five-month period, Don and Washington College began a mutually beneficial relationship. Then Athletic Director Ed Athey took advantage of Don's extensive track background and put him in charge of Washington's track and field program, where he flourished.

Track remained Don's first love in sports, and his eyes gleam when he reminisces about Washington's success at the Penn Relays, and within the Middle Atlantic Conference.

"I wouldn't coach if I didn't get excited about performance," Don said. "Our victories at the Penn Relays in 1963, 1975, and 1976 were some of my biggest thrills. We had competed there for years without ever getting a medal, and then we won it in those three years when nobody thought we could. It's a big thrill to put together four guys out of the 12 or 13 on your roster and pit them against four guys out of 40 or 50 roster members from bigger schools and have your guys win."

Don's teams notched several wins at prestigious events and sent many qualifiers to national championships. As a coach, he was a dedicated teacher and motivator, cut from much the same mold as the legendary J. Thomas Kibler, who brought several different Washington teams in the 1920s, '30s and '40s to national prominence.

"The people here at the time I was hired, guys like Kibler, Athey, and Dutch Dumschott, all were very concerned about the people under them, not only the student body, but the faculty and staff members as well. They were very much like my high school track coach, who influenced me a great deal and was one of the main reasons I became an educator and coach in the first place."

Harold Jardine coached track at Kearny High School in New Jersey where Don was a three-year letterman. Don remembers Jardine as a tenacious competitor, a wizened coach who was able to get every ounce of performance out of an athlete.

"It's kind of funny," Don recalls, "but I really got into teaching for the wrong reason. During our junior year in high school we were required to be interviewed by the Dean to try and determine what we wanted to do with the rest of our lives. I was told that if you said you were going to college that they'd pretty much leave you alone. So I said that just to get by, but after working in a factory for a summer, I went right back to Coach Jardine for advice, and he told me to go to Springfield, which started me off on the right foot. Jardine was the kind of guy, like Kibler, who had a lot of knowledge and understanding, and a way of getting the best out of his kids. I'd like to hope that I acquired some of those qualities during my time here."

Intrigued by the smallness of the institution and the town, and comfortable with the people around him, Don and his wife Betty made Chestertown their home.

Don is nicknamed Chatty for a reason. If you catch him in between fixing the Cain Athletic Center scoreboard, hammering out the kinks in the PA system at Kibler Field, or whipping up a budget report detailing how many lacrosse balls have come and gone in the last 30 years, he'll gladly sit you down and relate story after story that will amaze, confound and amuse you, leaving you literally exhausted after the session is finally interrupted by something that requires Don's wealth of knowledge and ability. He is an aggressive liver of life, not afraid to confront adventure or pursue the best possible solution to any problem. He will tell you that he's older than dirt, that his mother had six children and Donald, and that his favorite coaching criticism is: "You didn't run too badly, son, but you stayed in the same place too long."

It is nearly impossible to get a short answer from Chatty, but it is just as impossible not to learn something from him. He fits the philosophy of a Division III educator to perfection, and his main concerns are with the advancement of the individual. He thoroughly enjoys the return of alumni who bring him up to date on the progress of their lives, and he admits that it is this part of the job, the relationship with the students, that he will most dearly miss. He has witnessed nearly four decades of them, and has coached many different champions.

He has witnessed the rise of track great Edwin Moses, who competed in the Penn Relays, and he coached Washington Hall Of Famer Dan Scharf, and Tommy Morris, the first black student-athlete at the College. He coached against the likes of Upsala's football and track star Richie Davis and Widener phenom Billy "White Shoes" Johnson. He also coached against Harry Jardine when Jardine was an assistant at Upsala in the later years of his coaching life. Those moments in particular are special to Don. He has seen advances in training techniques, the welcome rise of women's sports, and the advent of coaches treating players more like people rather than simply performers, something that Don not only witnessed but nurtured. But time is not divisible for this man of numbers. For Chatty, the bottom line is the present and how each person tackles the immediate task at hand.

"You know, I just can't get into comparing athletes from one era to the next," he said. "You hear guys whining about how athletes were tougher then, or that athletes are better and stronger now. To me it doesn't matter, because numbers are numbers, and a champion is a champion no matter when or where he performed."

To the several thousand people who worked with him, learned from him, and were touched by him during the last 36 years, Chatty is most certainly their champion.

Though Washington College's men's lacrosse squad will not participate in the NCAA Division III playoffs for the first time in the 12-year history of the tournament, the Shoremen have displayed a gritty brand of lacrosse and an effort that has garnered the respect of those close to the program.

Reeling from a preseason incident that claimed ten varsity members, seven of which were slated to start, the Shoremen recovered under the steady and tenacious guidance of head coach Terry Corcoran, who quickly molded a competitive team made mostly of underclassmen, many of which had been on the junior varsity last year. Washington battled through a typically tough Shoremen slate, including Division I powers Johns Hopkins and Navy, and highly ranked Division III foes Salisbury State, Hobart, Alfred and Washington & Lee, winning heart-stopping thrillers against 12th-ranked Roanoke and 18th-ranked Franklin & Marshall, before falling short of the coveted eight-team postseason tournament.

The Shoremen's youthful nucleus gives hopes of a bright future to Washington fans who, though disappointed with the pause in Washington's string of playoff appearances, realize the character and poise with which the '91 squad performed.

Gary Brown is the Sports Information Director here at the WAC who has contibuted a great deal to the Elm sports pages all year. In this last issue I would like to extend a hearty thanks for all the work he has done for not only my pages but for the athletic programs at Washington College.

Artist Henry Tanner discussed in lecture

"Humane Concerns in the Life and Work of African-American Artist Henry O. Tanner (1859-1937)" will be the subject of a lecture by Dewey F. Mosby, Director of the Picker Art Gallery of Cornell University, to be given at Washington College. The talk, illustrated with slides of Tanner's artworks, is scheduled fro 7:30 p.m. Monday, April 29 in the Forum of the college's Casey Academic Center. Admission is free and the public is encouraged to attend.

A major retrospective of Henry O. Tanner's art is currently on display at the Philadelphia Museum of Art, and was organized by Dr. Mosby in collaboration with Darrel Sewell, the museum's Curator of American Art. Dr. Mosby provided the scholarly essay for the catalogue of the exhibition.

Henry O. Tanner was born in Pittsburgh and raised in Philadelphia in a household described as "the center of the black intellectual community." He attended the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, where he studied under Thomas Eakins. In 1891 he sailed to France, where he was to remain for the rest of his life. In 1893 "The Banjo Lesson," depicting a grey-haired man patiently showing a young boy how to play a banjo, was exhibited in Philadelphia to great critical acclaim. Later Tanner turned to religious subjects, and such paintings as "The Flight into Egypt" reflect his growing interest in the subject of persecution and the search for freedom throughout history. In 1924 Tanner said of his biblical studies, "My effort has been... to give the human touch which makes the whole world kin and which ever remains the same." This "human touch" will be the subject of Dr. Mosby's lecture.

A noted scholar of European and especially French painting, Dewey Mosby is Director of the Picker Art Gallery and Professor of Art History at Colgate University. He is author of seven books and catalogues of art history, and has served as curator for fifteen major exhibitions at museum and art galleries in the United States and Europe, including the Detroit Institute of Arts, the National Gallery in Washington, D.C. and the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. He has been decorated with the Order of Arts and Letters by the French Ministry of Culture.

Delaware Regional Ballet to perform at W.C.

On Sunday afternoon, April 28, 1991, at the Gibson Performing Arts Center of Washington College, the Delaware Regional Ballet Company will present a varied concert of classical ballet and jazz dance. International Dance Week is April 27- May 2.

Les Sylphides, with music by Chopin, is a one-act ballet that was first produced in Paris in 1909. Anna Pavlova and Vaslav Nijinsky dance the lead roles. The DRBC's Director, Tatjana Akinfieva-Smith, is staging the ballet with the original choreography of Michael Fokine. Phillip Otto, soloist from the Pennsylvania Ballet, will dance the lead role with Stacey Vennett from Dover, DE. Les Sylphides is certainly one of the most poetic ballets of the 20th century and, perhaps, of all time.

Polovetsian Dances, with music by Borodin and choreography by Mrs. Akinfieva-Smith, is a lively and exciting piece in the manner of Central Asian dances that combines classical ballet with character dancing.

A Dance Suite is a classical Baroque piece for five women. The music by George Frederick Handel has been especially recorded by the Dover Early Music Consort for this performance.

The program will be rounded out with two jazz ballets. Mask, with music by Vangelis, is an extraordinary piece for 12 dancers. The choreography was commissioned work by Michele Lee Xiques who recently left Delaware to join the Empire State Ballet Company in Buffalo, NY. The second jazz piece is Birdland, a "Broadway jazz" piece for 10 dancers, choreographed by Victoria Voshell who is a faculty member with the DRBC.

The concert is scheduled to begin at 2:00 p.m. Tickets are $7 for adults and $4 for students and senior citizens. They are available at the Washington College Athletic Center and Student Affairs Office, and the Corsica Bookshop. For more information, contact the dance program at Washington College, 778-2800, ext. 225.

successful at the conference, Dr. Shad told the class that they had to think like the citizens of the country that they were representing.

A couple of weeks before the conference, the groups were each given a list of confidential objectives that they were to try to achieve at the conference. These added more excitement and intrigue to the conference as no one knew what the others where up to behind closed doors.

The conference began at 11:00 a.m. with a remark by President Trout. He wished the group well and said that he knew that Washington College undergraduated were capable of great things. He said to the group, "if you can solve the problem in the Middle East today, you are better people than lots of others."

Dr. Shad then introduced Professor John O'Rourke from the University of Pennsylvania. He was to act as the referee and mediator of the Conference. Any questions were to be directed to him, and many were.

The conference was conducted in a series of twenty minute segments. The first twenty was actual time sitting at the table debating under the formal rules of the United Nations. The next twenty minutes were open and each group was then able to talk to other groups and make deals. The conference continued in this fashion with an hour break for lunch in between.

By the end of the day, the students had indeed come up with a solution to the problem that was agreed upon by a majority. The group had avoided war.

Professor John O'Rourke debriefed the group following the completion of the conference. He congratulated the group on their performance of representing their countries, and commented that they had acted "within the realm of reasonable and expected behavior".

Following the conference, a Middle Eastern dinner was held for all of those who participated.

Anyone wishing to see a replay of the conference can attend the second presentation that will be held in Hynson Lounge this Saturday at 11:00 a.m. for Parent's Day.

Architects meet with students and faculty

By: Laura Hopper

Two architects met with students and faculty on Tuesday afternoon to discuss the renovation of William Smith Hall and the possible citings for a new classroom buildings. Using the diagram of the Master Plan, architect Tai Soo Kim discussed the overall plan of the campus, and presented four potential sites for a new building; on the quad next to Dunning Hall; on the site where Spanish House current is; on the site where Furguson stands, and in between Gibson and the Lifetime Fitness Center. Kim suggested the last site, which would be across the new pedestrian walk from Bill Smith has the most potential.

In the discussion, Kim stressed the need to define the role of the building, before considering the style in which it will be built, and its relationship with William Smith Hall. Before plans for the building are drawn up, the firm will create a three dimensional model of the campus, which will aid in determining the size and shape of a new classroom building as well as its relationship to the other buildings nearby.

The architectural firm of Tai Soo Kim is handling the renovations of William Smith Hall, and much of the subsequent discussion centered around the plans for renovation. President Trout reminded the audience that cost considerations are a factor in the renovations, as are modern building code requirements.

The architects stressed a desire to keep as many original features in the building as possible, including walls, floors, doors, and moldings. They described the exterior of the building as in good shape, and said that the inside looks shabby because of the lowered ceilings, poor paint job, and blocked windows.

Much of the discussion centered around plans to renovate Norman James Theater. The architects said they plan to bring in an acoustical consultant to aid in soundproofing the theater, and plan to use different sound obstructing materials. They want to change the dimensions of the projection booth to make the balcony more usable. They also want to remove the curtains from the stained glass windows, and change the color scheme to accentuate the detail on the presenium arch. In their view, relatively minor changes could yield a major improvement.

The modern building code requires stairwells in public buildings to be enclosed. The architects said they will meet with the building inspector to discuss these requirements in relation to a building such as William Smith Hall. In general, they promised to examine William Smith Hall room by room to decide the best way to handle lighting and ventilation problems.

Tradition Died With Elm

by Kris Wallenberg

The Washington Elm has captured the hearts of all who have ever been at Washington College and its loss will be felt by many classes yet to come. For returning students, faculty, and staff, the barren front lawn is a constant reminder of this prestigious treasure. No longer will students be able to enjoy an occasional class under the Elm and seniors will have to find a new location for the traditional farewell toast. But the Elm was more than a place to have a couple glasses of champagne and to contemplate the meaning of life; it was a link between the present and Washington College's "distinguished historical background."

Washington College had been selected to receive the seedling due to George Washington's involvement with the College at Chester. Before assuming the Presidency, George Washington gave his consent to have this college named for him, an honor only our institution can claim. Washington also donated a sum of Fifty Guineas to Washington College, served as a member of the Board of Visitors and Governors for approximately five years, and received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws in 1789.

Mrs. James A. Dorsey, Chairman of the state Daughters of the American Revolution Committee on Conservation and Thrift, donated the seedling to the Old Kent Chapter, who then donated it to Washington College. The seedling was the grandson of the Washington Elm under which General George Washington first took command of the American army on July 3, 1775 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The seedling was planted on April 26, 1928 in conjunction with the Parent's Day program. The tablet that had been at the base of the Elm was placed there on October 1, 1931 when the Old Kent Chapter rededicated the Elm as a part of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth.

After many years, this seemingly timeless emblem lost its battle against Dutch Elm Disease. (Dutch Elm Disease is caused by a fungus that lives in the sapwood and is then spread by the elm bark beetle. The fungal spores attach to the beetle's bodies and the beetles carry the spores to the healthy parts of the tree when it feeds.) The Elm has been showing symptoms of the disease for several years; however in June and July of this summer there occurred sudden and severe wilting of the Elm's crown. For many years the college has tried to save the tree but the damage was so severe that the college opted to remove the Elm on August 7, 1991 in order to prevent the spread of the disease to any other trees.

Wyman and Bramble Denied Contract Renewals

President Trout Stands By Athletic Director's Decision

by Greg Coss

In early June contract renewal was not granted to Fred Wyman and Holly Bramble, the part-time head coaches of the men's and women's tennis teams, because of what Athletic Director Geoff Miller termed a "move toward assigning full-time coaches to all head coaching positions." Soon afterward the positions were filled by Tom Finnegan as head coach, with Todd Helbling as assistant. Since that time, these actions have been the subject of much controversy.

Many students may be foreign to the subject of the athletic department's recent hiring of several new full-time coaches in an attempt to better serve the student/athlete. This decision came into full force in the latter part of April and carried on into the summer, and by that time most of us were out of touch with the college's happenings. The department feels that a coach needs to be there for the players at all times, which they think can be very difficult for a part-time coach to achieve.

In support of the decision, Athletic Director Geoff Miller stated that "Consultants evaluated the athletic department in 1988 and said that we had an inordinantly large number of part-time head coaches. They examined other areas as well, such as facilities, equipment, and budget allocations. One of the most significant results of this is the construction of the new fieldhouse facility. In other words, we've been working on the self-study recommendations for the past two and a half years. Our most recent focus has been in the area of coaching loads and the issue of part-time coaches."

Now in the fall of '91 the department has done some reshuffling and has created four new full-time coaching positions, which include Helbling as the men's soccer coach and Kim Lessard taking the helm for the men and women swimmers. These moves have caused little disturbance, but the decision not to renew the contracts of Wyman and Bramble, who built their teams from obscurity to national rankings, has raised many eyebrows among the players and their two former coaches.

What has agitated them the most is that they find it hard to believe that anyone could be more "full-time" than Wyman and Bramble have been over the past six years. Senior men's player Andy Bohutinsky said that "what has happened is incredibly sad. We're a very tightly knit group that's been taken apart. Fred has completely turned this program around, but not only that, he's been there for us off the court as well. He barely gets paid for building a terrific program and now they'll replace him with someone who couldn't possibly do as much as Fred has done for us and who will receive more benefits. It just doesn't seem to make sense. I think the decision not to renew Fred's contract because he's a part-time coach is a smoke-screen."

Women's Education Celebrated at Convocation

by Sherry Menton

The focus of last night's Convocation Address, given by President Charles H. Trout, was the celebration of the 100th year of coeducation at Washington College.

Establishing the context in which the momentous decision to admit women was made on September 18, 1891, President Trout spoke about the "Cult of True Womanhood" that dominated 19th century American culture. In the popular imagination, the ideal woman was to be pure, pious, submissive, and heme-centered. Cultivation of the intellect and participation in public affairs, acoording to this conception, were antithetical to women's idealized role.

By the 1890's, however, a number of changes had occurred that had begun to undermine this concetion of women, and it was at this moment that the Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors decided to admit women "on the same terms as men." In making this decision, the College moved toward modernity, toward a recognition of women's capabilities.

At the same time, however, it would be unreasonable to expect that in the early years of coeducation the College could, in a single stroke, overcome the oppressive images of women so prevalent in American culture, and there were indeed what President Trout called "understandable oscillations" in the College's progress.

"Even today," the President concluded, "it is worth asking whether Washington is a coeducational college, or whether it is a place where men and women incidentally happen to go." "In the year ahead," he observed, "we will have many chances to think about this crucial matter."

An honorary degree was conferred upon Mrs. Helen Schaefer Gibson during the Convocation excercises. Mrs. Gibson was the First Lady of Washington College for twenty years, during which time she was instrumental in improving the culural opportunities on campus and in Chestertown. She was one of the founders of the Concert Series, and it was in part her friendship with Sophie Kerr that brought the Sophie Kerr Prize to Washington College.

Awards were also presented to students at Convocation. The Freshman Scholarship Award, given to the student who attains the highest academic average for the freshman year, went to Maria Jerardi. The Alumni Medal for the highest ranking sophomore went to Constance Pope, and the Visitors and Governors Medal, for the highest ranking junior, to Jennifer Del Nero.

The Visitors and Governors ScholarshipAward for the rising junior and senior who have the highest cumulative average went to Constance Pope and Keri Nygaard.

The Middendorf Scholars, two rising seniors chosen for their academic excellence and leadership abilities, were awarded to India Henson and Andrew Bohutinsky.

The Inter-Fraternity-Sorority Loving Cups, won annually by the fraternity and sorority with the highest scholastic average for the preceeding year, this year ws captured by the Zeta Tau Alpha sorority and the Kappa Alpha Order fraternity.

New Faculty Review

by Karyn Iacangelo

There are many new faculty members at Washington College for the upcoming academic year. They represent many different departments ranging from English to Economics.

Dr. Janet Kestenberg-Amighi is a Visiting Assistant Professor of Anthropology, Mr. Jerry W. Wright, Jr. is an Assistant Professor of Business Management, Dr. Audrey Fessler is an Assistant Professor of English, Dr. Joyce B. Johnson is a Lecturer in English, and Dr. Carl Wilson is an Assistant Professor of History.

The Psychology department has two new faces and they are Dr. Michael T. Kerchner, who is an Assistant Professor and Mr. Andrew D. Aprill, who is a Visiting Professor.

The Political Science department also has two new members and they are Ms.

EDITORIAL

Dead on Arrival

The elm touched the lives of many more people than we suspect. Along with the Lit House and the lacrosse team, the elm was one of the campus institutions by which people out in the real world knew Washington College. A friend related to me a story about something that happened to her this summer. She was driving through Annapolis with her car windows down, Washington College bumper sticker on her car, and a total stranger pulled up alongside her on a motorcycle and hollered, "You go to Washington College? Too bad about the elm!"

For the better part of a century the elm was the symbol of Washington College. Will it continue to be? Or will something else take its place? Whatever new symbol is chosen, we would be wise to keep our perspective. For over fifty years we had a wonderful, living monument to the traditions of Washington College. Much talk has been bandied about of late, regarding the elm's supposed "resistance" to Dutch Elm's Disease. We are taking it as a personal affront that our tree, our symbol, has died. Outside of the sphere of the metaphysical, there is no such thing as immortality. Trees catch diseases. So do we all. If we look or even wish for an everlasting object in which to commit our feelings, we are lying to ourselves. We must search for a real, living, dying symbol, not the security of a permanent emblem that would in time become stale and lose its immediacy.

It is exceedingly difficult to create a symbol out of thin air. Symbols are born, not planted. Yet that is what we must now do. A decision of this magnitude should not be made in a vacuum - everyone who has studied or worked here, who has grown to love the elm, should be allowed to contribute their feelings about what course should be taken. Above all, let us listen to the WC freshmen. They never knew the elm, not really. A weekend visit, a picture in the viewbook, doesn't convey the mystique that gradually rubbed off on those of us who lived beside the elm. Even to the least sentimental of us, the elm was a part of our lives, if only as a shadow barely registered in our conscious minds as we walked between buildings. The freshmen never experienced this, and it is for that reason that they, newly arrived though they are, must now lead us in choosing a new embodiment of the soul of Washington College.

The elm tree is dead. An era, almost a legend, is gone. The possibilities await us.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letters that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters must be signed; no anonymous letters will be printed under any circumstances. Students should include with letters their major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarfication be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive by 8 P.M. Tuesday evening for publication in that week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday evening. From the President's Desk...

As Uncle Sam used to put it in more martial times, "Greetings!" — and welcome back to a campus, which, although minus its majestic, ceremonial elm, is one parking lot short of being ready to begin its 210th academic year. Take heart. I am told that the day you read this is the day on which the final blacktop at the north end of campus should be ready to accommodate your vehicles (and mine). As Jimmy Carter was fond of saying, "You can depend on it."

Moreover, Phase I of the Hodson Hall renovation, which will provide you with handsome, new congregating/study space, should be ready by the end of September, and work on the Field House (a.k.a. the Lifetime Fitness Center) is on schedule. Barring an unforeseen setback, this 55,000 square foot structure, with the capacity to accommodate three basketball courts, or three to four tennis courts, and with squash, racquetball, dance/aerobics, weight-training facilities, and a three-lane track, should be ready for second semester use.

When school began a year ago, our attention was riveted upon Iraqui aggression, and the international atmosphere was, to put it mildly, tense. With the right-wing coup in Russia preceding your arrival by a matter of a few days, it appeared that the hard-won détente with the Soviet Union was coming apart. When we compare the trivial concerns that sometimes consume us with what is at stake in Russia, our priorities assume a new perspective. As Academic Year 1991-92 unfolds, let us resolve to distinguish between what counts and what does not. The liberal arts matter. So does hard work and a passion for getting things right — an equation, an argument, a sentence, a short story, a painting, or mastery of a musical score.

The coming year is Washington College's 100th as a coeducational institution, and there will be a number of events to celebrate this significant occasion. I am confident you will enjoy the rich program the Centennial Committee has planned, but apart from this I hope that each and every one of you will contemplate the meaning of co-education. Through the ages, gender relations have seldom been easy. Even in the recent past, Washington College has had its difficulties, many of which have stemmed from the kind of substance abuse that will not be tolerated. Be good to one another. Those who, in 1891, were party to the momentous decision to create an educational institution in which women and men would learn together would thank you. So would the faculty. So would I.

As the year begins I wish you well. Opportunities abound. In the last two years, five new full-time faculty positions have been created, and additional part-time faculty have been retained. Our faculty have introduced or expanded course offerings in diverse fields — Middle Eastern, African, and South Asian politics; Afro-American and African History; neuroscience, Victorian prose; Caribbean and African Literature; Estuarine Biology; Resource Economics; and International Business, to name but a few. Experiment. Explore. Your work is to find your work. In this enterprise, I wish you all the best.

New Editorial Policy

With each new school year comes a chance to start fresh, to reevaluate old attitudes and changem for the better. The Elm has done that, and we would like to make clear what our new editorial policy will be.

The most significant change is that we will no longer be printing unsigned letters to the editor, or printing letters with the author's name withheld. This is due to the problems incurred by last year's staff when they printed an inflammatory letter without a byline. It is the opinion of this year's staff, if a student or staff member feels strongly enough about an issue to make the exary effort of actually writing the Elm a letter, he should be willing to publicly defend the opinion stated therein. The Elm exists to provide a forum for members of the Washington College community to excercise their first amendment rights; it is not the responsibility of the Elm or the Elm staff to shield authors from possible controversy. So send us irate letters, about anything that makes you irate (even, conceivably, our own policy about letter submissions). We will be happy to read your letters, but we will not print them unsigned. 'Nuff said.

The Elm's primary goal for this year, aside from providing competent coverage of school and local events, is to get the WC community more involved in this, your "official college newspaper." Aside from letters to the editor, the Elm will willingly accept commentaries; album, movie, or book reviews;human interest interviews, and anything else you would care to submit. Please let us know as far in advance as possible if you intend to submit an article for ublication, for while it is true that our submission deadline is the Tuesday of the week of publication, we need to know before then that space should be kept open for you.

We are particularly soliciting op/ed pieces for our Campus Voices page this year. It serves little pure two involved and detailed articles if they are written by Elm staffers. We can write editorials anytime. It is your opinion we are after. Everyone does enough complaining around the lunch table (usually over a copy of the Elm, come to think of it), so why don't some of you outspoken, opinionated people speak out in the Elm. Just because an entire generation is telling our entire generation that we're apathetic, doesn't mean we have to prove them right!

Congratulations

to the student achievers who were honored during the Convocation ceremonies last night.

Weekly Absurdity

Ladies and gentlemen, we would like to present.. yet another way for your voice to be heard in he Elm. This is a trial column, nd its continuation will be based ntirely on the sort of feedback we get from you. Send us fan mail, or hate mail, or whatever. Better yet, send us your ideas for absurdities hat ought to appear here. Often ery serious situations contain an lement of the absurd, and this is your space to bring them to light. This is not necessarily a humor column, and its purpose is not to hold any topic up to public ridicule. Are you thoroughly confused as to our intent now? Here, then, s an example:

Isn't it absurd that the Worcester, Somerset, and Wicomico dormitories are collecively called the Cullen dormitoies on even the most recently pdated of campus maps? Presumably, Mr. or Ms. Cullen either donated the money for the building, or was a former president of the college. No problem there - it is only fitting that people who enhance the campus be honored for their contribution. No problem, that is, unless you happen to be a freshman arriving on campus for the first time and searching vainly for your dorm room in Worcester (or Somerset, or Wicomico). Many upperclassmen don't even know where "Cullen Dormitories" are located.

Our campus is confusing enough to begin with. Is it the fire lane or the Cater walk? The ARC, or the CAC, or possibly the CARC? Even the elm tree, whose loss was more widely publicized than any of the Master Plan projects, still appears on campus maps. Couldn't we make life a little simpler, and include the common-usage names for the Cullen dormitories to the campus map? Bewildered freshmen would probably appreciate it.

CAMPUS VOICES - Considering the expense involved, do you think the school should attempt to get another elm tree?

[Due to technical difficulties, we are unable to print photographs along with the following quotes. The regular full-page Campus Voices will be returning next week.]

Alexandra Geller
Freshman
Plymouth, MA

Yes. But I think that the school should look into tree that have been treated for this disease, before they purchase another tree.

Susan Czechowski
Sophomore
Holbrook, NY

Yes. The Elm Tree is a part of the history of Washington College and it's sad to see the tradition end.

Peter Hagen
Senior
Columbia, MD

Yes. Because I think the Elm symbolizes the history and spirit of the college.

Stephany Slaughter
Sophomore
Elkton, MD

If it doesn't come directly out of the college budget, then yes. But there are other things that should be attended to before investing substantial funds for a new Elm Tree.

Gary Bowers
Freshman
Long Green, MD

No. Because there's no point in replacing something that isn't the original.

Scott Graham
Sophomore
Bel Air, MD

Yes. As the great Pharaoh Benjamin T. Hinkle once said, "Plant trees, don't hug them!"

WC Hosts Summer WRITE Program

by Sherry Menton

Did you ever stop to wonder what really goes on at WC during the summer? In the course of our college careers, we all have known or will know somebody who decides to stay in C-town over the summer instead of returning home. Every year, some students remain here during the hottest months to work for the school, or in the Chestertown community. But there's more going on than just work without classes, for in the summer months, when we are complacently sipping lemonade at the beach, the literary tradition of Washington College is carrying on without us.

For six weeks every summer Washington College is host to the WRITE Program, a series of three two-week writing seminars for middle and high school students in Maryland. The seminars begin and end with presentation-style sessions. At the opening, the professors share their writings with their students. At the close, participants in the program show off what they have accomplished. What happens in between is an education unusual at the college level, much less the secondary school level.

Journal writing is integral to both writing programs. At the intermediate level, writing classes are alternated with drama, history, music, or the like. The resultant team teaching provides the young writers with ready-made material for their journals and other writing assignments. Students in the Drama/Writing program, for example, write, produce, and act in their own play as their project. The high school sequence works slightly differently; offering courses such as "Writing Modern Poetry" and "Autobiography."

"We are attempting to create an educational experience that is different from the passive experiences that our students tend to receive the rest of the year," explained Doug Higgins, Director of the WRITE Program.

Sophomore Kathy Mullen was one of several WC students to serve as counselors for the program. "I had been in the WRITE Program when I was younger, so it was fun to come back as a counselor."

Watch the Issues page next weekfor syndicated political cartoonist MacNelly of the Chicago Tribune!

Next Week's Topic

The topic of next week's Campus Voices (complete with pictures) will be:

"Do you believe that the change in the tennis teams' coaching staff was handled properly?"

Anyone wishing to write an op/ed for the Campus Voices page about this topic should contact the Elm by Monday, September 2. Deadline for submission is Tuesday, September 3.

In the World...

Soviet Union

The Soviet Union has been torn apart by the recent coup. This is old news, though the aftermath of the coup was anticipated, the revelations are startling. Supporters of the old regime seem to be on the way out, while those backing Yeltsin and Gorbachev are gaining stength and momentum.

As of Tuesday the Soviet Republics Lithuania, Moldavia, Estonia, and Latvia were starting the procedures of severing the ties which bind them to the communist party as well as to the Republic of Russia. Ukrainia and Byelorussia have declared independence. As for Thadzik, Uzbekistan, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Khazakstan, Georgia, Turkmen, and Kirgiz... they are still in a state of fluctuation, and are currently discussing their futures.

While Yeltsin talks of seeking the right to veto nuclear weapons, he informed the break-away republics that they would not be able to claim any territory belonging to Russia, the largest of the republics.

The Baltic community seeks recognition from the United States so that they might be able to ensure themselves their tentative freedom.

The United States

President Bush is on vacation, but a working vacation none the less. As he claims that the "death knell" of communism has been rung he defers from taking immediate action in recognizing the break-away republics.

The SAT scores have dropped yet again, bringing English scores to an all-time low, with math following right behind.

Annapolis

In Annapolis and on the Eastern Shore, it seems that the Chesapeake Bay Watermen might be ordered to stop the harvesting of oysters while the Bay Foundation sets its plan of rejuvinating the Bay into action. The Watermen are angry; both because their livelihood is at stake, and because they themselves have been working to maintain and stabalize the oyster harvests. The Bay Foundation seems to feel that banning the harvesting of oysters will help to restore their numbers to the Bay, while the Watermen insist that the only way to keep oyster beds productive is to keep harvesting.

Dr. Taylor, Acting Dean, Making Big Plans

by Karyn Icangelo

Dr. John Taylor, Associate Professor of Political Science, is the interim Dean and Provost of Washington College. Having just been appointed to the position at the end of the spring semester, he has had an extremely busy summer. Dr. Taylor's philosophy is simple. According to Taylor, "The Dean has two responsibilities; supporting the faculty, and assessing the curriculum of each department."

Many new and improved programs are being installed for the upcoming academic year. These include enhancement for research faculty, external reviews of departments, and a report to the state on the quality of teaching. Still other programs include revising the student teaching evaluation form, getting re-accredited, expansion of the exchange program, increasing student diversity, and applying once again for a Phi Beta Kappa Charter.

The enhancement for research faculty is taking place in the Chemistry and Psychology departments. A more diverse course load is planned in Chemistry, and a neuroscience program is being developed in the Psychology department.

This coming year, three departments will have an external review done. Departments to undergo this evaluation will be selected soon. It is Dr. Taylor's hope that these reviews will help faculty and staff better their performance in the classroom. Reviews of three different departments will be done next academic year, as well.

Along with the external reviews, a quality-of-teaching report will be submitted to the state early next semester. Again, it is Dr. Taylor's hope that this will help faculty better their performance in the classroom.

Dr. Taylor is also working with faculty and staff to try and revise the student evaluation form. Taylor said that it has been difficult trying to decide on one form that will satisfy everyone, but they are still working on revising the student evaluation form.

Still something else that is being planned for this semester is to get Washington College re-accredited as an institution. Every two years any institution of higher learning in Maryland must get re-accredited by the state.

One concern of Dr. Taylor is the racial diversity in the student body. He hopes to expand the diversity of the student body in coming years. This year, Washington College has eleven black students, three Puerto Rican students and one American Indian student en-

"The Class That Made The Sun Shine"

A Re-Cap of 1991 Graduation Ceremonies

by Clay Eichelberger

The commencement speaker for the class of 1991 was William Baker, president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation and member of the Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors. Environmental concerns were inevitably a part of his speech, which he himself described as being about "truth, liberty, justice, and saving the Bay." Baker went on to urge students to "direct personal ambitions outward, for the good of society, not inward for personal gain." At the end of a school year which saw many students taking part in volunteer work on behalf of the community, it seemed appropriate that Baker praised a commitment to volunteerism, which he called the essence of good leadership. Baker presented the class of 1991 with three challenges: to put an end to poverty, to stop the population explosion, and to protect the environment.

In his first address to a graduating class at Washington College, President Charles H. Trout thanked the class for welcoming him to the college and, in reference to the days of cloudy weather which abated in time for graduation, dubbed the class of '91 "the class that made the sun shine." Other speakers at the ceremony included class president Steve Bruchey, who described the feelings of the class about graduation: "Real life came, knocked on our door, and slapped us in the face."

The Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching went to Kevin M. Brien, an associate professor in the Department of Philosophy and Religion since 1986. The Sears-Roebuck Teaching Excellence Award was captured by Nathan Smith, professor of History since 1956, and Christine Pabone, lecturer in languages since 1964.

The coveted Sophie Kerr Prize was garnered by Robert Thompson. This award goes to the senior showing the greatest ability and promise for success in literary endeavors.

Other senior prizes were the Caitlin and Casey Medals for scholarship, character, and leadership, which went to Steve Bruchey and Donna White, respectively. The Goodfellow Memorial Prize, for science majors with an appreciation for the arts, was awarded to Renée King and Donna White. John Herring and Sherry McGill received the Gold Pentagon Awards for meritorious service to Washington College, and Beth Karukas the Clark-Porter Medal as the senior who most enhanced the quality of campus life. The George Washington Medal and Award, honoring the senior who shows the greatest promise in understanding the value of a liberal education, was bestowed upon Tamara-Diana Braunstein.

Clay Eichelberger graduated as a Drama major in 1991, and is currently appearing in "A Funny Thing Happened On The Way To The Forum" in Ocean City.

Josephine the Fly

by Tanya Allen

"Washington College is a great place—you'll love it!" Napoleon and Josephine were flying together, side-by-side. They'd already covered several hundred miles that day, and Josephine's wings were getting tired. "As flies, we fit right in there!" Napoleon went on excitedly. "It's the most politically-correct place in the world!"

"It is?" Josephine said wearily.

"Of course! What other sort of place would have a Trout for a president?"

"They have?" Josephine was faking her enthusiasm, but Napoleon couldn't tell. "Really?"

"Yeah!" And get this—they have a Young-Wolff in the English department; and the director of planning and special projects is a Baer! Plus, the Phys-Ed students are taught by Fall, and the writing students by Day...Isn't that beautiful?"

"Sure." Josephine said.

"And the students party at a place called Newt's!"

"Wow."

"And talk about friendly; last year, when the college newspaper didn't meet the student's standards, they got a Pat-on-the-back! This is such a great place! Josephine, you're going to love it!"

Josephine nodded and kept on flapping. She and Napoleon made a handsome couple—both cultured, well-educated house-flies. They had met at a bologna sandwich, which had been left lying on a bookshelf in a Connecticut library. The two had fallen in love over that sandwich, and afterwards Napoleon had invited Josephine to fly with him back to his home in Washington College.

"Washington College is a wonderful place, a wonderful place!" Napoleon repeated. "You'll love it there! Just wait until you meet my family. We all live together in the great Elm..."

"The Elm?"

"Oh, yes! The Elm! It's the descendant of the Elm tree which was planted on the spot where George Washington himself stood, back in the 1700's!"

"George Washington! Wasn't he...."

"The father of our country! There is a big statue of him on the school grounds, a little bit away from the Elm. It's a wonderful statue—all of the Washington College administrators and faculty worship it!"

"Worship?"

"Yes! When all of the students are asleep, the faculty, deans, and custodians all shuck off their clothes and dance around it naked!"

"Are you serious?"

"Of course! In fact, they got the idea from the Washington College students, who shuck their clothes frequently!"

"Oh?"

"Yeah! Especially when they're pledging certain fraternities or celebrating May day....Hey!" he exclaimed suddenly, "I think I see the school! Yes! Yes! I do!"

Josephine felt a rush of relief and buzzed on eagerly. Napoleon was flying ahead of her, "Yes! Yes! I see it...I see the Lit. House...there it is, Josephine! Look! Look! Do you see it?"

"I see it, Napoleon! I see it!"

"And there's the crosswalk, and there's a squished sophomore lying on the crosswalk, and there's Kent House, ex-Freshman men's dorm, now home of all sorts of crazy creative types! And...and...turn here, Josephine, there's K.A.! And students stumbling drunkenly in front of K.A.! And there's the CAC! And people passed out around the CAC after having multiple cardiac arrests over the ridiculously high cost of their textbooks! And there's the dining hall! And people walking away from the dining hall with take-out trays heaped with globs of Washington College's famous Vegetarian Lasagna! And there's the performing arts building! And here's the library, and coming up...coming up should be the Elm! The great, beautiful, wonderful Elm! Get ready, Josephine, in a moment you're going to see the most wonderful tree in the world, get ready, get ready, get...."

"Napoleon? What is it? What's wrong?"

But Napoleon had fainted and fallen to the ground. The great Elm, descendent of the tree under which George Washington stood when he accepted command of the Continental army; benevolent shade-giver of almost two centuries worth of students; home of Napolean-the-fly; most beloved piece of vegetation on the Washington College campus; was...gone.

WC'ers Active in Summer Theater

by Cindy Young

Most college students spent their summer flipping burgers or working with the frustrated public in jobs that are almost as appealing as doing a term paper. But some Washington College students had jobs that actually related to their majors and life ambitions.

Some lucky WC students spent time working in the Summer Stock program with the Church Hill Theatre. Summer Stock continues a tradition of summer theatrical performances dating back to the years after WWII. These were local performances, usually held conveniently in the barns of nearby farmers, and gave actors something to do for the summer when most theater companies shut down.

This summer the play "Blithe Spirit" by Noel Coward was performed in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of its opening in London. It played from July, 1941 to March, 1946, one of the longest-running comedies in the London theatre. W.C. students among the cast and crew included sophomore Abrah Wilberding in the role of Edith, freshman Vicky Homan and Wilberding doing props, sophomore Bruce Alexander and freshman Lawrence Coleman doing lighting, and sophomore Brian Coleman with the sound crew. In addition, producer Sylvia Maloney had been a part-time lecturer here at WC.

"I came to appreciate what a real professional theater company has to do," Wilberding said of her experience. "It was nice to get paid, but it was a lot of hard work. I was surprised at the audiences we got— that a small-town theater attracted as many people as it did. It was a confidence booster to just say 'Yess'm' through a scene and hear the audience cracking up."

Otherworlds

While the rest of us have been standing in line to buy textbooks, one of the campus literary magazines has already gotten off the ground.

Otherworlds is now accepting submissions of fiction, poetry, book reviews, and letters. The magazine incorporates the different genres of romance, science-fiction, fantasy, mystery, western, and horror. Copies from last year are available in the Lit. House.

Otherworlds has been completely redesigned, according to editor Raph Koster. Depending on favorable response, will be published twice this year. Submissions should be given to Raph Koster or Sara Hunt through campus mail, Quick-mail, the Lit. House mailbox, or in person.

Norman James Sound System Refined

Movies Now Free, Four Days Weekly

by Cindy Young

Those of you who saw "Home Alone" at the Norman James theater this past week may have gotten a pleasant surprise— the incredible sound. The Audio Visual Technology department worked hard this summer to bring this new experience of quality sound to the WC campus.

According to Raph Koster, the student director in the A.V. department, funds had been allocated for changes in Norman James nine or ten years ago, but no beneficial change was immediately apparent. One problem was that the speakers weren't even aimed toward the audience.

So this summer, devoted members of the A.V. department, notably assistant director John White ('91), took time to move around a number of existing speakers. All of this was done on no budget and, as Koster said, they are "trying to utilize our resources." The new speaker arrangement was tested before an audience of most of the administration with "Roger Rabbit" on videotape and a Disney film. The response was most favorable.

In addition to work on Norman James, Audio-Visual has formulated and begun work on a number of projects, including setting up a small video-editing station, a Midi music studio, plus re-designing how A.V. will work this year.

"...more first-run films than ever before..."

Other trial changes in the film series are free movies shown four nights a week (Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday), and more first-run films than ever before. Another treat for W.C. movie-goers is incidental music played before the film for those who want to go early for the best seats.

All we need now is good picture quality, and a remedy for this has been suggested already— repositioning the projectors and re-doing the balcony of Norman James— and then an offer of free, generously-buttered popcorn would guarantee a hit.

SPORTS

Tennis

spoke along the same lines. "These guys have put everything into the program and have not gotten the respect they deserve. In the Spring of 1988 our team had to forfeit our season because we didn't have enough players. In 1991 we're ranked thirteenth in the nation and take the MAC title. We're all pretty upset at how Fred and Holly have been treated as just 'part-time' coaches."

Coach Wyman had a good deal to add in their defense. "We were the most full-time of anyone. We were with our kids all the time. Any personal problem, they came to us. Counseling outside of tennis, like help in deciding a major or personal problems, I would always give assistance there. It's like I was a father to them. I took a lot of time out of my practice [dental] to help the team, so how can you say I wasn't full-time? We worked very hard to get our players here, hours and hours of recruiting. We were there for our players twenty-four hours a day."

But obviously, there is another side to the story. President Trout has been under tremendous strain in handling this issue, because he says the moment the decision was made, letters of complaint came from all sources. These letters even made the President reconsider the decision, but he admitted that in actuality there were "too many problems not to take action." President Trout and Miller both mentioned that the team received secondary sanctions in 1989 for a player's acceptance of a cash prize in a tournament and illegal usage of a coach's automobile. It is hoped that after such an incident a team will learn from its mistake and uphold a wholesome reputation. But the President points out that this was simply not the case with Washington College's program.

"Our primary reasons not to renew the contracts of the tennis coaches are the need for full-time coaches and the equity load issue, since we had developed a tendency to have men coaching only one sport, where women were coaching two or three. The other concerns we have are over student-athlete access to automobiles, meals, housing, and phone calls for their benefit."

These other concerns prompted Washington College to issue a self-report to the NCAA towards the end of July. What upsets the coaches and players so much is that they claim that the administration made the move without consulting them first.

Miller and President Trout say this simply isn't the case, but Coach Bramble said "All the administration has done is accuse us. All they had to do was approach us first."

Coach Wyman added, "We didn't get due process. No one ever came to me and said do this or don't do that. There has been a distortion of what has happened because we weren't approached. The issue about secondary sanctions is not fair to bring up. One player was suspended for one match for something which I shouldn't be held responsible. These possible violations I never knew were even violations. I was never confronted, I just received a letter after we self-reported. This could have been handled in a more professional and caring manner. I'm just bothered by the lack of ingratitude. This whole situation is completely absurd."

But President Trout wants it to be known that these concerns (which are "possible" violations, prompting the self-report rather than the violations being discovered by the NCAA) are minor ones in comparison to the need for "institutional control over intercollegiate programs." Although this control exists, the President also said that "the college will continue to support tennis as vigorously as possible." The administration had kind words for Mr. Wyman and Mrs. Bramble, further indicating the difficult decision which was made. Miller stated that "Fred made an effort to make meetings, his energy level was very high, and he developed some outstanding teams. This is not an issue involving personality. It's a decision with the best long-term interests of students and the department in mind." President Trout added that "Fred is a very likeable guy. His players rally around him. It's been a tough decision, but it had to be made." Both also agreed that Holly has done a magnificent job for her team, but again that it is in the best interests of the school not to renew her contract.

However, those players that rallied around Fred and Holly very possibly will not be playing at all in the fall season and perhaps in the spring as well. The man who in six years turned Washington College's program around has had a huge impact on these decisions. The same can be said for Holly Bramble, the Washington College alumni who has taken the women's team to heights nearly as great. Where does this leave the men's and women's teams? In talking briefly with new coach Tom Finnegan, he revealed that he had no knowledge of any of the players not returning to action. Subsequent attempts to contact him were unsuccessful. Next week, the Elm hopes to have reactions from more of the players. The main topic that will be discussed amongst them will be how they feel Coach Finnegan will be able to handle two tennis coaching jobs along with being head basketball coach. Tom Finnegan will be reached for comment on this subject as well. Along with this, there will be further player reactions on the decision not to renew the contracts of coaches Wyman and Bramble, and whether it will in fact keep them from participating in the tennis team this fall.

Soccer Kicks Into Helbling Era

by Julie Greene

The Washington College soccer program has a long history of tradition and spirited determination. The 1991 season hopes to see this tradition restored with eight key returning players from last year's squad under the leadership of the first full-time soccer coach at WC since Ed Athey stepped down in 1982. Athey had a remarkable .627 winning percentage spanning his 31 seasons as head coach.

The new head coach is Todd Helbling, who is replacing Peter Allen after his one year reign. Helbling interned at WC last year to complete his requirements for an M.S. in Sports Management for the University of Massachusetts. He will also be the assistant coach for the men's and women's tennis teams here at WC. He was a nationally ranked Division III tennis player while attending Millsaps College, where he obtained a B.B.A. in Administration.

Helbling's internship last year enabled him to become familiar with the facilities and the school's athletes. Helbling notes that this has allowed for a closer relationship with the players. Returning to the squad for the fourth year, Kevin Kelly reported enthusiastically that he thinks coach Helbling is great, and that, "He's gotten the program back on its feet again."

Agreeing with Kelly was co-captain John Seal, who said, "Todd has brought more enthusiasm to the program than has not been here the last few years. We are back." He added that it was a "good feeling to know we have a full-time coach now."

Joining Helbling as assistant soccer coach is his cousin Carl Helbling, who will be working specifically with the defense. Carl Helbling graduated from John Carroll University in Cleveland, where he played soccer for four years.

The new coach remarks that this year's squad has a lot of potential. That potential is led by four returning seniors: Benji Ward, Andrew Prevost, and co-captains Kevin Kelly and John Seal. "Benji had a great first week. He is hustling and is everywhere on the field," states Helbling.

Helbling noted that the team says they feel they are in the best physical shape they have been in during a pre-season. Co-captain Kevin Kelly said that the team was told at the end of last year that they would be expected to prepare themselves physically over the summer to strengthen their running game. The squad is conditioning every morning at six a.m. to keep in shape for this season.

Another starter who is returning this season is goalie Kyle Hutchinson. The junior replaced Jim Myers last season when Myers injured his knee at Albright. Hutchinson finished the last half of the season with 59 saves.

Helbling notes that this season's biggest problem will be depth. "For a variety of reasons, there are several experienced soccer players on campus who have decided not to play this season." Currently, there are seventeen players on the squad.

Commenting on the team's scrimmage this past Monday with Del Tech, Helbling stated that "the numbers have hurt us. We can't even get eleven players practicing together." In practices the squad has been split to seven on seven, and their scrimmage versus Del Tech was their first opportunity to play together as a team.

First game goals were accomplished. Coach Helbling says that the mistakes made in the scrimmage were simple ones. They needed to know where their weak spots were, since they had not performed together before. Also, most of the players had to run the game for ninety minutes with little rest during that time due to the short bench.

"We have a great opportunity," said Kelly. "Our defense held up well, and our offense will be potent once they get the chance to handle the ball together."

Seal commented that he thinks the team "will surprise a lot of people in the MAC [Middle Atlantic Conference]. The college community and Chestertown will have something to look forward to in years to come."

Helbling feels next year will be more of a building season. "The part-time coaches in the past did not have the opportunity to focus on recruiting." Helbling, however, will be able to spend more time recruiting, as a full-time coach. He plans on scanning Delaware, northern Virginia, southern New Jersey, and the Philadelphia area, as well as Maryland; he thinks this is an untapped area of talent.

The team would like to extend its appreciation to the fans who came out to watch the scrimmage Monday. Coach expects alumni support to be strong again this year, once the regular season starts.

The Shoremen's first home game will be the following Tuesday versus St. Mary's College at 4 p.m.

Volleyball Digging for Respect

by Greg Coss

In 1990 the volleyball program was in a transition year, according to Coach Penny Fall. Yet she was very impressed with how the season went, mainly due to the performances of the veterans and their affect on the team as a whole. "I was very pleased with the veterans. They had excellent practices, which gave things an uplift for the fall."

To whom does the squad turn to for a spark this year? Again Coach Fall mentions the seniors, such as Laurie McClellan, an all-MAC selection last year. Teresa Saganga is recovering from ankle surgery and trying to regain her hitting, which the coach admits would be a real plus for the team. Finally, Claudia Baldwin is a player who Coach Fall feels "gets better each practice. She is an excellent hitter and passer." Juniors Miriam Jecelin, Julie Dill, and Dawn Manion will also likely be on the floor a majority of the time. These six players mentioned are the likely starters for the squad, with promising freshmen such as Beverly Diaz seeing a lot of action, and also transfer Niurka Goenaga adding to the glaring depth of this year's team.

If there is a concern about this team it is its size compared to other schools. This could pose problems when facing powerhouses such as Dickinson, Franklin and Marshall, and Western Maryland. But the coach says that the players can make up for this because they have the heart and are very well conditioned.

The MAC is the most competitive division in the nation for Division III volleyball, and consists of 25 teams. Coach Fall and Manager Brett McCrea both see a possible high finish in the standings on the horizon, but it will take a lot of hard work and determination on the part of the players. "We've got a lot of people who know how to play," says McCrea, "it's certainly a possibility we could finish as high as tenth." A trip to the MAC tournament (only 8 teams go) would make coach Fall "ecstatic," but the team can't look that far ahead. Matches against Salisbury State and Anne Arundel on September 11 will prove to be big early tests for a very promising team. Come out and support this team with this home opener which includes a matchup with Notre Dame; the action all starting at 6:00 p.m. in Cain Gymnasium.

Frosh Class Profile

For those of you out there who are statistically minded, here is a brief rundown on the freshman class. The Class of 1995 has students representing 23 states and four foreign countries. This is the greatest diversity in a class that Washington College has seen in many years.

There are 104 men and 121 women, which puts the Freshman class total at 225. The class is 89% Caucasian, 5% Black and 3% Hispanic.

Freshman represent the states of Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Washington D.C., Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Massachusetts, Maryland, Maine, North Carolina, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Puerto Rico, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and Vermont. As usual, the majority of students come from Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.

The Freshman class has one student from Bermuda, one from Kenya, one from Spain, and one from England.

As we come to know these freshman and they come to know Washington College, the personality of the class will speak louder than statistics.

tering as Freshman or transfers, which is a step in the right direction. Dr. Taylor would also like to see the exchange program expanded. A new exchange program has been set up with a university in Madrid and Dr. Taylor would also like to see more students from those colleges that we have exchange programs with come here to the United States.

Dr. Taylor also has plans to apply once again for a Phi Beta Kappa charter, which is a national honor society. According to Dr. Taylor, Washington College does not have a sufficient student body to meet the requirements for a charter, but he hopes that this year will be different. WC does however have ODK, which is another nationally recognized honor society in which several students are a member.

The Elm may be gone but it is far from forgotten. The final hours of the Elm have been captured on both video and film and the library has a display celebrating its life. The display contains some photographs and a tombstone that was carved from the last piece of the Elm (the piece has been treated to preserve it). But there remains one last question – since the college newspaper changed its name from the Washington Collegian to the Washington Elm in 1930, what do we call the newspaper now?

Construction Nearing Completion

by Karyn Iacangelo

The "Master Plan" for the beautification of the Washington College campus, envisioned almost three years ago, is now reality. Clint Baer, Director of Planning, said, "The progress that has been made is terrific. The final stages of the Master Plan have begun!"

Among the biggest jobs facing construction workers were the removal of the William Smith parking lot, the renovation of the North Lot, the refurbishing of Kent House, and the restoration of the O'Neill Literary House.

The William Smith parking lot was removed in order to design and build a pedestrian mall to give students easier access to the Casey Academic Resource Center. Grass has been planted around the mall, walkways will be put in by the end of October, and by the end of September, lampposts will be put in place around the mall. The North Lot by the New Dorms is also being redone in order to expand the lot to meet the increased demand for student parking. The North lot should be completed by the beginning of next week.

Along with the pedestrian mall and the removal and renovation of two parking lots, two buildings on campus were refurbished. In Kent House, new carpeting was put in, the walls painted and the bathrooms redone. At the O'Neill Literary House the kitchen was enlarged, and all new appliances were installed. A new addition to the Press Room was made along with more storage and computing space.

By October 1, there will be a student study lounge open in Hodson Hall. The lounge will have sofas and chairs for students to study or just relax in.

Dianne Portelance, and Dr. John R. Rink, both of whom are visiting professors for the upcoming year.

The Economics department has one new member and he is a Lecturer who will be here in the Spring Term, Dr. John H. Cumberland.

There are also several professors who will be on sabbatical during the course of the upcoming year. Sue Tessem, a professor in the Art department will be on sabbatical in the Spring. Also absent will be Garry Clarke, professor of music.

Professors who are on sabbatical this semester include Amzie Parcell, professor of music, Tom An, professor of Political Science, and Rosette Roat who will be on sabbatical all year.

Several professors will be on leave for the upcoming year. They are Michael Malone, professor of Economics, Jeanette Sherbondy, professor of Anthropology, Jeff Chaffin, head of the Miller Library, and Joachim Scholtz will be on leave in the Spring term.

Fitness Center Almost Ready To Run

by Greg Coss

The Athletic Department has made an excellent decision in building a new fitness center. Now the question is, when does it finally open so we don't have to worry anymore about being crammed into the sauna we call a weight room? In speaking with Athletic Director Geoff Miller it now looks very promising that the center could be finished by the early stages of the spring semester. Miller said the "Construction schedule would estimate a January finishing date, but weather and access to materials needed for construction could delay this estimate."

The major part of the Ben Johnson Fitness Center will be over thirty- thousand feet of open space, which will include a three lane jogging track on its perimeter. On the inside of this space will be an option for either four tennis courts or three basketball courts, with the time being split evenly for the two sports. Also included will be three squash and two racquetball courts.

In addition there will be a four-thousand foot weight room, which is more than twice the size of the current facility, a two-thousand square foot aerobic dance area, and locker rooms for students and faculty with saunas. The total area of the building - approximately forty-six thousand feet. The school has been recognized as one with nationally ranked teams in basketball, tennis, and lacrosse, to name a few. Therefore it seems logical that they should have the equipment needed to continue their success. Washington College has taken the step it needs to give their athletes that little extra edge, which is important when considering how close the lacrosse team (2nd in the nation on many occasions) and the basketball team (3rd in nation 1989-90) have come to the top of the heap.

Student Activities Director Terri Turmel Meets Social Committee

by Karyn Iacangelo

The first meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee On Campus Social Life Issues was held yesterday in the Casey Academic Forum. This meeting was a chance for student leaders to meet the new Director of Student Activities, Terri Turmel. Among the issues discussed were the Washington College Alcohol Policy regarding campus organization parties, the conversion of the basement of Hodson Hall, and the merger of the Coffee House and the Snack Bar.

This year, there is a new form required to register and plan each organization's events. The form must be filled out before an organization is allowed to have a party, and must be signed by a representative of the organization, Terri Turmel, Dean McIntyre, and if needed the WCDS, if they are providing any refreshments. Forms will be taken on a first come, first serve basis and events will be scheduled in the same manner.

The conversion of the basement in Hodson Hall is on schedule and according to Dean McIntyre, it will be a casual version of Hynson Lounge. It will be furnished with sofas, chairs, and study carrels. Turmel's office will be moved down there upon the completion of the project. There is also a plan in the works to merge the Coffee House and the Snack Bar. The hope is to build a sort of outdoor amphitheater for organizations to use for parties an social events. This would provide a space for non-residence hall parties to take place.

Also discussed at the meeting was the question of legal liability for student drinking in the residence halls. The problem with residence hall drinking is that if students are caught, WC might have problems with our insurance holder. In place now is a rule that there are to be no kegs in any residence hall, however, one day liquor licences may be granted to those people in residence halls that are not covered under the college's liquor license.

Dean McIntyre stressed that the rules concerning the alcohol policy have been bent in some cases for those campus events that are held annually. Amoung these are the Heineken Party, the Kappa Alpha Beach Bash, and the Renaissance Dinner. Alcohol is served at all three of these function and in the case of the Heineken Party and the KA Beach Bash, the buildings in which these parties are held are not covered under the college's liquor license.

Terri Turmel was hired primarily for scheduling events and facilitating the process of event scheduling. She will also be advising student organizations, and the SGA. Turmel has also planned to give leadership training workshops for student leaders. Later on this year, or next semester, Turmel will hopefully be hiring and training employees for the new Student Center. There are also plans to put a new game room/arcade in the Coffee House. She would also like to establish a Board of Directors for the Student Center comprised of faculty members, and a representative from the campus on how the college can best utilize the Student Center. She will also be developing new policies and budgets.

Turmel would like to see more diversity in the activities that are planned on campus. Bands seem to be the most popular form of entertainment, and Turmel would like to see other things as well. She would also like to see sponsored ski and Spring Break trips for students.

The Committee On Campus Social Life was formed about ten years ago under the direction of Dr. Garry Clarke, acting President at the time. The committee meets about three or four times a year to discuss student concerns with student leader on campus.

Shooting at Pavillion

by Kris Wallenburg

Early Saturday morning, shots were fired at a Chestertown reggae dance at Wilmer Park (the Washington College pavilion). According to Police Chief Wayne Bradley, an argument broke out shortly after a group of Grasonville residents decided to join the dance. As a result, a Grasonville man allegedly pulled out a hand gun and shot five people and assaulted a sixth. Police responded to the scene at 1:01am.

William Beach, 19 years old, was arrested by Sgt. Marcellene Beck at 4:00pm Sunday for the attempted mur-

Finnegan Trying to Save Tennis Program

Former Tennis Stars Won't Return For Fall Season

by Greg Coss

Players from last year's men's and women's tennis teams are for now former players, having deciding unanimously to pass on the fall season. A number of male players are deciding to leave Washington College altogether after this semester. The main reasons for the moves were due to the feeling that one coach, Tom Finnegan, can't coach three sports in an efficient manner, and the belief that the removal of their former coaches, Fred Wyman and Holly Bramble, was completely unjustified.

The decision to make Tom Finnegan head coach and Todd Helbling his assistant for the men's and women's tennis teams is final. The need for a full-time coach has been emphasized by the President and Athletic Director. Finnnegan is also the men's basketball coach (this being the equivalent of coaching two sports already, since it runs two seasons), has a full teaching load of physical education classes, and has an administrative load to carry. What has last year's tennis players upset is that they don't believe one man can handle all of these responsibilities and give all of the players the attention they deserve. Opposing this argument is the fact Tom Finnegan is well equipped to handle responsibilities of this magnitude.

First arriving on the coaching scene in 1970, WC alumnus Tom Finnegan was hired to head the men's basketball team. The following year he was given the position of men's baseball coach as well, in spite of the overlapping of these two sports. In 1974 a new baseball coach was hired, but once again Finnegan was faced with dual coaching responsibilities when he accepted the head job for men's tennis, a job he held along with being basketball coach until 1985. In 1975, Coach Finnegan began the women's tennis program, which he coached for two years. In those two years,Coach Finnegan was the head of three sports programs, a situation that he faces again now.

Another testy year for Finnegan was in 1985 when he was named Associate Director of Athletics. Some of the responsibilities of this position were scheduling for teams, the purchasing of transportation, and setting up budgets for every team. Finnegan was also helping out with the REC sports program at the time. At this point the school decided that Finnegan, with all of his responsibilities of teaching, coaching, and administrative moves, would need some help, and this is when Fred Wyman was hired in 1985 to assist the men's tennis team.

Wyman and Finnegan switched roles in 1986, and in 1987 the movement of coach Penny Fall from women's tennis (which she coached from 1977-86) to softball prompted the athletic department to hire Holly Bramble as an assistant coach to Finnegan for the women's tennis team. By the end of the year Finnegan was the assistant for both teams. According to Finnegan, there was the understanding with former Athletic Director Ed Athey and former President Cater that there was an attempt to make a smooth transition in making Wyman and Bramble the new head coaches. The volume of Finnegan's duties was not involved in this decision; it was apparent at the time that Wyman and Bramble would be good additions. As they gained experience, Finnegan's role was lessened until his services were no longer required.

Finnegan's ability to handle many responsibilities is evident, but what do the players have to say about the situation?

The players' discussion was a very emotional one, with all the players involved expressing their respects for Finnegan but their strong disapproval of the changes.

"I have a lot of respect for Finnegan, but really, you can't take two nationally ranked teams and replace the coaches with the basketball coach. I also want to know how they can expect us to play under any coach without due process or any compromise, [like] possibly making former coaches assistants. This is all bullshit," stated Trevor Hurd, a member of the men's starting rotation.

"Everyone respects Tom Finnegan's abilities as coach," said Kristi Karnes, "this is hardest decision we've ever had to

OPINION/EDITORIAL

Sleepy Little Chestertown?

We all knew when we chose Washington College that it resides in a small town. The Main Street, USA atmosphere was an attraction to many of us who were tired of living in cities where you needed a map just to find where you'd parked your car. Others had never lived in a big city and never plan to, preferring to live where they can know your neighbors and walk across town in under fifteen minutes. For a considerable number of WCers, the out-of-the-way location was undesirable, an objection that nevertheless was overcome. Still, we all thought we knew what to expect of Chestertown. How may of us expected shootouts at our boathouse?

(At this point, all readers who were not on campus during Labor Day weekend, or who otherwise are ostriches, please see the front page article about the shooting.)

WCers recognize that Chestertown is not a utopia - crimes do occur here, and we try to protect ourselves against them. We lock our doors against theft, and at night our buildings and dorms are locked against intruders. We know that assaults do sometimes occur, and our perennial complaints about what constitutes sufficient lighting on campus spring from our awareness of possible assaults.

We take precautions, and think we are safe. But how many of us prop doors at night for the Subway guy, or walk out to the Computing Center alone? Small town crimes we expect, and we think we can deal with them, but the big city atmosphere is rapidly encroaching on sleepy little Chestertown. Annapolis is now considered a bedroom community for Washington, DC and Baltimore commuters. The people who thought that Annapolis was the end of the earth are moving to the Eastern Shore, and they are bringing violent crime with them.

City dwellers acquire some odd habits. Currently, in Washington, DC it is considered safer to drive through the city, especially North Capitol Street, with your car windows rolled down. This seems to contradict the standard "windows rolled up, doors locked" drill that most people employ while in a city, but Washingtonians have learned from bitter experience that the chances of being killed from the shrapnel of a richocheted bullet are greater than your chances of being hit straight-on.

It is doubtful that we will be hearing "Crossfire" around campus anytime soon, but we would be wise to remember that Chestertown is not as safe as our shady trees and brick walks indicate.

The Washington College Elm is the official student newspaper of Washington College. It is published every Friday during the academic year with the exception of vacation and exam weeks.

Editorials are the responsibility of the Editor-in-Chief. Signed columns, commentaries, letters, editorials, and editorial cartoons represent the opinions of their authors and are not necessarily the views held by the Elm Staff.

All letters to the Editor are read with interest, but due to space limitations, the editors cannot always publish every letter received, and some might be edited for length. Letter that are printed are published as received, without editing for spelling, punctuation and grammer. Letters must be signed; no anonymous letters will be printed under any circumstances. Students should include with letters their major and year, faculty and staff their department and position. All letters should be limited to 600 words in length, and should, if possible include a day and evening telephone number should clarification be needed. Letters may be deposited in the marked box outside the Elm office in the basement of Reid Hall, or sent via campus mail. Please address letters to the Editor-in-Chief. Letters become the property of the Elm, and must arrive by 8 P.M. Tuesday evening for publication in that week's issue.

The offices of the newspaper are located in the basement of Reid Hall. Business hours are 7:00-10:00 Monday and Tuesday evenings and 7:00-12:00 Wednesday evening. The Business Manager is also available from 1:00 to 3:00 in the afternoon on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. The phone number is (301) 778-2800, ext. 321.

Letters to the Editor

Dean Taylor Corrects Elm Article

To the Editor:

The first issue of the Elm is a worthy effort, and I applaud the serious attention it gives to many topics of importance to the College. I must, however, regretfully, correct several inaccuracies in last week's article based on your reporter's interview with me.

I have far more than two responsibilities; my two major responsibilities are supporting the faculty and overseeing the curriculum of the college as a whole (not "assessing the curriculum of each department").

We are not involved in "enhancement for research faculty"— we have no research as opposed to teaching faculty— but it is my hope to enhance the possibilities for faculty research. That effort applies to all departments, not just Chemistry and Psychology. The initiatives currently under consideration in those departments, moreover, deal essentially with curricular innovation, not faculty research, and the Chemistry proposal is for a more interdisciplinary introductory sequence, not "a more diverse course load."

The report that the College is to file with the Maryland Higher Education Commission this (not next) semester must deal broadly with the assessment of teaching-learning outcomes, not simply "the quality of teaching." Similarly, external reviews of departments focus comprehensively on all aspects of their operations, not just on teaching performance. While we must all continue to strive for the highest quality of instruction, in neither of these contexts did I express any view that would justify your article's implication of inordinate concern about the performance of faculty in the classroom.

One might well ask what "the student evaluation form" is; the form which we are in the process of revising is that on which students record their reactions to courses and instructors.

We are not working on getting reaccredited this semester, nor is every institution of higher learning in Maryland required to be reaccredited by the state every two years. Such institutions must be reaccredited every ten years by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Schools, the regional agency to which we belong. The reaccreditation process for Washington College will commence next semester and culminate in 1993-94.

The College is indeed pleased that more minority students are choosing to enroll. In addition to the eleven blacks, three Puerto Ricans, and one American Indian that you mention, there are also among our new students four other Hispanics and six Asians.

While we would life very much to obtain a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa for Washington College, we are at this point only in the process of deciding whether the time for an application is ripe, and in any case, the initiative rests with the members of Phi Beta Kappa on the faculty, not with the administration. There are some potentially troublesome obstacles to a successful application, but the notion that "Washington College does not have a sufficient student body" is not one of them.

Finally, my faculty rank is Professor, not Associate Professor.

The Elm bears a great responsibility for informing the college community, and I trust that it will continue to strive for the highest possible standard of accuracy in doing so.

Sincerely,
John B. Taylor
Acting Provost and Dean

The Elm apologizes if clarity was lost in the course of paraphrasing the interview with Dr. Taylor.

Maintenance Praised for Quick Service

Dear Editor:

I had to comment on the speed and efficiency of the maintenance department since this semester began.

At the beginning of my first week back I handed in my room inspection form, citing a broken drawer handle and a damaged closet door. By the end of the week maintenance had fixed the handle and I had a brand new closet door in my room.

This morning I woke up to find that maintenance was painting two rooms on my hallway, whose condition had also been cited in room inspection forms.

I have also heard from other students who have had quick repair jobs done these past few weeks who were mightily impressed with the department's new efficiency. This high quality of service has not always been present in the past.

I would like to thank the maintenance department publicly for a job well done. Keep up the good work.

Thank you,
Julie E. Greene

Corrections

There were several inaccuracies in the Peer Advisor insert in the *Elms*first issue. Due to space constraints, we are unable to reprint the photographs of the mislabled students. Mislabled were Peter Jons, Andy McKim, and Christine Coyne. Photos were missing for Dan Kretzer and Amy Caddle. The Elm apologizes for the confusion.

Weekly Absurdity

Isn't it absurd that some WCDS entrees have names that can put you off when the food itself wouldn't?

Take, for example, the "Walnut Ravioli in Sauce" offered to us this past Tuesday evening. Now, personally, I'm sort of fond of this dish. I'm always happy to see it on the menu, because I know there will be something at the Dining Hall that appeals to me.

In spite of this, I can't keep myself from wondering, "Just what is 'Walnut Ravioli'?" Does "walnut" refer to the size of the ravioli? They are teaspoon-sized, as opposed to regular ravioli, which are big and round (except when, of course, they are big and square). Wouldn't it just be easier to say "bite-sized ravioli" or "mini ravioli" or something along those lines, without resorting to nutty comparisons?

Does "walnut" refer to the filling within the ravioli? I have always thought that ravioli, by default, was cheese-filled, unless of course it says "meat-filled." No walnut flavoring is discernible, which isn't suprising since the pasta is covered with one variety of sauce or another. So if "walnut" does refer to sone sort of flavoring, if not an actual nut, inside the ravioli, what's the point? You can't taste it anyway, and the food distributor is probably charging the school extra for the fancy flavoring that we can't even tell is there.

Now, none of this is meant as any criticism of the WCDS. It has been my misfortune to partake of what is called, with tongue planted firmly in cheek, food at many other colleges and universities, and by comparison WCDS is the Four Seasons. It becomes habit to grumble about school food, regardless of our true opinion of it. But think back to your high school days of eating molded spaghetti plopped on your tray with an ice cream scoop. We really haven't got it bad at all.

And by the way, try the chocolate ice from the frozen yougurt machine if you get a chance - it's marvellous!

QUESTION - Do you believe that the change in the tennis teams' coaching staff was handled properly?

Steve Proakis
Richmond, VA
Sophomore

"I feel confident about the choices of the new coaches and I think that if there are any NCAA violations that the school will handle it properly."

Nancy Whitman
Wilmington, DE
Sophomore

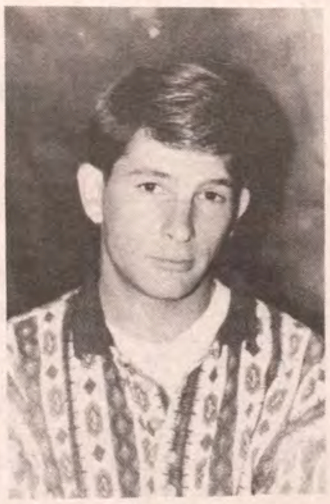
"Because it is obvious that many other factors enter into this issue besides the issue of a full time coaching staff, I must disagree. If President Trout is concerned about "possible violations," then he should take a closer look at students on academic scholarships who can't hold a 3.0 GPA but do play lacrosse."

Jessi Boone
Fallston, MD
Freshman

"If a thorough investigation finding concrete faults with the previous coaching staff was conducted, it was handled properly. However, if there was not just cause for a change in the staff, perhaps it should not have been changed."

Michelle Root
Perry Hall, MD
Junior

"No, I don't feel that the coaches were fired on accusations. They were not proven guilty for the NCAA violation and I basically feel that the team should have been consulted about the situation at least a full semester before the coaches were fired."



Trevor Hurd
Houston, TX
Junior

"No, I don't. I feel that President Trout and Jeff Miller grossly abused their power in terminating the head coaches. Due process and the team members' opinions were completely ignored. I plan to boycott this semester and play somewhere else next semester."

Pam Hendrickson
Kutztown, PA
Sophomore

"The timing of the changes in the tennis teams coaching staff was extremely inconsiderate to the players involved. Having been notified approximately two months before school reconvened made for an unnecessarily stressful summer for all team members involved."

Campus Parking: The Issue of the Year?

by Rachel Demma

I don't know. Each year there's a new issue on campus to jump up on your soapbox and shout about. Last year, if memory serves, in the Elm construction on campus was the hot topic. Construction this, and construction that. And this year we were greeted with yet another provoking issue: parking. No, make that parking lots. Or rather the lack of them. Or is it the placement of them? Their misuse? Or their lack of use entirely? Lack of lighting? Failure to clearly mark restricted parking spaces? Keep your ear to the ground and you'll hear it all. I heard one guy complaining about the angle of the painted lines in the Kent Circle lot.

Parking shmarking, I say. What's the real issue here? The no-name parking lot in front of Cecil and Dorchester has been

Wyman Unprofessional

Concerning the current situation at Washington College:

I have had the experience of knowing Fred Wyman for the last twenty years. If the committee of eight in the Soviet Union had had Dr. Wyman as their media consultant, the coup may have succeeded. Fred is very skilled at presenting his point of view to the media.

If the press would interview some of the tennis directors in the area such as Bill Bouline in Dover or Renie Turner in Ocean City, they would hear an entirely different point of view. One specific incident in Ocean City last August left me very upset when Fred cancelled six or seven people from the Chestertown area the day before the tournament. When I arrived for my match I found that I had been cancelled also, Renie feeling that I was one of that bunch. My match was rearranged for a later time. The following week I confronted Fred and told him that I did not want to see that happen again. It did happen again at Bill Boulines [sic] Christmas tournament in Dover and another unsavory incident occurred in the Seaford tournament this summer.

I have supported Fred Wyman and Washington College Tennis in the past. But I can no longer do so due to the lack of professional behavior that I am continuing to witness.

Bad Situation, Not Bad People

by Greg Coss

During the past couple of weeks I have been responsible for covering the administration's decision not to renew the contracts of Fred Wyman and Holly Bramble. This decision was a very difficult one to make, and therefore it was tough to write about as well. Both sides, in my opinion, had valid arguments. I completely understand the anger the players and coaches are feeling. Although I only played tennis under Fred for one semester, I saw him as a great team leader on and off the court and a very nice man as well. But what also needs to be looked at is the effort Tom Finnegan is making to help save the program. Here is a guy that for twenty-two years now has been heavily involved with the school. He has coached all kinds of sports, taught, been on the administration, etc. and often during his years here he has taken on responsibility that I believe most others could not handle. I feel that based on his past record which I discussed with him he can handle the responsibilities ahead of him. I also think that he deserves a little more respect from the players. I'm not saying the players have to return to the team, I just think it would be nice if they would all explain their decision to Coach Finnegan in a calm fashion. Finnegan has nothing to do with the decision. He likes these players and wants the best for them. So far the players have given the administration the cold shoulder. Honestly, for this I can't say I blame them. But this feeling should not spread to Coach Finnegan.

Next Week's Topic

The topic of next week's Campus Voices will be:

How bad do you think the parking situation at WC really is?

Anyone wishing to write an op/ed for the Campus Voices page about this topic should contact the Elm by Monday, September 9. Deadline for submission is Tuesday, September 10.

In the World...

Soviet Union

The break-away republics are now renegotiating proposals laid forth by Mikhail Gorbachev. The Baltic community has received the recognition they have sought. The breakdown of the Soviet Union is paving the way for U.S. businessmen and industry, as well as industry around the world, to venture into the Soviet arena. This bodes well not only for the Eastern European economy, but for the U.S. economy as well.

United States

In the bizarre case of the "Hitman and the Cheerleader," Wanda Holloway was convicted for the solicitation of murder. Mrs. Holloway was found guilty of having contracted a hitman to kill Ms. Verna Heath, in the hopes that her daughter Amber would not be able to attend cheerleading tryouts against Shanna, Holloway's daughter.

North Carolina

In Hamlet, North Carolina, 25 people lost their lives and 49 were injured as they tried to flee a fire in a chicken processing plant. A deep fryer started the lethal blaze. Those who escaped with their lives question why the fire doors of the building were locked. Some employees speculate that the Imperial Food Products owners did not want them stealing the chickens. The plant had never been inspected for fire hazards. The company is currently under investigation.

Washington, D.C.

In Washington, DC, Federal drug czar Bob Martinez says that the use of drugs in the U.S. is beginning to dissipate, but that we are a long way off from being a drug-free nation.

California

In California, the famed director Frank Capra died Tuesday at the age of 94. His best known film was the Christmas classic, It's A Wonderful Life. In his films Capra mainly dealt with issues concerning the average citizen, and the triumph of the human spirit.

repaved, if a bit belatedly, and is open for business. Sure, if you park at the far end you've got the chance of a foul baseball from the field going astray through your windshield. But nonetheless, parking is parking. Of course, those of us parked in front of Kent and the Cullen dormitories won't be there too much longer, but wait! Before the complaining starts, remember our new anonymous parking lot. All the cars ought to be able to fit there or elsewhere, for example, behind Tawes.

So what is the issue? Is it inconvenience? People don't want to walk across campus to their cars. True, these out of the way parking lots could prove a problem, even a hazard, at night. Is the problem then something entirely unrelated to parking, like better lighting on campus?

Before you start in on parking, remember it's a privilege. A lot of schools don't allow freshmen to have cars, and decide which underclassmen can bring them on the basis of need. Is the school caught in another bureaucratic muddle, and giving our more parking registrations than they can handle?

Here is your chance to get out those parking aggressions, especially if you're an RA in one of the hill dorms, Kent, or Reid. Or who knows? Perhaps with the newly paved lot available the parking issue will be pushed aside and forgotten... much like that parking ticket from last semester you still haven't paid.

Hands Out Invites Student Participation

by Kathy Mullan

Hi! We're all here, just getting settled with campus life and looking around for the Wac for some way to become involved in the college/Chestertown community and what do we find? HANDS OUT, and we're filled with energy and plans for the coming year to activate our WC campus with volunteers who are eager to respond to many calls for service in our area.

To kick-off the year, our first activity will be directing incorporated with the Kent Super Star contest sponsored by the Kent County United Way. This contest, which will occur from Monday September 16 to Friday September 20, involve teams of four who each compete in one of 13 sporting events. Students of Washington College are welcome to participate on a team organized by sororities, fraternities, residence halls, or individual groups of friends who are interested in having a good time while competing. If your team wants to be involved in this Kent Super Star contest, or if you wish to give your time by volunteering to work one of the scheduled events, please sign up at the Hands Out table in the cafeteria during designated lunch and dinner hours.

Several long-term projects involving outside community organizations such as Project Literacy and the Humane Society are also inconsideration for the upcoming year. We will keep you informed of our various activities and await your enthusiastic participation in as many events as possible. Hands out to a successful year!

Josephine the Fly

by Tanya Allen

Napoleon, Josephine's love-bug, had fainted after discovering that his home, Washington College's beloved Elm tree, had been destroyed. "Wake up! Wake up!" Josephine shook Napoleon and screamed. "Napoleon, you stupid bug, wake up!" Napoleon moaned and twitched a little. "Come on, Napoleon, you can do it, wakee wakee...." Suddenly Napoleon's eyes snapped open and he started frothing at the mouth. "The Elm...the Elm...." he sputtered in between froth globs. "The Elm...."

"Oh geez," said Josephine. "Napoleon, are you all right?"

"The Elm...I must get revenge...the Elm...." he stared, bug-eyed, at the sky as he muttered, twitched, and frothed madly.

"Oh geez, oh no," said Josephine, flying in circles. "I've got to get help! Oh geez, oh no, Napoleon...where should I go? Um...Napoleon, wait here, I'm going to find a doctor or something...." she left him twitching on the ground as she flew in search of "Help! Help!"

Suddenly she saw a beautiful, blue and violet butterfly, sucking on a flower. "Excuse me, excuse me," Josephine panted as she swooped down to the butterfly. "Can you help me? My boyfriend's having a nervous breakdown!"

"A nervous breakdown?" said the butterfly, straightening and waving her antenna gracefully, "This is Saturday, right?"

"Yes! Yes! Do you have any idea what I can do? Does this school have a health service center?"

"You and your boyfriend must not be natives of this college."

"Well, I'm not, but my boyfriend...."

"The reason I know you're not natives of this college," the butterfly went on, "Is that this is the weekend."

"What?"

"Washington College natives never get sick or have emotional problems on weekends. The only time Washington College natives get sick or become emotionally disturbed is when the Health Service Center is open: on weekdays, between 8:30 am and 12pm, and 1pm and 3:30pm. They never get sick in the hour between twelve and one, though."

"Really?"

"Yes. If they did, the college would be sure to have their Health Center open for at least a couple of hours on Saturdays and Sundays, as many other schools do, but of course, Washington College natives are the most healthy and emotionally stable creatures in the world...Washington College natives never even break or sprain their legs, or come to the school physically handicapped!"

"Is that so?"

"Yes! If they did, Washington College would have a whole lot more ramps and things of that sort...a person in a wheelchair wouldn't even be able to get into many of this school's buildings, much less get upstairs to the upper-floor classrooms...."

"Well, that's all very nice," Josephine said, "But it doesn't help me figure out what to do to help my boyfriend!"

"Actually," said the butterfly, "there is another way you can get him help...."

"How?"

"If you can alert security, they will call a therapist, who will do some counseling on the phone....it'll take a while to get a hold of someone, though."

"I don't have a while!" Josephine said angrily, "And I need a counselor HERE. My boyfriend needs help NOW! Health Services should be open NOW!"

"Where is your boyfriend?"

"He's lying and frothing in the middle of the campus, where the Elm used to be."

"Is anyone with him?"

"No...."

"You left him alone?"

"Yes...."

"Well, what if some human steps on him? Though of course, this is the weekend, and we never have accidents happen on the weekends, so...."

"Oh geez," Josephine said, "how could I have left him? I've got to get back...." she flapped frantically to the Elm, the butterfly gliding next to her.

"By the way," the butterfly said as she glided, "My name is Brenda."

"I'm Josephine," Josephine said, "And my boyfriend's name is Napoleon, and he should be right...WHERE IS HE? He's disappeared!"

"Oh dear," said Brenda.

Josephine grabbed the butterfly by the wings and screamed "I have to find my boyfriend! I have to find Napoleon! Where could he have gone? HELP ME!"

"Calm down!" Brenda said sharply. "We'll find him....we'll go all over campus until we find him, all right?"

"All right...."

"We'll try K.A. first, ok?"

"Ok...."

"We'll find him," Brenda went on in a soothing voice, "and then everything will be all right, ok?" Josephine was silent, rubbing her front legs nervously. "Ok?"

Josephine finally nodded, blinked her teary eyes, and buzzed bravely.

Internship Opportunities Available

by Sherry Menton

Tribal College: The Journal of American Indian Higher Education and its editor, Mr. Paul Boyer, have found a new home at Washington College. The Journal, a quarterly publication dedicated to matters of public policy that relate to American Indian higher education, relocated to Chestertown from Sacramento this summer in order to be closer to Washington, DC. Although the 27 tribal colleges who sponsor the Journal are mostly in the northern plains states, Boyer stated, "So much of Indian policy depends on DC, [that] it makes sense to be here." He continued, "Although the Indian reservations are like independent nations in that they are soverign states, there's an obligation to support the reservations, and that comes from the capital."

Now that Boyer is here, he is looking to offer an internship program to a few WC students interested in working on a "small, but nationally distributed, educational journal." Attempts to provide one paid internship are still in the works, but Boyer plans to offer two or three unpaid internships to students who are "confident with their writing abilities, have strong research skills, and are interested in political science or international affairs." Internists will have the opportunity to work on all aspects of producing a small magazine, and will have an opportunity to "meet with leaders of Native American organizations based in Washington, DC and attend at least one meeting of tribal college presidents. Previous experience with American Indian public policy is not necessary, but an interest in Native American issues would be an obvious advantage. More information can be obtained from flyers which will be appearing at the Literary House and around campus in the near future.

In addition to the internships and by special arrangement with President Trout, Boyer will be offering his journalism expertise to the Elm and Pegasus. He will be conducting informal seminars about newswriting and layout design, among other things, for the newspaper and yearbook editors periodically throughout the year.

Boyer has an M.A. in Public Communication, which he received from the California State University. He also holds a B.A. from Empire State College in New York. Boyer has been working professionally in journalism for over eight years.

About the change from city life in California to sleepy Chestertown, Boyer said, "My wife and I are enjoying living in a small community, and not being anonymous residents. We're getting to know our neighbors."

Murder Mystery Begins Season

by Tarin Towers

Jason Imber's production of Agatha Christie's Ten Little Indians kicks off a demanding season for the Washington College Drama Department, a season which includes eight plays to be produced over the coming year. Ten Little Indians takes place on an island off the coast of England in the 1930's. The eleven characters are trapped on the island, trying to save their own lives as the others drop of like flies. I interviewed Jason in the Green Room of Tawes Theatre, immediately after a drama majors' meeting and preceeding the first readthrough and first meeting of his cast.

You only have a little under three weeks to produce this play, which seems like a very short time. Do you anticipate any problems because of this?

It is a short time. I'm going to have to work a lot harder than anyone would normally have to when directing their show . . . I have a more limited time and I'll just have to have longer rehearsals.

You've chosen to do a lot of cross-casting for this production; how will that work with the original text?

I think it adds an interesting twist to the original script. I haven't heard of any previous cross-cast production of the original play. It's just a matter of making girls believe they are boys, or men believe they are women.

You've said you characterize your cast as "freshmen, sophomores, and Karyn Iacangelo." How do you feel about working with people who may be new to the stage?

I see it as a challenge – I was happy to see all the freshmen at auditions, to see the lower classes participating in the drama productions more than they may have in past years. I was happy to cast them.

Last year's drama season was filled with deaths, suicides, torture, etc. By opening with a play in which almost everyone dies, do you feel you are kicking off another death-filled season?

No, I don't see this as a death play . . . It's a mystery, and I see it as being much more entertaining than the "death plays" of last year.

There have been dozens of movies and tv episodes, including Remington Steele and Magnum P.I., which have ripped off the plot of this fairly well-known play. What is your vision, your plan on how to make this a different play?

I'm going to do that by making it truer to Agatha Christie's original text than these other versions – I'm going to make it closer to her ideas, adding my own interpretations as well.

Such as?

It's humorous also, and I'm going to try to highlight the more humorous parts of the play . . . There are so many other things going into it that I just can't put into words.

Why did you choose this play?

Ten little Indians has always been one of my favorite books, and I love the movies. I've always wanted to do a production of this, and for my senior project, this was my first choice.

Why should students, particularly new students, go to see this play?

To see their fellow classmen performing in department productions, so they know that it's possible, so they can try out for some of the other plays this year. [As for upperclasmen], they should just support the department in general.

The cast of Ten Little Indians is comprised of: Kenneth Joseph, Abrah Wilberding, Richard McKee, Rebecca Bryant, Rachel Demma, Paul Briggs, Sara Hunt, Melissa Moorehead, Karyn Icangelo, Kristen Hamilton, and Eve Zartman.

In addition to director Jason Imber, the crew includes Ed Schroeder as assistant director, Jason West as technical director, Carey Smith as stage manager, and Deidre Reigel as set designer.

Movie Review...

Dead Again Is Alive and Well

by Sara Hunt

Ahhh, the Hitchcock legacy. It has left us with a taste for suspense and very few good movies to go along with it. Let's face it, Nightmare on Elm Street is no Rebecca. But finally, for all of you who are tired of laughably horrible horror films and slasher movies, there is a psychological thriller which lives up to the Hitchcock legacy. Dead Again, directed by Kenneth Branagh of Henry V fame and written by Scott Frank, is a wonderfully suspenseful film Hitchcock would be proud to have made.

Emma Thompson (Henry V) plays a young amnesiac, Grace, who is plagued with nightmares. Unable to speak at first, Grace receives help from philandering investigator Mike Church, played by Branagh. The real problem troubling the amnesiac is discovered by a hypnotist/antiques dealer. It seems that Grace has become obsessed with events that occurred in her past life; specifically, the murder of Margaret Strauss (Thompson) by her husband Roman Strauss (Branagh) in 1949. Needless to say, Mike and Grace fall in love and their romance mirrors Margaret and Roman's courtship. Grace grows more and more frightened and becomes convinced the past will repeat itself. But Mike, unwillingly cast as the villain, is forced to look to the past to salvage the present.

Branagh does yet another wonderful job as director. He manages to slip from the present to the past and back again without confusing even the slowest audience member, partly because the scenes from the forties are in black and white. The suspense and tension run high through the whole film, and the story never drags. Branagh relieves the some of the tension through humor. "Dead Again" manages to be scary and funny at the same time. How many movies have lines like "It's my karmic burden to load cat food."? This movie is pure fun. Don't expect the power and vision of Henry V, however. It is interesting to note that Branagh has a very distinct style. Branagh likes to balance his actors in the camera's view the way an artist would people in a portrait. That sense of balance works wonderfully well in the hypnotist's shop and in the forties. He also uses slow motion in an ingenious manner, especially in the climactic scene. Occasionally the camera lingers a bit too long on a particular item, but that is a minor problem in a fantastic film.
